Indeed, this afternoon, we had the hon. Minister present us with a report on the department's activities and its hopes and its plans which, I think, confirmed the grasp he has of the department and of some new steps he is making. Indeed, I could not help but think, Mr. Chairman, that since the hon. Minister is a very young man, indeed the youngest man in the Cabinet, I trust it will not escape the attention of some of his hon. colleagues that maturity and breadth of information is not necessarily the accompaniment of old age and baldness.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. MacDonald: And perhaps when they contemplate the superior job he is doing as the youngest member of the Cabinet, they will not be propelled, when a very young member in the Opposition makes a telling point against them, sir, to resort to cheap jibes with regard to his youth, while ignoring the substance of the comment he makes, because I think the hon. Minister of Education is a model for them to contemplate.

Having said that, Mr. Chairman, I want to proceed to some introductory comments with regard to the estimates.

I want to say at the outset, Mr. Chairman, that I have never been quite so perplexed in preparing the introductory comments to the estimates to know exactly what I should pick and choose. At the present time, in The Department of Education, we have a range of problems, a range of challenges, which cannot be matched in any other department. It was one of the favourite comments of the previous Prime Minister, Mr. Frost, that education is our greatest problem. Well, if it was our greatest problem back in his day, how much more it is our greatest problem today is underlined by many facts. Not the least is, as the hon. Minister pointed out, that something over $400 million, close to 40 per cent of our normal Budget, is going to be devoted to education at the present time.

I want to say at the outset, just by way of underlining a point I think is of some significance, that the government has complicated the problem of choosing what should be discussed in the introduction to the estimates by the division they have made between The Department of Education and The Department of University Affairs. The government has decided that The Department of University Affairs is going to deal with universities alone. In other words, in their wisdom they have chosen to divide post-secondary education, separating universities from all of the other aspects of post-secondary education, whether it be teachers' training, nurses, technological institutes or what you will.

I want to be perfectly fair; I think there is some very valid reason for placing University Affairs by itself. Perhaps for the foreseeable future, for the years that lie immediately ahead of us, it may be well that this is being done. But I hope the hon. Minister has not missed the fact that in separating universities from other post-secondary educational activities he is perpetuating what might be described as first- and second-class education, something which this government sought to eliminate when it introduced the Robarts plan at the secondary level.

One of the great problems we faced when we introduced the Robarts plan was to erase from the minds of the general public the idea that commercial or technological training is not something worthy of being put on a status with academic training. Unfortunately, one of the psychological effects that I think is going to flow from the division that has been made of universities in a category and department by themselves, and all of the other post-secondary training still being tucked away with secondary and public education, is to some extent the establishment of first- and second-class education, which I think is unfortunate. While I acknowledge some validity in the division that the government has made, I do not think we should ignore some of the consequences that may flow from the decision. Certainly, of minor consequence, it creates some difficulty for us in dealing with the estimates today.

I want to deal first with some of the general aspects of education. In the hon. Minister's comments this afternoon with regard to retraining, he had one phase in which he referred to "uncertainty". There was a very brief and poignant little sentence in which he referred to uncertainty. I want to suggest to him that the one characteristic that is common to many fields of education today, indeed I would almost say to most fields of education today, is that of uncertainty. There is uncertainty, for example, with regard to goals. We are engaged today in an agonizing reappraisal of the whole purpose of education in the face of the revolutionary changes of our age. There is uncertainty as to the techniques in face of the persistent problem of drop-outs, a wastage at the secondary and the higher levels of education that is so great as to seriously question the whole basic efficiency of our educational system.

The reasons for this uncertainty lie in part in the problems arising from an unprecedented extension of educational opportunities to a growing proportion of our people. In fact, I sometimes wonder, Mr. Chairman, if we realize that we are in a period which if it has any parallel in history, it is the period of about 100 years ago, when we broke away from the concept of education being restricted to a very few people and we began to move into the whole concept of a public educational system. Now in our day, in our generation, we are going so far beyond that in terms of educational opportunities in many, many fields.

But this reason is compounded by the fact that educational research has been sadly lacking, so that we are not exactly certain where we are going or how we are going to get there. Indeed, I was very interested this morning to read in the Globe and Mail of a speech that was given by Sister Jacqueline Grennan, executive vice-president of the Webster College of St. Louis, to, of all people, a group of ad men yesterday. In the course of her speaking to the advertising men, she is reported in the Globe and Mail in the latter part of its report this morning as saying this:

She raised chuckles from the 600 advertisers at the conference by reminding them of the plight of the railways—"the only industry which invested as little in research as the education industry has."

This is the basic point I want the House to recognize—that in education we have done very little research, we have done virtually no research in terms of what should have been done. As a result, we do not know exactly where we are going or how best to get there simply because we have not devoted enough time or energy or resources to find out.

In my view, Mr. Chairman, this uncertain atmosphere is one of the major problems facing us in the field of education today. To a considerable extent we are operating blindly, and for that reason I have a basic and overall recommendation to suggest to the government. It is the establishment of a continuing committee of inquiry which would initiate investigations into the many interrelated problems which we face in education today. I envisage this committee of inquiry as tackling a job that may extend over the next five years or perhaps more. Its personnel should be the very best available, drawn partly from the field of education, but partly from outstanding citizens who can bring a fresh outside approach. Its purpose will be not only to initiate through subcommittees research in depth into the many perplexing problems, but also to assess and to co-ordinate the results so that the committee might be able to advise the government.

It might be argued, Mr. Chairman, that this is a job for The Department of Education and for the new Department of University Affairs. But in my submission, because of the very nature of their operations, they are so preoccupied with the day-to-day administrative problems that they are not free to do the detailed study and assessment.

In suggesting such a continuing committee of inquiry, I do not want to suggest that the field has been neglected completely. On the contrary, as the hon. Minister pointed out this afternoon, investigations have been launched into a number of worrying questions.

For example, the whole role of the effectiveness of Grade 13 has been referred to a committee. But the point I want to make is that Grade 13 is not an isolated problem. It is simply the most controversial link in the whole educational chain from Grade 1 to the increasingly diversified field of higher education. In short, a study of the problem or of the role of Grade 13 should be co-ordinated with a much needed re-examination of our whole educational system from kindergarten through to the post-graduate field, or general adult education throughout our working lifetime.

Second, there are the important studies of the Ontario Curriculum Institute. The Department of Education has joined with the teachers' federation, the trustees' council and other bodies, in a study of our curriculum through public and secondary schools. This is something that is long overdue. Ontario and Canada have lagged behind European countries in efforts to modernize curricula in order to meet the needs of our day more effectively.

In part, the function of this continuing committee of inquiry will be to co-ordinate studies which are already under way and to fit these individual pieces into the broader educational mosaic. But in addition, there is an impressive range of neglected problems that are crying out for investigation. Some or all of them might be included in the terms of reference for such committee of inquiry and I just want tonight, within the limitations of the time that one should take in some introductory statements, to cite four different examples.

First, I think it is not too early to assess the operation of the effectiveness of the Robarts plan, which seeks to provide the three streams of academic, technical and commercial education in our secondary schools.

There are many problems inherent in the nature of this reshaping of our educational system at the secondary level. Many of these problems are born of the relatively unplanned manner in which it was introduced, as a result of which there are grave misgivings in the minds of a good many of the teachers whose role is vital for the success and the implementation of the Robarts plan. Therefore, I submit to the hon. Minister that the time is now, rather than some time later, to examine and review the whole implementation of the Robarts Plan so that we can find to what extent we are just paying lip service to an ideal, and to what extent it has really been implemented. We have found, for example, across the board rather than in the limited area he has assessed and reported on this afternoon, that there is at least some balance between the academic and the commercial and the technical. It seems to me that the sooner we take a look at this and find the limitations in its operation—because we all agree that it is a desirable objective—and perhaps make up for the rather hasty and unplanned way in which it was suddenly dropped like a bolt from the blue upon the province of Ontario, then the sooner we are going to be in a position to do something by way of correcting the errors that may be creeping into its implementation.

Second, there is the drop-out problem which I want to submit, Mr. Chairman, is not so much a problem of our schools as of our society. Indeed, at this point, I want to borrow from the writing and the reflection of one of the regular commentators on educational matters in the city of Toronto, Mr. J. Bascom St. John, in the Globe and Mail, when he was discussing on June 10 of last year, the whole question of drop-outs. He said it is commonly assumed even by those who work in schools, that the drop-out problem is mainly a school responsibility. Then he goes on to debunk this and he gets into what I submit to the House for its consideration for a moment is the whole basis of this problem of drop-outs. I am quoting from his article. He said:

It is a simple fact that nobody anywhere has yet been able to conceive of a perfect educational programme which would grip all young people from the beginning to the end of their course and keep them learning. Theoretically, knowledge in all or any of its forms is in itself fascinating—a matter of unquestionable interest to all ages and every person. Actually, this is far from true.

There is a period in every childhood when it would seem that curiosity is insatiable and learning is as easy as breathing but for whatever reason this lively concern does not last. The cynics will say that the school destroys it. It dies even in children who do not go to school, with rare exceptions. In asserting that the drop-out problem is not primarily an educational problem, we would say rather that it relates to society, to human nature, to the structure of the mind, character, will and imagination and all that makes persons different from each other. The school people should stop chiding themselves for failing in overcoming the drop-out problem and society at large should start a vivid self examination to find the causes of the refusal to learn and the contempt for knowledge.

In 3,000 years we have not been able to define successfully what an education is, or ought to be. There is a passage in Aristotle's politics in which he deplors the inability of people to decide what ought to be studied and how. We are no closer to agreement now than the Greeks were then.

That is the end of the quotation. Then Mr. St. John goes on to discuss the thought that education in the centuries since the days of the Greeks has been centred in the science faculties and in the humanities, and this is the whole core of the concept of education that we have lived with up until very modern days. Then he makes this very pertinent point:

The concept of an education for work in its various forms is relatively new and it has to overcome the enormous prestige and continuous opposition of the entrenched humanities.

Later he adds:

Education for hand occupations is so new that there are many people still alive who were born before the first experiments in this field were tried. Naturally there is still much to learn on what to teach, how to teach it, and how to relate these new forms of schooling to the essential elements of knowledge in the old education. Man is still a person with a mind and a soul as well as two hands, and neither aspect of this nature should be neglected in school.

I do not want to go any further into this for the moment. As a matter of fact, in subsequent articles, in October, 1963, Mr. Bascom St. John continues to go on to explore the problem of the drop-outs.

One point we should bring into our consideration here is the kind of thing that was revealed in the past year by the inspectors' report in the Metro area, as reported in the Toronto Daily Star on July 3, 1963, by Ross Henderson. He referred to the fact that the educational "establishment" in Metropolitan Toronto had come out fighting when Ed McGibbon on his radio programme on the CBC made some comments with regard to school classes and failure policies. Mr. McGibbon charged that pupils who should not have been passed in lower grades were passed and then when they were in high school these students were squeezed out, so that they would not be trying Grade 13 examinations at all.

Mr. Henderson goes on to deal with the results of what is described as the "survival index" in three or four of the downtown Toronto schools as contained in the inspectors' report, showing that you have this serious drop-out through each of the high school grades. Then Ross Henderson concludes his article with this rather significant comment:

Each year Toronto trustees get a report stating that their school Grade 13 results passes, as a percentage of all papers written, were above the provincial average and there are proud smiles all round. The report they never get—little unpleasant news is reported to them—would say that the high pass rate is accomplished by failing problem children who take up needed space, so that they get discouraged and quit, to become unemployment problems.

I leave the matter there, but I want to suggest to the hon. Minister and to the House that the whole problem of drop-outs is part of the broader question of moving from an educational system which was related to the idea of providing something for the leisured aristocracy—or the professional groups, a few people in society—to the concept that education for work is something that is so basic and is so new that the ramifications of it and the problems related to it are something that we have not yet really come to grips with. I think the sooner we do it, the sooner we are going to be able to be in a position to come to more intelligent decisions with regard to it.

I give this government credit. Indeed, I go back to the period of the hon. Prime Minister, when he was Minister of Education. Somehow, if I judge The Department of Education on the basis of the previous record, I do not think it would have been capable of the vision and the imagination to have seized upon the fact that the federal government was making money available to expand this withered arm of our educational system on the technical side. Certainly the department has shown little appreciation of it because of its whole academic orientation. But I think the impact of events combined with the kind of leadership that the hon. Minister gave, led us to seize upon this with the result we have the so-called Robarts plan, in which we have diversified our educational system to the commercial and the technical as well as the academic and the department is now seeking to make it available across the whole province of Ontario.

But Mr. Chairman, the point I draw to the attention of the hon. Minister is that while the department has grasped the significance of this at the secondary school level—and I shall dwell upon it in more detail later—it has apparently not grasped the necessity of this at the post-secondary level. As the hon. member for Brant pointed out, the university presidents in their first report emphasized that there are only 6,000 places at the present time in our technological institutes. With the muted undertones with which university presidents normally speak when they should really be taking the club out and going after the government, they stated that what we should have is a tripling of this objective to 18,000. They said this two years ago and nothing has happened since then—nothing that was not on the drawing board before.

In other words, here is a revelation that even this government, which grasped the importance of a diversification of our educational system to include technological training at the secondary level, had not grasped it with a degree of conviction so that it is moving forward with vigour to make it available at the post-secondary level, which in our day and age is certainly just as important as the secondary level itself. That is the second point I wanted to draw to the attention of the hon. Minister. First, the reassessment of the Robarts plan; second, the whole question of drop-outs, and the broader concept of education.

The third one I want to deal with is the whole confusion of job retraining, in an age when it is said that a worker may well have to be trained and retrained two or three times during his lifetime. Let me go back and document just how incredibly confused and bewildering this picture is at the present time, Mr. Chairman. I have here an article from the Toronto Daily Star of April 24, 1963 entitled: "Teachers blast 'confused' job retraining."

Part of it reads as follows:

Retraining for unemployed workers was described yesterday as confused by the teachers who do it, but they agreed it worked. Reporting to the Metro school board, secondary school superintendent, J. R. H. Morgan said he never engaged in an operation "with as many loose ends." Mr. Morgan said the retraining programmes paid for by senior governments did not know who they reported to, who set their policies, or who could end the confusion. "We do not know where the responsibility is. If something needs doing, we just go out and do it," he said.

The trustees decided to study Mr. Morgan's proposal to ask the province for a statement outlining responsibilities in the proposal to set up a new school for retraining.

It is all very well, Mr. Chairman—if I may pause here for a moment to comment on this documentation of the incredibly confusing picture of retraining at the present time. It is all very well to say that this was an emergency and that the two senior levels of government, have provided the monies and the degree of leadership and have said to the local level of government, which has the facilities to come to grips with the problem, "Go ahead and do it."

It is all very well to do it on this kind of helter-skelter, confused basis if it were only on emergency. Undoubtedly, in the first instance, it was an emergency. But Mr. Chairman, the simple fact of the matter is that to anybody who has assessed the implications of automation, the implications of the changes which scientific revolution is bringing with relation to our working force, this is not an emergency. This is a problem which is going to be with us for the foreseeable future; therefore, Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest to you that here is a problem we have to sit down with and take a look at. We have to research it in depth. We have to study it.

Let me quote just one other incredible aspect of the present situation, as referred to in this article:

Federal and provincial authorities asked Metro to appoint a co-ordinator for the scheme. A. W. Fair, former vice-principal of Central High School of Commerce, was appointed. But then The Department of Education specified each principal of a school operating a retraining programme would run his own programme.

Maybe there is some reason for this, but what is the result of this confusion and other aspects of the programme? I want to come to that.

It was rather dramatically, and in headlines, revealed to at least the Metropolitan area in another story in the Toronto Daily Star in January of this year:

"Can't afford to be educated; 1,000 quit the retraining school."

This story relates the details of one individual, one Lloyd B. Jones, who is one of the more than 1,000 men and women who quit the Toronto adult retraining programme because they cannot afford the luxury of improving their education. I shall quote:

Mr. A. W. Fair, the programme's co-ordinator, yesterday shocked Toronto's welfare committee when they listed the number of people who have dropped out of the scheme designed to teach skills to the unemployed or to give new skills to those replaced by automation.

Here is a direct quote from Mr. Jones, this one man, taken as a case history:

"I am not going back. I am not going to put my family through that again," the tall army veteran maintained. "They would have been all right if I could have gone through. I worked hard and got good marks."

But he was a man who was married, who had a family, who was trying to live on $36 a week, $6 a day for the six days of the week, and he simply could not do it.

The hon. Minister spoke this afternoon, for example—and I was very interested to hear this announcement, but I was saddened by the fact that he did not grasp the opportunity to push this kind of situation—pointing out that the federal government is now going to assume 90 per cent rather than, I believe, 75 per cent of the cost of retraining. But instead of the provincial government pocketing the remaining 15 per cent, when you have a programme that is as much of a failure as this because of those who happen to be in a financial position where they require more than $36 a week to live on, why not devote the amount of money which is free at the provincial level to increasing the $6 a day made available for those who are seeking retraining.

However, again, I do not want to go to any greater length in spelling out the nature of the problem. But here you have a problem of retraining which everybody agrees is not simply an emergency; it is a problem which will be with us for a long time to come. I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that before we waste more time and money in this programme more research is needed, so that we can get it onto a permanent, working, efficient basis.

Mr. Chairman, I want to turn to the fourth area which I suggested as proof of the need for a continuing committee of inquiry, and that is with regard to technological education. I mentioned it briefly just a moment ago. The university presidents in their first report, a copy of which I have in my hand here, pointed out on page six of their report—which was really written back in the year 1962, though it was tabled in this House early in 1963—that:

There is need for drastic reorganization and expansion of the facilities for technological education.

Again, if you move on to pages 16, 17 and 18, you will find the gist of their comments with regard to technical training at the post-secondary level. They point out, for example, that the committee was informed that the present enrolment in technological institutes in Ontario is 3,800 and that the present plans are to raise the accommodation to 6,000 with a new institute at Kirkland Lake, a new building at Ottawa and additions to the Ryerson Institute at Toronto.

On page 17 they point out the need for technological training so that we can get teachers in our secondary schools, and the unprecedented and very desirable development of vocational and technical schools across the province of Ontario.

Finally, they come once again to this rather muted proposal to the government—which the government will have to accept for all its full impact, namely:

We recommend strongly that a capacity of the order of 18,000 rather than 6,000 be the goal for the expansion of technological institutes by 1970.

Mr. Chairman, that proposal was made to this government two years ago, in 1962.

I want to draw the attention of the House to the fact that, as far as I know, there has not been a whisper of suggestion that the government is acting on this proposal. True, you are developing Ryerson, but that was on the planning boards. True, you have developed Kirkland Lake, but that was on the planning boards. True, you have built a larger eastern institute of technology, but that was on the planning board.

I should be fair, because I understand from a little birdie which whispered to me that there is some contemplation of replacing of the Institute of Technology at Hamilton, primarily to provide more adequate facilities, but conceivably, in the process you will expand its capacity somewhat.

But the proposition of responding to the challenge of 18,000 being the minimum requirement by 1970, rather than 6,000 is something of which we have heard no whisper of action from this government. And to my mind, Mr. Chairman, it is a double tragedy, because there are many people trying to get into our universities today who should not be going to our universities. They should be going to technological institutes, because they might be more adaptable to the education available in the technological institutes. But how can they get into a technological institute when we have not got them? When we are turning them away by thousands, tens of thousands; if all who needed this training were sought out, it certainly would be thousands.

Hon. Mr. Davis: You would have to seek them out, though.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, maybe it is our task to seek them out, because if we do not seek them out now we will find them in the unemployment lines ten years from now. We will not need to seek them out then; they will be on our hands for the rest of our lifetime, or we will have to process them through the—I trust it will not be—the continuing confusion of our retraining at that stage. In other words, Mr. Chairman, the government has not responded.

I come back to the basic point that I am making. The university presidents, who I think being humble folk, acknowledge that—

Hon. Mr. Davis: Which cheek does the hon. member have his tongue in?

Mr. MacDonald: —that they were straying somewhat from their immediate field of concern into the technological field, nonetheless they stated rather emphatically, and I think, correctly—I am quoting from page 18:

We think that the relations of the vocational secondary schools and technological institutes—indeed the entire development of technological and technical education in Ontario—should be investigated in depth by a competent and representative group, backed up by a fact-finding and research staff. Direction, co-ordination, and research are sorely needed in this field.

Mr. Chairman, this is the basic plea that I am making. I want to suggest to you that direction and co-ordination and research are needed in the whole field of education, if we are going to dispell this atmosphere of uncertainty as to in what direction we are going, and how we are going to get there. We need a Robbins' type of investigation, such as has been recently completed in Great Britain by Lord Robbins, into the limited field of university affairs. We need it extended in the province of Ontario and indeed we need it for Canada. But let us forget for the moment the rest of Canada and deal with our own problems at home—throughout the whole of our educational system. This is the task which I believe should be tackled by a continuing committee of inquiry.

As the hon. Minister pointed out this afternoon, it is about 15 years since the Hope report was made in the province of Ontario. Tragically, that report was to a considerable extent abortive, because it was virtually shelved amid a bitter renewal of the controversy over public and separate schools. But that issue, it would be my hope, has been resolved for the moment with the implementation of the foundation programme. That major pitfall has been removed, and I trust therefore we are in a position to be able to get at the other aspects of education and not feel that we are going to have a report or any consideration of it overshadowed by this controversy that has threaded its way through our history.

The committee of inquiry, Mr. Chairman, should not be just another Royal commission that goes off for two or three years and produces a weighty tome that few people are going to read. Rather, the result of subcommittee reports should be assessed in the broader studies which the committee has inaugurated, and recommendations should be made to the government as soon as possible. In short, it should be a working committee, providing the necessary research in depth for The Department of Education and The Department of University Affairs. And, incidentally, I will relate this proposal I am making here to the role—if indeed there should be a role, because though the government has said it will continue, I am not sure that it is wise—the advisory committee on university affairs—when we get to consideration of university matters themselves.

Meanwhile, of course, Mr. Chairman, it is obvious that the government has to forge ahead. We cannot wait in face of the pressing problems we have, while we go off and study exactly how we should go about them. The problems are so urgent that there is no alternative but to forge ahead. The sooner we undertake this basic re-examination the sooner we will be sure that we are on the right course, and if perchance we find that we are not on the right course, then we will be in the position to move and correct the mistakes that we have been making up until now so that they will not be perpetuated in the future.

That is the main point, Mr. Chairman, that I wanted to make in my introductory remarks. I want to move on now, however, to two other matters that I think are so important that they bear some comment at this stage. The first one has to do with the foundation programme on financing education.

One could get rather hilarious at this point, even though it is a very serious matter, because I well remember that afternoon when the hon. Minister of Education, with some difficulty, waded through the treatise that, with deference, I will say was prepared for him. I do not think he prepared it, and he obviously sometimes wondered whether the thing was comprehensible on reading, let alone on hearing. In fact, I was rather interested after the hon. Minister was finished because—maybe I am mistaken on this—as far as I know, there is only one newspaper in the province of Ontario which had an article seriously attempting to analyze what the government's foundation programme on educational finance was. Unfortunately, most newspapers do not have computer systems. I think perhaps this is the answer and the government has given us the clue to it now: they could not figure it out.

The one man, and I think The Department of Education should strike a leather medal for him, was T. J. Allan, of the Toronto Daily Star. Rather than go back to try to wade through the perplexing details as the hon. Minister presented the government's programme for the educational finance foundation programme, I want to read a few comments of Mr. Allan. I must say that not finding time myself to delve into it to the extent that I should have, I found myself almost in complete agreement with the assessment that he came up with. For example, in his article, which was carried on February 4, 1964, approximately a week after the hon. Minister's statement—let it be said of Mr. Allan, it took him a week to figure it out—he said this:

The statement was so complex that the MPPs jeered, unable to understand what he was talking about. And the system of grants is so complicated that it will take W. J. McCordic, executive secretary of the Metro school board, another week to work out how much it means in dollars and cents to Metro schools and taxpayers. Yet

Mr. McCordic and his staff are experts in this field and have the statistical apparatus at their fingertips.

As for the separate school boards and the separate school ratepayers, expecting to get considerable relief from the new system, they are completely in the dark. John Middleweek, secretary-treasurer of the Metro separate school board, won't even hazard a guess as to when he can come up with some firm figures.

Hon. Mr. Davis: He had a very rough idea though.

Mr. MacDonald: Did he? This may be true. There is another point in here, and if he had a rough idea I wonder who he got it from.

One school administrator told the Star if Mr. Davis had wanted to confuse the situation, he couldn't have succeeded better. My guess is that even the boys up at The Department of Education don't know the score.

Now there is a harsh comment.

Mr. Nixon: That cannot be true.

Mr. MacDonald: Cannot be true?

Confusion reigns at every school board in the province. This is a deplorable start to a brand-new policy of school finances, one that could have enormous effect on the quality and cost of schooling.

This is a basic point that I want to pause and dwell on for a moment. I had hoped in the incredible confusion and patchwork of grants that we have developed over the years, indeed over the decades and generations in the province of Ontario, that the government's decision to move toward a foundation programme in educational finance might have resulted in a simplification. As far as I can figure out, even from the people who have attempted to analyze the government's statement, the difficulties and the complexities have become compounded.

Mr. Allan makes one or two other comments that I want to put on the record.

Equalization and tax relief were the purposes given by Mr. Davis, and a year ago by Premier Robarts, when introducing the foundation programme. Indications are that there will be little equalization and less tax relief, this year anyway.

The obvious purpose of a foundation programme is to control mounting school costs. With the government committed to school boards amounting this year to $285.5 million, its iron hand is showing through the new scheme. A foundation plan for financing public education involves a central authority establishing a cost level, a foundation sufficient to provide adequate schooling. These costs are divided among those who will pay the bills—in Ontario, the school boards through local taxes, and The Department of Education through provincial revenue.

Then he gets down to a basic assessment of what the government said was its programme. Here we come to the points that raise even more doubts as to the basic efficiency or validity of the particular foundation programme with which this government has come up.

The foundation Mr. Davis has established for operating the schools is $210 for each elementary school pupil, $420 for each high school and collegiate pupil, and $550 for each vocational-technical school pupil. The government has decided to pay a little over a third of these costs, 35 per cent. This will be its basic grant.

If a school area has a lot of assessment on which to levy taxes, this is about all it will get. If it is assessment poor, it will get an equalizing grant which may end up with the local taxpayer putting up only five or ten per cent of the $210, the $420 or the $500.

The basic point Mr. Allan makes—and it seems to me it is a valid point—is that here the government has accepted the foundation for underwriting presumably an equality of educational opportunity in this province—$210 at the elementary level, $420 for high school, and $550 for vocational school.

He points out, however, that the comparable figures at the moment in North York are: $442 for elementary, not $210; $620 for academic secondary, not $420; and $974 for vocational, not $550. Some may say this is the rich affluent city of Toronto, or the suburbs of Toronto up in North York. So he makes another point which puts the whole issue into a rather interesting perspective: That if we go back to the government's own averages, in the year 1961, throughout the whole of the province of Ontario the average for elementary pupils was $293.64, yet they fix the foundation at $210. The average for academic high school students was $592.84, yet they now fix the foundation at $420. The average for vocational was $743.79, yet the government has fixed the foundation at $550. So the foundation is so low as to be meaningless in terms of providing a base upon which you can really lift; because if it is an "assessment poor" area then you will find that very little more is going to be able to be raised in the local area.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, he comes to this conclusion, and I quote it with full endorsement:

The government has approached the foundation plan of financing schools so gingerly and at such a low level that it seems little more than a new name for the old hodge-podge of grants. It is, however, new. Its operation will have to be watched carefully lest education itself suffers a new poverty.

Having said that, I concur with Mr. Allan. I acknowledge great difficulty in comprehending anything as complex as the government's foundation programme. I suppose the only thing we can do is to wait for at least a year until even experts like Mr. McCordic, or the secretary of the separate school board, can figure out what it means to them—as well as all the amateurs who are engaged in trying to operate this educational system in the rural and small towns and villages across the province of Ontario and then take another look at it at that time. But I do so with a degree of misgiving, which I emphasize at the moment.

Mr. Chairman, the final point I want to raise does not really deal with any specific item in the estimates at the moment, but rather with an atmosphere and an attitude towards education and, more particularly, its costs today. I was rather interested, for example, in reading the advisory committee's latest report, which the hon. Minister made available to all the members just three or four days ago, to find that in the true and tried familiar pattern of the Frost approach to discussing costs in education or anything else, about the first third of the report went on in a manner meaningless and futile review of the percentage increases which have been made in education costs and everything else at the university level.

When we get to a discussion of university affairs in the latter part of these estimates, we will find out just how far short the government has fallen of the need, quite apart from trying to build statistics on the basis of the hopelessly inadequate amount we were making available a few years ago. But all this, combined with the problem at the local level, where we have left too much of the cost of education as a burden to be borne on homes and farmlands, has created in the public mind the idea that we are spending too much on education. It is an excessive amount; it is an exorbitant amount. The result is that every little frill which happens to emerge in education is seized upon by the papers and is given great headlines; thus the public prejudice regarding educational expenditures is bolstered still more by the mistaken belief that a great proportion of our money is being spent on unnecessary elements in education.

I want to relate this to the province of Ontario. I have in my hand here, just to get this into proper perspective, a brief which was presented by the Canadian Teachers' Federation within the last two or three months—I do not happen to have the date here—to the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson in Ottawa. In the course of this brief—I might interject here: Was it November?

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): November, 1963!

Mr. MacDonald: November, 1963!

I might say that is only bringing up to date something I have repeated almost every year in the hope that I might counter this whole public attitude towards excessive expenditures in education, because I think it is one of our great problems.

I want to quote into the record here—and I shall quote it directly so that it may appear in tabular form in Hansard and be more comprehensible. The first table is the personal income per capita, by province, in 1961 in the Dominion of Canada:

Ontario	$1,829
British Columbia	1,809
Alberta	1,582
Canada-average	1,535
Manitoba	1,476
Quebec	1,332
Nova Scotia	1,191
Saskatchewan	1,184
New Brunswick	1,054
Prince Edward Island	952
Newfoundland	904

In other words, Mr. Chairman, in terms of the amount of wealth which is available for all of the needs of today, including education, the province of Ontario is heading the class. We have the largest per capita income and, of course, with the largest province, we obviously have the largest pool of income which is available to be devoted to education.

On page 7 of their brief there is another table, indicating the total school board expenditures for education as a percentage of the personal income by province, in 1961. And once again, let me give this so that it may appear in a more comprehensive tabular fashion in Hansard:

Saskatchewan	6.3%
Alberta	5.4%
New Brunswick	4.6%
Newfoundland	4.5%
British Columbia	4.2%
Canada-average	4.2%
Nova Scotia	4.2%
Prince Edward Island	4.1%
Manitoba	4.0%
Ontario	3.9%

In other words, Mr. Chairman, we stand at the top of the class, in terms of capacity, to meet the needs of education; but in terms of the percentage of that available wealth which we are devoting to education, we stand at the bottom of the class.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I wonder, Mr. Chairman. I recall reading that before it was presented to Mr. Pearson. That did not include, as I recall it, the expenditures on universities in the per capita rate, which alters the figures just a touch.

Mr. MacDonald: I want to be fair with the hon. Minister on all occasions. I was just going to emphasize once again to the hon. members of the House that these figures are the latest DBS figures for 1961. They are always at least three years behind, and I will concede, for example, that we have expanded our contributions at the university level. However, to what extent this is relatively going to change the pattern, I just do not know.

For example, let us examine the increased grants which were made available to the University of British Columbia and the New Simon Fraser University in B.C. A battling namesake of mine by the name of MacDonald is principal of UBC, and he really took on the government out there—not in muted tones but as a good clansman—and got real contribution. Once again I think we may find that most provinces have increased their contributions to higher levels of education, nearly as much, if not as much, as we have in the province of Ontario. I just do not know.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I can tell the hon. member, for his information, that these figures of DBS of course do not include any expenditures we have made under the federal-provincial agreement for technical and vocational training. This will include Ryerson and many other post-secondary institutions, as well as the close to $300 million we have spent for the vocational additions at the secondary level. I can assure the hon. member that we have spent, percentage-wise, far more than any of our sister provinces in this particular field in the last two years. If these figures were reflected in those averages they would not vary that much; and I think you would find that Ontario would not be perhaps in the same relative position.

Mr. MacDonald: I would hope that Ontario—if only for its own self-respect—would at least have gotten out of the bottom of the class and moved half way up. I am sure the hon. Minister would not want to leave in the public's mind the idea that the province of Ontario has spent $300 million; because 75 per cent of that is from Ottawa, so you have spent only 25 per cent of that amount on this whole development.

However, the basic point I am making is that the province of Ontario in the last ten years, which I have been following regularly every year, has stood either at the top or close to the top in terms of available wealth to devote to education and it has stood at the bottom, or close to the bottom, in the percentage of that available wealth devoted to education. Therefore, I think this is something we should bear in mind.

Maybe even the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan) should bear it in mind. Because, you see, it gets us back to a sense of priorities and this is really the point. Unfortunately the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher) is not here tonight. Every time I have discussed this in years gone by, he has come in with a good rural, parochial debunking of my attitude towards educational expenditures.

Last summer I had a very interesting experience. I went up to Bruce county and had an opportunity to speak to a club right in the hon. member's own riding. I thought I would go in fearlessly, like Daniel into the lion's den, and speak on the topic, "Are we spending too much on education?" I documented the conclusion, which I threw out to them as a challenge, that we are not spending too much on education; we have to spend more and if we do not we cannot survive in this world today. And I got resounding applause from the audience: I wish the hon. member for Bruce had been there.

Mr. Newman: How did you do in the election?

Mr. MacDonald: Do not confuse the matter. As a person who ostensibly is interested in education, I thought the hon. member might have grasped this point.

Mr. Newman: The point is: You can get a resounding applause with any gathering.

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): Can I ask the hon. member a question? Is it not so that the people of Ontario pay the Dominion government 45 per cent of all the taxes they receive in the Dominion; would that be considered a contribution to education?

Mr. MacDonald: Like the hon. member who just interjected here on his political point, the hon. Minister missed the point I am making. I shall not waste my time to try to make it for him, but he has missed the point I am trying to make—as usual.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: The hon. member loves to puzzle people.

Mr. MacDonald: There is no puzzlement in the point I am making. The point I am making is that in terms of available wealth in the province of Ontario, as measured by the most accurate yardstick, namely, personal income, we are devoting a smaller percentage of that personal income to education than any other province in this country.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: That is an untruthful statement.

Mr. MacDonald: I think the final point in reference to this—he is interested even if the hon. Minister is not—the final point I wanted to make in this connection, Mr. Chairman, is that this gets us back as a society to examine our priorities.

We talk about education. We talk about the needs of the rising generation as being of highest priority. I have quoted in the past in this House, and I repeat here—though they are out of date because I think they go back to about 1960—other figures which became available by those who researched the issue, to the effect that the average expenditure per capita, man, woman and child, in Canada for education, was $60. The average expenditure for liquor and tobacco was $90. The average expenditure for the purchase and maintenance of cars is $120.

I am not attempting a temperance sermon, and I am just as interested in my car as anybody else, but I ask this House, and I ask the people of the province of Ontario to examine our priorities. What a warped sense of values we have come to accept, perhaps unthinkingly, when we are willing to spend half as much again on liquor and tobacco, and twice as much on the purchase and maintenance of cars, as we are doing on education!

During this past week, Leonard Bertin, the science editor of the Toronto Daily Star, made the point in another way, which is perhaps a bit more pertinent now. He examined the military costs we have in this country today, and pointed out that our military budget for a number of years has been $1.6 billion. And he asked: How much does the average man get for this $1.6 billion? What does he see for it? He sees a fly-past of the aircraft, or something on Armistice Day. And he makes the very pertinent point that that military budget for one year could build six universities the size of the University of Toronto.

Once again, I think it is time we began to examine our priorities. If we are willing almost unquestioningly, to spend $1.6 billion on the military budget, why should we be so reluctant, so hesitant, so Scrooge-like in our approach, in spending on university expenditures or other educational expenditures—when that one year's budget could duplicate six times over the largest university we have in this country at the present time?

I leave this point as a final consideration without specific reference to the estimate itself, but in terms of reshaping our attitudes towards educational expenditures. I think only when we have done a job in getting people to recognize that it is not a question of how much we are spending on education, but it is a question of whether we can afford not to spend much more on education, that we are going to survive in the economic and educational world of the second half of the 20th century.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs) moves that the committee of supply rise and report progress and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report it has come to certain resolutions and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer): Mr. Speaker, it is intended to continue The Department of Education estimates tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Allan moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 10.25 o'clock, p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 29, 1964

The House met at 2 o'clock, p.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: We are pleased to have visitors to the Legislature and today we welcome, as guests in the east gallery, students from Essex District High School, Essex, Ontario.

Presenting petitions.

Presenting reports by committees.

Motions.

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by hon. Mr. Cecile, that the orders of the day for the second reading of Bills Nos. 103, 104, 105 and 109 be discharged and that the bills be referred to the standing committee on labour, legal and municipal bills.

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the motion moved by the hon. Attorney General brings to mind a similar motion moved a few days ago by the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) in relation to Bill No. 99. We objected quite strongly to the procedure on that occasion. We feel just as strongly about the procedure today. If these bills had been allowed to proceed to their second reading stage we would be bound, as an Opposition, to take a very vigorous position in opposition to many of the sections contained in the bills mentioned by the hon. Attorney General today. Because they are, in their present form, wholly unacceptable as far as we are concerned and we would have been bound, I say, to have opposed them vigorously.

Apparently that is the position the government find themselves in today. They are moving to put these bills before the private bills committee, I guess it is the standing committee on labour, legal and municipal bills, and in so doing I imagine that the leader of the government or the hon. Attorney General would say that at that time they are prepared to make rather extensive amendments to these bills in the committee stage.

This brings up again a very vital point, it seems to me, in parliamentary procedure.

Always it has been the custom and the practice that on the second reading of a bill we discuss the principle of the bill. Now we are reversing and backing away from that time-honoured position in our parliamentary procedure. In this instance we are going to the committee, and really the committee will decide on the principle of the bill. That, I suggest, is not the proper procedure.

We are not going to, today, make a formal move to stop these bills from going to committee but I am going to say to the government and to the House that I hope this is the last time we have a procedure of this kind for the purposes which are contained in the resolution of the hon. Attorney General. I hope the government from this time on, when it introduces legislation in the House, will have its mind made up and will be concerned with putting government legislation through the House rather than having it go to some committee of the House to be torn to pieces and come back in its remodelled form.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I mentioned to the hon. leader of the Opposition before we came into the House that I was going to make this motion and I did not hear these objections.

The position is simply this: We have certain amendments to make to these bills and the bills will come back for second reading; and when they do come back the principle of the bills can then be debated. We are not in any way derogating any right of this Legislature to deal with these particular bills. I have no examples here, but in one other debate in this House, when this question arose, I quoted many examples from previous years.

Mr. Oliver: Not many; all from one year.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, I will get them all out again. I had them back to 1957. If necessary I will have them typed out and I can send them to you.

In other words, the point I am making in any event is that it is not a new procedure. This motion is being made as a matter of convenience. An alternative would be to call these bills for second reading. In that event the hon. Attorney General would simply say that when the bill reaches committee stage I propose to make the following amendments; that means the bill would then be debated here on the second reading, with a series of amendments which are proposed to be made of which the hon. members really would not have proper notice or understanding.

All I am suggesting is with this procedure, and all the government is suggesting, is that the bills can go to the committee, the amendments as proposed can there be made, the bills will then come back on to the order paper in exactly the same position as they stand today, and will be called for second reading when the bills can be debated. But the bills at that time, on the order paper, which the hon. members will be able to see and examine, will contain the amendments and will be the bills with which, in fact, we are going to deal.

Now, I realize—

Mr. Oliver: It will be the bill you should have introduced in the first place.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, that is a matter of conjecture and I will not go into that today. But, in any event, our desire is to produce the best legislation we can before this House, and this procedure really is simply a method of dealing with these bills in a way which will make it easy for all the hon. members in the House to understand what we are debating, when they are called for second reading. It is purely a procedural matter.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment briefly on this motion. I think, quite frankly, there are two aspects here on which we should focus attention.

One is this principle of whether or not it is within our rules to refer a bill to a committee before you have had debate on second reading.

I recall that the hon. Prime Minister indicated, in our debate on Bill No. 99 some month or so ago now, that there are precedents for it. Mr. Speaker, there are precedents for everything in this House—absolutely everything. As somebody once said about the Bible, you can find a quotation to justify almost anything; and you can find a quotation to justify almost anything here because of the rather irregular procedures which have sometimes been followed in this House. So, on point one, Mr. Speaker, whatever may be the hon. Prime Minister's reliance on some precedents back in 1957, I want to say quite clearly here that I agree with the hon. leader of the Opposition. When we have a bill brought into this House, I think the proposition that we should debate second reading before it goes to a committee is the logical and intelligent way of handling it. I would suggest we wash out these precedents from the past and get back onto what I think is a more regular and sensible kind of procedure.

The second aspect of it is how we deal with these particular bills here. Again, I am forced to agree with the hon. leader of the Opposition that what we are really dealing with is the problem of four bills the government brought in, about which they have had serious second thoughts and are going to amend so extensively. There is perhaps some wisdom, in terms of tidy and intelligent handling of them, to do this in the committee rather than in the House, because in the committee at least you can have copies of it and we can find out what the bill is with which we are really going to be dealing. But this is an ad hoc problem of how we deal with this particular miscarriage of bills.

I am willing to go along with it without making any big display or performance here today, but I come back to my original point. Whatever may be the odd precedent in this House for sending a bill out before we had debate and second reading, I think that the one we should review and get back into is what I think is a rule under May: That it cannot be discharged until it has had second reading. I think that is the valid and the intelligent rule.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make some comments on this procedure. I object to it most vehemently. In view of the fact that the hon. leader of the Opposition and the hon. leader of my own party (Mr. MacDonald) have indicated they are willing to go along with it at this time I consider that I am bound by any undertaking my own hon. leader has made, I will therefore go along but only under extreme protest.

Reference has been made to certain precedents for this procedure. I believe the precedents were all in one year; or, at any rate, all in one period; and they were undertaken, I believe, in all cases by consent. I would like to suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the precedents were bad precedents and I do not think we should consider ourselves bound by bad precedents. They are certainly quite contrary to the long-established traditions of the British House of Commons and its precedents as recorded in May.

Not only that, Mr. Speaker, they are flatly in opposition—the practice is flatly in opposition—to the written rules of this House. The rule of this House is quite clear and explicit that no bill may be amended or committed until after it has been read twice. Now we have been told on a number of occasions—

Mr. Speaker: Order! I should just like to correct the member. If it has the unanimous consent of the House, rule 60 says that it can be then committed to the standing committee.

Mr. Bryden: That no doubt is true, Mr. Speaker. I would imagine that almost anything can be done even if it is not explicitly stated by unanimous consent, and I suppose we can get around this particular difficulty by granting unanimous consent. What I am trying to avoid is being faced time after time with a proposal to give unanimous consent to a bad principle. It has been suggested on a number of occasions, no doubt with some justice, that practice gradually takes the place of the rules—in other words, in a sense the common law takes precedence over the written law. If our practices are so out of accord with our rules, I think we should take another look at our rules so that hon. members will at least know what the rules of the House are.

I would say in this case that the rules should be reaffirmed and that they should not be allowed to fall into disuse. The hon. Prime Minister says that it is a matter of convenient procedure. Well, there is a perfectly convenient procedure, a well-established traditional procedure available to him, and that is to withdraw the bill and introduce a new bill.

I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that where the government having first introduced a bill, has come to the conclusion that it must make such significant changes in it that it does not wish the bill in its present form to come to second reading, then it should withdraw the bill and bring in a new one that incorporates those changes. As a matter of fact, under May that can be done by a fairly convenient procedure. There can be one motion to discharge the bill from the order paper and to give leave to bring in a new bill. It can be all done in one motion. What is wrong with that procedure?

What is happening here, Mr. Speaker, is that public bills are being treated as if they are private bills. Private bills quite properly go to committee after first reading because there is no question of government policy involved in them, but where government policy is involved, I think the government should take responsibility. It should not try to slough off its responsibility, as I have said on previous occasions, to a committee.

I believe this is a thoroughly bad procedure. I believe a perfectly reasonable alternative is available to the government. I cannot understand why the government does not accept that alternative on this occasion. Since the hon. leaders of the Opposition parties have reluctantly consented to go along, I will not dissent, but I will give notice that if this procedure is followed on any occasion in the future and I am in this House, I will dissent if I am the only one in the House who does dissent, because it is a bad procedure that should not be followed any more.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the motion carry?

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Would the member bearing licence number 3076 on his automobile please go to the front door. They seem to be waiting for the owner there at the present time. Licence number 3076.

Introduction of bills.

THE EXECUTIVE COUNCIL ACT

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves, seconded by hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer), first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Executive Council Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, this bill merely brings the names of the various Ministers into line with the changes that have been made this year.

THE LABOUR RELATIONS ACT

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour) moves, seconded by hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture), first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Labour Relations Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, there are three areas in which changes are made in The Labour Relations Act by this bill which I have just introduced.

First, to transfer the power to grant conciliation in the Ontario Labour Relations Board to the Minister of Labour in order to expedite the conciliation process; see sections

1, 2, part 4, 6, 7, 8, 9, 13, and 14 of the bill. Sections 3 and 10 of the bill are complementary.

Second, to give greater status under the Act to the voluntary recognition by an employer of a trade union as the exclusive bargaining agent of his employees in a defined unit.

Third (a) to extend to post-conciliation proceedings the protection which is now given in respect of formal conciliation proceedings under the Act; (b) to extend to the members of conciliation boards the protection that is now given under the Act to conciliation officers.

By transferring control of the entire conciliation process to the Minister, it is my thought that this will relieve the Ontario Labour Relations Board of a burden and at the same time speed up the process of making conciliation available to employers and trade unions. There will be much more informality in disposing of such requests. I cannot over-emphasize the need for prompt handling of such matters in the field of labour relations, whether by the Ontario Labour Relations Board or by The Department of Labour itself.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that voluntary recognition by an employer of a trade union as bargaining agent of his employees will also be well received. Recognition must be in writing and in respect of a defined unit.

In connection with voluntary recognition, there has to be a safeguard against "sweet-heart deals" and this is also included in the bill. The power is given to the Ontario Labour Relations Board to examine into the validity of a collective agreement made after voluntary recognition in the first year of its operation.

The third matter dealt with in the bill is to extend to post-conciliation proceedings the confidential protection from disclosure in any court or before any tribunal of material or statements made by or to a conciliation officer, the Minister, deputy Minister, and chief conciliation officer.

I think that it will be obvious to every hon. member of the House that statements made in confidence to an officer must be protected. If an employer or trade union representative felt that he could not speak freely, the whole process would be defeated. I am mindful of the fact that delicate checks and balances must be maintained if this type of legislation is to do its best work. That is why I felt that I could come forward with this bill covering conciliation and voluntary recognition without disturbing the general picture.

Labour and management in Ontario have attained a degree of sophistication that they are able to bargain out most of their problems. I recognize that the process of organization and of bargaining is not complete and may never be complete. We cannot forecast the future to know whether the principles expressed in our Act will be valid ten or 15 years hence. However, we have a role to play and that is to provide services to the two sides in their difficulties, to assist in meeting the challenges of changing conditions and to help to keep the peace.

I trust that the changes which are sought in this bill will commend themselves to the hon. members of the House.

Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, may I make reference to the minimum wage programme of the province of Ontario? During the discussion of my department's estimates, I undertook to outline to the House at a subsequent sitting details of the extension of the government's minimum wage programme to other parts of Ontario. This I propose to do now.

By way of background, I would like to point out that on June 30 last year, we brought into operation in the Toronto-Hamilton-Oshawa area, a minimum wage programme which now provides for the following:

1. A general minimum wage of $1 per hour for men and for women.
2. A hotel and restaurant minimum wage along similar lines.
3. A construction minimum wage of $1.25 per hour.

This was, of course, the first step and it was a first step into a highly sensitive and difficult area of legislation, particularly in view of the fact that no comprehensive programme had previously been in existence. Nevertheless, the programme has succeeded in meeting the objectives set forth. It has established a floor to prevent exploitation and it has done so in relation to the economic realities of the area.

As I informed the House during my estimates, we undertook an extensive survey of small businesses throughout Ontario to determine actual employment conditions and levels of wages paid in various parts of the province. In addition to this survey, we have examined other existing statistics available from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and elsewhere. Analysis of all this information now provides us with the basis for the next steps in our minimum wage programme.

I must say that the information points up a number of situations which have led us to certain conclusions. The first is that a general minimum wage of $1.25 an hour, however desirable, is not feasible across Ontario at the present time. Our statistics indicate that a sizeable proportion of wage and salary workers in Ontario are being paid less than $1.25 an hour. Moreover, it is apparent that if a rate of $1.25 were established at this time, many small employers who employ fewer than 15 persons, and some large employers as well, would find it very difficult to do business in Ontario and might have to cut back their operations or even move outside the province. In either case, this could obviously result in loss of employment for a considerable number of people in Ontario and we have no desire to write a prescription which could have such serious side effects.

Nevertheless, the line must be drawn somewhere, below which wage levels should not go. But the line must make economic sense as well as prevent exploitation. As far as I am concerned, a general minimum wage of $1.25 an hour is an objective which we can and will strive for in the future, but it is unrealistic to consider it at the present time.

Our second conclusion is that a $1 an hour general minimum wage rate cannot be applied throughout Ontario immediately without difficulties of the same type as I have just mentioned, even though the degree of disruption would obviously be less than in the case of $1.25 minimum. In fact, our survey results and other studies indicate that just over 132,000 persons, or 6.5 per cent of all the non-agricultural wage and salary workers in Ontario, are at present earning less than $1 an hour. Of these 132,000, approximately 100,000 are in the service industries and trade; 19,000 in manufacturing, and the remaining 13,000 in primary industries, construction, finance, insurance and real estate. Some 65 per cent of this total of 132,000 are women.

Because the proportion of employees receiving less than $1 an hour varies considerably in different parts of the province, being closely related to prevailing industrial population and other economic variations, we have decided that the province must be zoned on the basis of economic conditions and our current minimum wage objectives must be attained by stages. Employers providing work for our people in the province's less economically favoured locations cannot in the first instance be expected to pay rates exactly the same as those paid in more favourable locations. They require time in which to absorb the impact of the programme. Starting with a zone system makes it possible for us to initially establish rate schedules which bear a logical relationship to the economic capabilities of employers and the most basic economic needs of employees, but also to provide for gradual upward movement of these rates in order to reach province-wide uniformity within a reasonable length of time.

We propose therefore to create two zones. Zone one will take in the more highly industrialized and more populous areas and centres of the province, apart from the Oshawa-Toronto-Hamilton region, which has already been covered by last year's orders. This zone will move to the new minimum wage objectives more quickly since it is economically better able to do so. Zone two, which will take in the remainder of the areas of the province in which there is relatively less industry and lower population, will start at somewhat lower initial rates and will move through more gradual stages to the end objectives, to provide the necessarily longer period of adjustment. Among other things, zone two also has the problem of having a considerably higher proportion of its total work force receiving less than $1 an hour at the present time, again because its economic development is not as concentrated. For example, approximately ten per cent of the estimated 408,000 wage and salary workers in zone two now receive less than $1 an hour, while only about five per cent of the estimated 1,632,000 in zone one are in this category.

While it is difficult to define the division of the two zones without the use of a map, I would like to provide the House with a brief description which will give a reasonably clear indication of the areas encompassed by each zone.

Zone one will be that part of Ontario lying south of a line following the northern boundaries of the counties of Lambton, Middlesex, Perth, Wellington, Peel and York, continuing eastward along the northern boundary of the bottom tier of townships in Victoria county, and on easterly to include the more populous portions of the counties of Peterborough, Hastings, Lennox and Addington, Frontenac and the counties bordering the St. Lawrence river up to the Quebec boundary.

Mr. Speaker, in addition, zone one will also include a number of other more populous and industrialized areas which although lying outside this geographic area, have economic conditions comparable to it. These are the Ottawa and Lakehead areas, including the cities of Fort William and Port Arthur, Sault

Ste. Marie, Sudbury, Timmins and North Bay.

Zone two will be the remainder of Ontario lying to the north of the general zone boundary line I have just described. However, I should emphasize that the Oshawa-Toronto-Hamilton area will not be classed as a part of either of these two new zones, since this region was already covered by the new minimum wage programme last year. It will remain under the orders originally established for it at that time, subject only to some minor amendments.

Through the use of progressive stages of rates in the two new zones, we will be able to achieve a general minimum wage of $1 an hour and the construction industry minimum of $1.25 an hour across the province by December, 1965—that is 18 months after the initial stages of the programme go into effect around the end of June this year.

This will be achieved in this way: Under the general and hotel and restaurant orders, the minimum for men in zone one, excluding the present Toronto-Hamilton area, will be $1 as soon as the orders go into effect on June 29 this year. In zone two it will start at 85 cents, rising to 90 cents at December 28, 1964, and to $1 at December 27, 1965.

The minimum for women will start at 85 cents in zone one — excluding the present Toronto-Hamilton area, which is $1 for women—rising to 90 cents at December 28—to 95 cents December 28 this year, and to $1 on March 29, 1965. In zone two, the women's rate will start out at 80 cents, rising to 90 cents December 28, 1964, and to $1 on December 27, 1965.

Under the construction minimum wage orders, the minimum rate in zone one will be set at $1.25 as soon as the orders take effect on June 29 this year, while in zone two it will start at $1.15 on that date, rising to $1.25 on December 27, 1965.

I should mention that there are some specific categories of employment to which the general minimum wage orders will not apply—such as registered apprentices, some student categories, salesmen who determine their own hours, professional persons, domestic servants and farm labourers. There are also other categories, mainly involving part-time or seasonal work, for which special rates are established slightly below the general minimum level, and some training rates are provided for in a similar way. All of these exclusions and special conditions are detailed in the official orders, copies of which are being tabled and are available to hon. members for more detailed information.

Mr. Speaker, may I say that I consider this programme to be one of the most significant ever introduced by your government, in its effect on the wellbeing of working people throughout Ontario.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. Minister a question?

Mr. Speaker: If the Minister agrees to answer.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. Minister if he and his department have given consideration to removing from the minimum wage orders, both the new ones and the existing ones, what I would describe as loopholes—whereby people on piece work in certain cases, people doing certain types of seasonal work, and so-called learners, can be paid less than the prescribed minimum?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: The subject of learners and piece workers is, along with some others, knotty in its involvement—and spelled k-n-o-t-t-y. It is more than somewhat involved due to the various matters which are affected and involved.

We are not interested, in the department, in providing loopholes, but we are interested in seeing that an equitable, just, and fair set of regulations is the result of our efforts.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I would like to table answers to question numbers 13, 14 and 16 on the order paper.

The hon. Prime Minister tabled answers to questions as follows:

13. Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Inquiry of the Ministry:

(1) Does the Canadian Thoroughbred Horse Society give the Provincial Treasurer an accounting of its distribution of the annual grant made to it?

(2) If not, on what basis is the amount of the grant arrived at?

(3) If so, how many breeders received grants in (a) the fiscal year ended March 31, 1963; and (b) the current fiscal year to date?

(4) In each of the said periods, what breeders received individual grants in excess of $1,000, and how much did each of them receive?

Answer by the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan):

(1) Yes.

(2) Not applicable.

(3) (a) 160; (b) 160 (to March 3, 1964).

(4) Fiscal year ended March 31, 1963: Beasley, W. R., $1,443.25; Conklin Farms Ltd., $4,750.75; Dew, Mrs. R. A., $2,014.75; Maclean, Mrs. F., $1,277.50; Pasquale, E. C., $1,763.50; Smythe, C., $1,439.87; Stafford Farms, $1,883.75; Taylor, E. P., $18,385.50.

Fiscal year ending March 31, 1964 (to March 3, 1964): Armstrong Bros. Co. Ltd., $1,476.00; Beasley, W. R., $2,319.75; Conklin Farms Ltd., $2,724.00; Dew, Mrs. R. A., $1,458.00; Mann, Mrs. C. C., $1,484.25; McClelland, D. G., $1,661.50; Pasquale, E. C., $1,426.25; Smythe, C., $2,401.62; Stafford Farms, $1,124.50; Taylor, E. P., $20,996.25.

14. Mr. R. Gisborn (Wentworth East)—Inquiry of the Minister:

(1) On what date did the OPP occupy their present station on Bronte Street in Milton?

(2) Is there a lease, and, if so, what period does it cover?

(3) How much rent does the OPP pay for the premises?

Answer by the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Wishart):

(1) July 1, 1960.

(2) No. Monthly tenancy.

(3) $110 per month, paid by Public Works.

16. Mr. E. G. Freeman (Fort William)—Inquiry of the Ministry:

(1) How many trees were raised in government nurseries and planted on Crown lands for the last year for which figures are available?

(2) For the same year, how many trees were raised by all private corporations and planted on their licensed limits?

(3) Specifically, how many trees were raised in their own nurseries and planted on their own limits by: (a) Spruce Falls Pulp and Paper; (b) Great Lakes Paper; (c) Marathon; (d) Ontario and Minnesota; (e) Abitibi; (f) Kimberly-Clark?

Answer by the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests (Mr. Roberts):

(1) In the fiscal year 1963-64 there was a total of 30,750,000 trees raised in government nurseries and planted on Crown lands in Ontario.

(2) In 1963-64 a total of 2,204,000 trees were raised by private corporations and planted on their licensed limits.

(3) (a) Spruce Falls Power and Paper, 1,022,000; (b) Great Lakes Paper, nil; (c) Marathon, nil; (d) Ontario and Minnesota, nil; (e) Abitibi, nil; (f) Kimberly-Clark, 1,182,000.

Mr. T. L. Wells (Scarborough North): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I would like to ask a question of the hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond), notice of which has been given to him.

My question is: In view of the urgent problem presented by the relationship between cigarette smoking and lung cancer, has the hon. Minister read of the advertising code which the cigarette manufacturers in the United States are going to introduce and, if so, would he care to comment on the possibility of a plan similar to this being introduced by the tobacco companies in Ontario?

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): Mr. Speaker, I have only read a very brief newspaper report on the advertising code to which the hon. member for Scarborough North referred, which would appear to be an important step forward by the cigarette industry which should add to the already extensive programme of education now underway. I cannot at this time say if the Canadian cigarette manufacturers will follow suit.

The province of Ontario, and I think rightly, is a partner in a Canada-wide programme of education but I have been so far unable to ascertain if the matter of advertising has yet been the subject of discussion. I would expect, however, that it has been, since only a short time ago representatives of the tobacco manufacturers met with me to discuss all aspects of the relationship between smoking and lung cancer. At that time they pledged their full support and co-operation in any programmes we might undertake.

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Health. Would the hon. Minister comment on the report of a grand jury describing conditions at the Ontario Hospital, 999 Queen Street, Toronto?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Speaker, the grand jury reported that there was overcrowding. They spoke of fire hazards and they spoke of the old buildings and they spoke of sanitary facilities. Overcrowding does exist in the Ontario hospitals serving Metropolitan Toronto; there are two of them. The capacity of the two hospitals is 1,875 patients and the patient load is 2,200, or 20 per cent more than rated capacity. However, Mr. Speaker, this exists because we have to house and maintain a large number of people as residents; patients who have been discharged from hospital when they no longer need treatment; who have no homes, and for whom their home community cannot apparently provide a place to live.

In the Queen Street hospital, the one to which the hon. member referred, there are 344 such residents, 331 of whom give their home address as Metro Toronto. In New Toronto, there are 426 such residents; 207 of these give their home address as Metro Toronto. Thus, in the two hospitals, we have 538 residents of Metro Toronto who are now being housed in residential units of these two Ontario hospitals and are not patients in any sense of the word whatsoever.

However, we have known of this for some time, and have tried every means possible to get these people back into their home communities; but apparently this is not possible. So, to correct the situation, steps have already been taken and are in hand.

One hundred and seventy additional hospital beds are being provided in the new psychiatric institute now under construction on College Street. And there is a bill presently before this Legislature, designed, as already announced, to authorize The Department of Health to find homes for special care so that those now in our institutions as residents only can be housed in other and more suitable accommodation, thus releasing the hospital facilities for their proper use.

As to the fire hazard, sir, I have to advise you that the fire department of the city of Toronto inspect our hospital regularly, this one at Queen Street. In the last report signed by the fire chief, Frank G. E. Coakwell, no mention is made of a fire hazard. Certain routine matters are brought to our attention, such as reminding us to check for drop in pressure in pressurized water pipe extinguishers, and to be sure that no combustible material is put anywhere near a fire—the usual warning things. Our own fire inspector, who works in very close harmony with the fire marshal's division, in his latest report, states as follows:

The principal hazard throughout this institution, in all buildings except the new one, is still wood floors. Apart from this, the building is in good condition and the general housekeeping excellent.

I therefore feel, sir, that it is rather unfortunate that any grand jury would state that the building was structurally a fire hazard. All of our hospitals, as well as these two, are under the fire marshal's supervision and we have within the department a permanent staff of fire inspectors who are carefully and at frequent intervals inspecting all our buildings.

Therefore I do not believe I am wrong in suggesting that it is a great disservice to many who have relatives, friends or members of families in our hospitals, to lead them to believe that their safety has been ignored in the manner suggested. It is quite true, sir, that part of the building is old and, as Controller Dennison said on the radio this morning, part of this building was built some 20 years before Confederation. But when I think of this, I think of the great old institutions scattered throughout this world of ours, sir, not only in Canada, but far beyond our bounds, many of them outstanding institutions still in our day, old as far as years and the calendar may go, but youthful in outlook. I have to repeat what I have so often said in this House and other places that it is not the age of the building nor the structure of it but the programme that is going on inside the building that matters. In Ontario hospitals that is of high quality and most progressive.

In respect of sanitary facilities, if the residents of Queen Street were hospital patients in the usually accepted context, it would be quite fair to say that more toilet space and baths, and so on, would be needed. But these are all ambulatory residents, people capable of and permitted to go anywhere in the building and therefore are able to find adequate sanitary facilities at all times.

In summary, therefore, I think it should be made clear that no treatment is needed by nor is being given to those residents in these hospitals. Indeed the areas which they occupy are no longer actually part of the hospital but are by law designated as residential units and, I repeat, are used only because no one else appears willing or anxious to provide housing and food for those who formerly were patients suffering from mental disorders.

I would remind you and the House, Mr. Speaker, that a large part of The Department of Public Works budget is spent annually on updating and providing new accommodation for the Ontario hospitals. Over the past five years, this has been in excess of $70 million and has in that time provided almost 5,000 new beds.

Mr. S. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, will the hon. Minister allow a supplementary question?

Accepting the comments on accommodation and fire hazard, is the hon. Minister in a professional capacity suggesting that because of ambulatory patients it then becomes justifiable that 80 men on one floor should share four toilets, two showers and two bathtubs?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: I have no further comment to make, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MacDonald: My question, Mr. Speaker, is to the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Stewart).

Can the hon. Minister inform the House when a decision will be made by the milk industry board with regard to the discriminatory practices of the West Side Dairy in Kitchener?

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I can advise the hon. member that this matter is under active consideration by the milk industry board. I am advised that a special meeting is being held by the milk industry board in the very near future at which the producers may be in attendance as well.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The twenty-ninth order, House in committee of supply; Mr. W. G. Noden in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: On vote 501:

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education): Mr. Chairman, perhaps at this time while these matters are still fresh in my mind, I might reply to some of the matters raised by the hon. members for Brant (Mr. Nixon) and York South (Mr. MacDonald) in their speeches yesterday evening.

I want to say at the outset that I appreciate the constructive nature of their remarks last evening and I want to assure them that I shall very carefully study the suggestions that have been made.

Both of these learned gentlemen made mention of the foundation plan, the hon. member for York South dealing with a certain article written in the Toronto Daily Star by Mr. Allan, and also making some reference to the complexities of the foundation plan in this province. I have had prepared a very short statement which I am distributing to the hon. members outlining some of the reasons for the complexity of this plan so that they may be more fully aware of the problems that are facing those responsible for the establishment of this type of foundation plan here in this province.

I think many of you are familiar with some of the factors that led to the complexity of the foundation plan. The number of boards alone, of course, is one of the very important features. The number of areas of education—public, separate, vocational, academic, continuation—and the differences between the urban and the rural boards are all complicating factors as well.

While I appreciate that some of us may regard the regulations as being difficult to understand, I think if the hon. members will peruse this document—and I will not read it to them in detail this afternoon, it will be provided to them—they will get some appreciation of the factors that are involved in implementing a plan of this kind. I think, quite frankly, that we should be rather grateful to the gentlemen who worked so hard to draw up the regulations and lay the basic foundation for the new plan. I think if you could compare it, and it is very difficult to do so, with other foundation plans in other jurisdictions, you would find that perhaps more thought and consideration have gone into the development of this plan than perhaps that of any other jurisdiction, certainly in Canada, and I think it compares very favourably with areas elsewhere.

I would also agree with the hon. member for York South that we will have to wait perhaps until the plan has been in operation a year to evaluate properly the effects on the boards. But I would like to give you some indication from various parts of the province as to the reaction to the foundation plan, at least to date.

From the Niagara Falls Evening Review:

The Niagara Falls, Chippawa and Wilmoughby taxpayers will pay less for education this year. The reduction, made despite an increase in the budget approved Wednesday by Niagara Falls district board of education, is brought about by increased provincial grants.

Woodstock:

Reduction of separate school tax rates was made possible this year because of a big increase in provincial grants.

The Windsor Star:

Of the estimated revenue, it is expected that $1,982,000 will come from the Provincial Treasurer in grants and for use of the schools for practice teaching by Windsor teachers college students.

The anticipated $1,982,00 in grants, if realized, will be $325,000 more than the amount received in the 1963 budget.

Fort William:

Largely due to increased provincial assistance the higher cost of education in Fort William will barely be felt at the municipal level and in property taxes.

The North Bay Nugget, which I am sure will be of interest to the hon. member for that area (Mr. Troy):

SEPARATE SCHOOL TAX REDUCED AT STURGEON

The Kingston paper has the same story. From the Brantford Expositor, which I am sure is of some interest to the hon. member for Brant:

Brantford's education tax rates this year are down 1.5 mills for industrial and commercial and down 1.35 mills for residential and farm.

The total cost of education in Brantford is up more than $444,000 but because of higher provincial grants the $2,525,000 which must come from municipal tax represents a drop of some $50,500 from last year's actual levy.

The same story from Sarnia is in the Sarnia Observer:

The Sarnia board of education chairman, Brian Woodside, has been able to pare commitments to a level which in 1964 will allow for a slight reduction in the mill rate for educational purposes while still providing for sound educational organization.

Mr. Woodside said that increased grants from The Ontario Department of Education assisted considerably in the board's deliberations.

Once again, the North Bay paper:

In 1964 the separate school mill rate took a sharp drop at the North Bay separate school board's budget meeting Thursday night.

There are other references, Mr. Chairman, from North Bay, Peterborough, Welland, Windsor—two more from Windsor, including the separate school board, and Napanee.

The best impression we can get to date is that the foundation plan is working effectively throughout the province, in both the separate and public school system.

I would be the first to acknowledge that there will still be some problems to be solved. You cannot introduce a plan of this magnitude and of this complexity without facing some difficulties. But, at the same time, I think we should accept the fact that this, as a matter of principle, is sound; and that if we can work the principle into concrete regulations, which I believe we have done, we will be serving the interests of the educational programme in this province as equitably as possible.

I should also like to refer for just a brief moment to the observations made by the hon. member for York South in respect to the article that appeared in the Toronto Daily Star. I hold the writer in very high regard in educational matters. I read him very carefully and, while we obviously do not always agree, there are many occasions when he has been most helpful to the cause of education in this province; but when it comes to the matter of the Ontario Foundation Tax Plan, then with some of his observations I think, Mr. Chairman, in fairness, I should make some comment.

Mr. Allan, when he was assessing the implications of the foundation plans, certainly very early in the period when it was being considered, suggested, as I recall and I am going primarily from memory, that the possibility of a foundation plan in this province was somewhat limited. I can recall another editorial, sometime in November or December, I believe, when he suggested we should dispose of the computers—I am not sure that Mr. Allan wrote it but it was certainly in the Toronto Daily Star—and that the gentlemen calculating should sharpen their pencils and go to work.

However, I think we have been able to establish by the early printing of the regulations that the computers were, in fact, somewhat helpful.

Mr. Allan's article was, in many respects, quite helpful but in others perhaps he did not take into account one of the very basic principles of the foundation plan: that it is referring to current rather than to capital operations. And when we refer to the total costs and are drawing a figure, say, of $210, this refers to current cost. If you average this out, say, for a classroom of 35 pupils at $210, it amounts to $7,350 per classroom; this represents current operations alone. Since the average public school salary in 1962 was roughly something under $5,000, including principals, and under $5,500 even in the cities, it would appear that there should be sufficient left over to operate each classroom on a fairly generous scale.

In referring to the higher levels, and the suggestion that we should be establishing this basis at a higher level—I think he used the figures in North York—I referred in my statement that we had to be very careful about the financial time-bombs inherent in such a foundation plan. These figures, of course, are very rough and subject to correction, but if we use the North York figures as the basic level it is conceivable that the amount of increase in grants to this province in 1964 alone could be close to $240 million, which is rather substantial. It applies in the same way as when you add 65 cents, just 65 cents, say, to the $210 limit per pupil, you are adding $1 million approximately in grants.

I think you will find, Mr. Chairman, that if you study this in all its ramifications and assess some of the problems which are raised, and if we look at the operation of this plan over this year—and we can debate this more fully a year hence—I think you will find that the Ontario Foundation Tax Plan for 1964 is fairly substantially based and is, in fact, distributing money in a very equitable way across this province.

I hope that hon. members will read the observations which are made about the complexities of the scheme, so that when we do debate this, I hope, next year at some length, after we have had an observation period, we will be able to deal with this matter in some detail.

The hon. member for York South raised two or three interesting points—and I am going backward rather than forward in that these points are perhaps fresher in my mind. One point he raised, of course, was this question of priorities. Late last evening I re-read, which made rather dreary reading, my speech on the estimates of last year and I would suggest to him that I also used this term “priorities” in that speech on several occasions. I could not agree more that it is very definitely a case of priorities in this province and, in fact, in Canada today.

It is obvious, at least in my mind, and I am sure that hon. members of this House would agree, that first priority must be in the field of education. I think this was obvious at the federal-provincial conference which I attended a few weeks ago when, as far as many of the provinces were concerned, their feeling was that the first priority today was in the field of education.

I would comment very briefly on the figures given by the hon. member in respect to the brief presented to the federal government, which illustrated that Ontario was spending less per capita than the other provinces. These figures, Mr. Chairman, are very difficult to assemble. The figures for Ontario may or may not include certain expenditures in the separate school system. They are figures related to 1961 and you can see that in 1964 we have increased, just through the grants alone, roughly 20 per cent to 25 per cent. It also does not include, as I stated last evening, any consideration of the technical or vocational programme here in this province.

Nevertheless I would agree with the hon. member completely, Mr. Chairman, that whether we are in fact now above the other provinces, or on a par, this perhaps is not sufficient. I would suggest to you that not only is it necessary to spend more on education but that the very future of this province will depend on the amount this society is prepared to spend.

I think in these areas, Mr. Chairman, while we may not agree on the actual figures presented last evening, we do agree on the matter of principle.

I would also suggest to the hon. member for Brant, who raised the question of the teachers' salaries in the separate school system, that while I cannot say this conclusively, I would suggest that one of the problems these schools have had in obtaining competent people has been the question of salary.

I can give you a reference to the Ottawa board. I had a very kind letter from the Ottawa separate school board which indicated they were able to reduce their mill rate this year in that city by two mills and, at the same time, offer an increase in salary to the people on their staff. I think the foundation plan will go a long way toward assisting the separate school boards in this province in obtaining capable staff. I cannot tell you if this is the sole reason, but it very definitely has been one of the contributing factors.

Dealing with another matter raised last evening, the question of this committee of inquiry, this question of educational research; I intend to make a very brief statement about research in education, perhaps during the consideration of the estimates of OCE, because this is really where the research branch, to a degree, is centred. I will relate to you some of the other areas of research in which the department is involved. But I agree with both hon. members who mentioned this, that we should be doing more in research. Yet, at the same time, when I make my remarks during this part of the estimates on OCE, you will see that perhaps there is more widespread research going on in education than most people are aware of.

inquiry which would, I gather, be a committee of a continuing nature, to review certain aspects of our educational programme. It certainly indicates that the hon. member is concerned, as I think we all are, about a sort of overall look at education. It is certainly a suggestion which one cannot pass over lightly.

I would relate to you that the consideration of the effectiveness of the Robarts plan, or the reorganized programme, in the secondary schools, is of course receiving our attention. It is very difficult at this point, with the programme operating only in Grades 9 and 10, to come to any type of conclusion today, other than that the programme we feel is more effective than originally we had hoped, certainly as far as numbers are concerned. But obviously the fact that a larger percentage of the student population is availing itself of the technical or commercial stream, is not in itself conclusive proof that the programme is 100 per cent effective. I can see two or three areas where we will have problems. One is in the very early part of the programme, with the selection of courses. This gives me concern. Of course, I think towards the end of the programme, in Grade 12 and what may happen relating to Grade 13, is another area to which we must give careful consideration. Yet, quite frankly, I cannot tell you at this time that we are in a position to assess the programme in its entirety, and I do not think we will be in this position perhaps for another two years—I would say roughly this period of time.

The hon. member also raised the problem of drop-outs. He raised it perhaps more in relation to what was going on in the technical schools and yet perhaps it is related, to a degree, Mr. Chairman, to what we are attempting to do in the youth branch. The youth branch, when we initially established it, was, quite frankly, a nebulous sort of a branch. The gentleman who is directing it, Dr. Koerber, is a very knowledgeable man, I think we would all agree, in this field. Our problem is going to be to try to ascertain which areas we should pursue. I think this question of drop-outs throughout the entire system—is one that we will obviously consider. It is one that has to be considered apart from, as well as from, the educational standpoint. I think there is far more involved here, as the hon. member mentioned last night. I think to a degree it becomes a social problem.

I am dealing with these points perhaps too briefly, and yet I realize if we want to cover this department within some reasonable amount of time, that I cannot go into the detail I would like. The question of the post-secondary problems in technical education was also raised last evening. Without getting into the debate at this time about the principle of having the new branch or department looking after universities alone, certainly at first, I think, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member really answered his own query, at least to a degree, as to why perhaps this department should not consider the other areas of post-secondary education. I want to assure the hon. member that I think there are very few individuals who have spent more time in this past year attempting to tell the people, particularly the parents of this province, that technical education is not second-degree education, than the Minister of Education. I assure you that as far as I am concerned, post-secondary education at the technical level will not be considered as second-degree education.

The hon. member also raised the problem of the lack of expansion of our facilities. He referred to the Deutsch report, sir, which touched on this very briefly. It used the figure of 18,000 and if you will excuse the terminology, I would suggest that maybe Deutsch has used a very conservative figure when he came to that conclusion. I think it could be substantially more than that. He also refers to institutes of technology and I think he has not really assessed the whole field of post-secondary education in any detail, except as it concerns the universities.

I want to make it very clear that the vocational centres are going to become a very important facet of post-secondary education in this province. They will take graduates of any four-year branch in the secondary schools. Their courses will be related to the courses at the institutes of technology. If you take, say, a technician's course at the vocational centres, you can receive credit after a two-year course there for one year in the institutes of technology in this province. We are making a very concerted effort to relate the programmes in technical education at the secondary level with our vocational centres and with our institutes of technology. These vocational centres, Mr. Chairman, and perhaps I should have made this plainer during the last two or three months to the House, are something quite different in concept. This is why the name has been changed. These three new vocational centres that are being opened in London in September, and Ottawa in September, and in Sault Ste. Marie the following September, will be in a position to accommodate a large number of these students that my hon. friend is concerned about and very rightly so.

No consideration was given in the figures that were mentioned last night by both hon. members, to the probability of at least Ryerson and perhaps the other institutes of technology and the vocational centres operating on something other than a one-semester system. I will not go into detail with all the figures here this afternoon, but assuming the possibilities of night school accommodation and the tri-semester system by 1965 in the institutes of technology and vocational centres, both those now existing or under construction with day and evening students, we have potential accommodation for roughly 26,500 students. By 1967—and this is three years earlier, I think, than what Deutsch has suggested, sir—with day and evening students, and this does not include the tri-semester system which, I suggest to you, I can perhaps deal with in more detail when we get around to Ryerson, we conceivably will have accommodation for roughly 46,000 students.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Mr. Chairman, would the hon. Minister permit a question at this point?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Yes.

Mr. Nixon: I was wondering if he feels that evening accommodation is really on a comparable basis with what the Deutsch committee had in mind? People who might go in for a two-hour course in the evening cannot really be said to be receiving education on the same plane as those taking the regular course. I would also like to ask the hon. Minister what the average number of students accommodated in the vocational centres will be. He says they are opening three. What would their average accommodation be?

Hon. Mr. Davis: The average accommodation could be, say 1,000, but I think, to be frank about it at this point, we should say 800 to 900 in all three vocational centres. The one we are planning for Welland will accommodate perhaps between 400 and 500 and the new one for Hamilton will be in the neighbourhood of 800.

Mr. Chairman, I am not suggesting that the evening courses correspond necessarily to the day courses at all and I am not sure what the Deutsch report was considering when it was referring to institutes of technology, but evening courses are, however, part of the whole field of post-secondary education, outside of the university area. I notice that Dr. Bissell very recently, and I was going to mention this on the debate on university affairs, suggested that one of our solutions might lie in community colleges, which we have been studying for the past year. I shall have something to say about this during the estimates of The Department of University Affairs. There was no spelling out really of what type of course, or the length of course, or whether it be a day or evening class, and the type of community college that Dr. Bissell might envisage.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that really one of the great problems facing us is this whole field of post-secondary education and how it is treated. I can assure the hon. members opposite that while these figures do not represent what you might call the type of accommodation that Deutsch has referred to, nonetheless I think they indicate that there will be substantial accommodation with our existing plans for this type of class or this type of course by 1965 and even more so by 1967. The hon. member for York South was concerned that we were not perhaps paying sufficient attention to this type of accommodation. I want to assure him that this is not the case. We are very definitely concerned and I think we are making some real progress in this regard.

With respect to the other area—and this is programme five—I would be less than frank if I did not admit that when the programme was first started it was something of a crash programme. I would admit there was some organized confusion. I think you would be interested to know that in the article that the hon. member referred to last evening of the roughly 1,000 drop-outs, while we cannot say this conclusively, NES and the department people through the co-ordinator have attempted to find out just what happened to many of these drop-outs. Our estimate is that close to 80 per cent of those who left before their training course was completed did receive employment. Now this to me is a rather encouraging figure, yet at the same time it does not solve the whole problem of retraining or upgrading under programme five, and what I hope will become even more important under programme four.

I am not one of those who are unrealistic enough to believe that we can dispense with programme five. I think programme five, in some form or other, is with us for a number of years. And yet, at the same time, we in the department are endeavouring to place greater emphasis on programme four—this is the retraining or training within industry before people become unemployed. We would like to think that this is a better way of treating this problem and this is where we will concentrate our efforts.

With the exception of the school here in Toronto, we have had, quite frankly, very few complaints as to the general nature of the courses. The figures indicate that something over 80 per cent of programme five trainees have obtained employment in other centres throughout the province. The employment rate of the Toronto school has been close to 84 per cent, and yet at the same time I would not say to the hon. members that the programme there represents perfection. I think this is another area which we must determine very shortly, that is whether we are to have a permanent type of adult education centre for the retraining, upgrading of this group of our people. I think, quite frankly, this is a decision which will have to be made fairly shortly.

The programme is functioning reasonably well, but I think we must have some degree of permanence, or at least some attitude as to what the future holds for this type of programme here in this province. This is a matter, Mr. Chairman, which is receiving very careful consideration at this moment. I hope that perhaps some time in the future we can discuss this at greater length.

Mr. Nixon: I wonder if the hon. Minister might permit another question? Would he care to comment on the difficulties in the programme five work in the Windsor area now, or might we ask about that later in the estimates?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I think perhaps if the hon. member would like to ask about the difficulties in the programme five area in Windsor, perhaps we could do this under the vote for the technical education branch. This would be the appropriate place. Or I would be very pleased to answer any question he might have now, but the other might be a more appropriate place to do so.

Dealing with the other matters—the uncertainty to which the hon. member referred, the goals of education, the techniques, the philosophy of education—these are matters, Mr. Chairman, of a very general nature and of a very important nature. I think it is an area which should give us all concern and one which I think we should explore at greater length. It is very difficult, in limited debates like this, to deal with the philosophy of education, to establish a set of goals for the educational programme in this province, but I think it is certainly worthwhile that these matters should at least be mentioned and that we realize their great importance.

Dealing with some of the suggestions of the hon. member for Brant on the question of curriculum, I can recall similar statements made in his speech last year to this question of a core curriculum. I have spent some considerable time discussing this with our own officials, and people in the profession out in the field. I am told that we have some form or degree of a core curriculum in the elementary school but that at the secondary level a core curriculum, if I understand it the way the hon. member was explaining it last evening, would perhaps to a degree defeat the purpose we are attempting to achieve under the Robarts plan.

I am concerned that such a type of core curriculum might leave us in a position which is not flexible enough for this day and age. I think, if I can recall correctly, the report on automation, and the manpower training report, would further indicate that this type of programme, a very flexible one, is one we need certainly for a good number of our students. However, I can assure the hon. member that we have listened carefully to his suggestions; they have not been overlooked; they have been discussed with other people and certainly will be kept in mind.

Dealing with this question of history, I certainly have made note of his suggestion that we do not neglect minorities in our consideration of these areas of history in this province. Certainly, when he is referring to a particular minority I concur.

The development of this textbook for centennial projects—I certainly shall keep that in mind. I, of course, was pleased to hear him suggest that it should be nicely bound and that he was not suggesting this be in paperback form.

Mr. Nixon: It has to last for 100 years.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I think this is very commendable, Mr. Chairman.

Now, in regard to the question of Grade 13; I think there perhaps is little purpose in my commenting on this aspect of education at this time. A committee is studying this at some length. I shall certainly make available to them a copy of Hansard containing the observations of my hon. friend with respect to this particular problem; but I think there would be no purpose, Mr. Chairman, in dealing with this at any length on this particular occasion.

On the question of textbooks, which was raised also by the hon. member for Brant, I should make one thing very clear. I did at one time state that I would be pleased to see us consider education as a matter apart from politics if possible. I should like to make it very clear that this matter of the design conference was planned, and I think announced in letters written asking the boards to send representatives, prior to any date for the election being announced. The reason I recall this is because I happen to represent a riding which, some few months earlier, went very strongly the other direction. It was my hope to spend considerable time in my riding, and I assure you that I would not have planned a conference roughly three weeks before the election if I had known of it myself.

On the question of the textbooks, Mr. Chairman, I want to assure the hon. member that the policy was not announced in a speech at any political gathering. As a matter of fact, it was suggested to two or three reporters from the Toronto papers who were educational writers, in some room down the hall here and not on any political platform.

Mr. Nixon: And that takes it out of politics?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well, it does to a degree, Mr. Chairman.

But dealing with the question of textbooks, the hon. member made the observation that this imposes some burden on the boards. He will be interested to know that the amount suggested by the trustees' council for the province was exactly the same amount as the government has agreed to pay the boards; except we are paying them, this year, $12 initially rather than $6. While there is no doubt, this first year, that it will impose some financial burden on the boards and may be a continuing burden, in the technical or commercial courses, assuming the life expectancy of a textbook would be three to four years it is quite conceivable that the policy will impose no financial burden on the boards whatsoever.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. Minister would permit me, I do not suppose there is any way of calculating the percentage of the cost which would be the local responsibility? It would depend on how they would want to allocate their money.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well, I think it does. I think, Mr. Chairman, it is very difficult. The costs vary across the province, as the hon. member knows. But I remember some figures, even from a Toronto board, which estimated that in the technical or vocational courses their per student cost was roughly $14 to $15, whereas in the academic field it was somewhere around $24.

Assuming that the book is going to last three years this means you have $18 invested in the one student, which means that in the technical or vocational courses the boards perhaps have a slight bonus; in the academic courses it may be that they will have to add $2 or $3 per student. We do not know. Of course on top of this, there is no question about this, the administrative cost will be absorbed by the board. This will not be substantial but nonetheless it gives them some financial interest which, I think, in the area of trying to create some uniformity in purchasing certainly within board areas, is certainly desirable.

I think the hon. member also mentioned the question of educational television. While this will come up later in the estimates, I want to assure the hon. member that at no time did I, intentionally, and I do not think otherwise, refer to educational television as an expensive gimmick.

Mr. Nixon: I thought the hon. Minister's reaction indicated that he so regarded it.

Hon. Mr. Davis: No. I do not know where the hon. member would get this, because we have made a very careful study of educational television and I have visited two or three other jurisdictions for this prime purpose. I can assure the hon. member that I see the potentials of educational television as fully as he may himself see them. I also see some of the financial problems.

I have also run into some of the inherent weaknesses in educational television, and I can say to the hon. members of this House that when The Department of Education embarks on an educational television programme or system, in conjunction with any other agencies, it will have to be a good one before I personally become involved.

I have run into two or three jurisdictions where they went too rapidly with educational television and where perhaps they did the medium more harm than good.

Mr. Nixon: But you are not going too rapidly, I will agree.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well, I agree—at least I can see the hon. member would not think we are moving too rapidly, but at the same time I want to assure him that we are making progress. I think I have the names of the personnel of the advisory committee somewhere here in my notes. I think the hon. member would be interested in knowing who they are. Perhaps when we get along to the vote itself on this particular part of the estimates I can tell you a little more about the personnel.

Mr. Stewart, of course, of The Department of Education, the deputy Minister, is the chairman of the committee. From the CBC we have Dr. Rainsberry and Mr. Fotheringham, and from CFTO and CTV, Mr. Cook. We have Dr. Kerr, and I refer to him because I shall mention certain aspects of television that interest me at Ryerson, when we get around to the Ryerson estimates. There are, of course, representatives from the various educational agencies, and Dr. Ivey from the University of Toronto.

So you can see that this is not an advisory committee just to bring us up to date on what is happening in other jurisdictions. This is a committee composed of individuals who are genuinely interested in the development of educational television. I am reasonably optimistic about what results they may come up with.

Mr. Nixon: When was the committee set up?

Hon. Mr. Davis: The committee was set up and held its first meeting on March 12 of this year. I could outline the duties very briefly to you: to advise the Minister on the development of educational television in Ontario schools; to propose specific series of Ontario telecasts to meet the needs of the schools of this province; to advise the Minister on policy problems associated with the development of ETV programmes—and I can assure you there are some problems; and to encourage teacher training in the effective production, presentation and utilization of ETV programmes. While, Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the hon. member will feel, as he said, we are not moving too rapidly, I want him to be fully aware of the fact that the Minister and the department, Mr. Chairman, are very definitely concerned with the development of educational TV in the province. But we are also concerned that it be developed in a way that will be appropriate and of some real value to the schools in this province.

Mr. Chairman, I think I have, I hope, touched on most of the items raised by the two hon. members last evening in their general remarks. Perhaps if I have failed to do so, they will bring them up in a more specific way during the consideration of the entire estimates.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I may ask one general question. I see it is tidier to deal with it on the specific estimates, but with regard to my suggestion of a continuing committee of inquiry, the hon. Minister rather skillfully went around that topic without coming to grips with it. I raise it again because in Great Britain, for example, the whole Robbins report at the university level has pointed out that in the past there was no plan at all. I am sure that we had no plan until the advisory committee got into the picture, and there are growing doubts as to what its role should be and whether it is the appropriate body. Certainly the university presidents in the so-called Deutsch report clearly indicated that the first requirement was an analysis of the whole field and what we should be doing in it.

In other words, if the Robbins report is any guide we should be having that kind of job done at the university level. It has been indicated to us clearly that we needed it at the post-secondary level for technical work. There are all these problems throughout the whole university field.

What about the proposition of a continuing committee to co-ordinate all the bits and pieces of research and fill in the gaps?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I think I said—and I do not know that I can use the same phraseology again—that the suggestion made by the hon. member is one that cannot be passed over lightly. I think that the advisory committee, such as the Robbins committee, of course was dealing with a specific problem that had not been dealt with before, really, by any governmental agency before that—at least not recently in Great Britain.

We have had committees studying various features of both the elementary and secondary programmes here in the province and I am not sure that the committee of inquiry is really the proper terminology. Perhaps some overall committee on educational planning would be better. As I say, Mr. Chairman, this is an area that certainly will not be overlooked in consideration of my hon. friend's remarks.

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence (Russell): Mr. Chairman, I assure the hon. members that my remarks will be very brief this afternoon. I want to address those remarks to one broad field of education which I submit requires continuing attention, debate and action by the people of this province and of the House and of the government itself.

I am speaking, sir, of the field of post-secondary post-high-school education. For the purposes of these remarks, I might describe it as senior education and define senior as including all those of our people who have reached or are close to the age of 18.

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. I have no desire to curtail the remarks of my hon. friend, but it is a general rule and an understanding that there be one speaker from each party in the House to make preliminary and rather exhaustive remarks over the whole broad field of education and that then the votes be called one by one and hon. members speak according to the vote as it is called. My hon. friend is not speaking, as I understand it, directly to the vote. I ask your ruling on it, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence: May I reply to the hon. gentleman, Mr. Chairman? My thought in answer to this was concern. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that on any other item in the estimates we are dealing with particular grants, and particular institutions having again particular responsibilities. The remarks which I wish to make this afternoon, will be very brief, and deal with many, many—

Mr. Chairman: Order! I feel that this should come under vote 504.

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Chairman: Order! The member for Woodbine will speak first.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): I am sorry, Mr. Chairman. I was going to defer to the hon. member for Nipissing.

Mr. Troy: Thank you, very much. I think my comments will be on the vote in question, 501, because there is a reference in 501 to research, and the only research that I see listed is research in schools construction.

The hon. Minister said he would talk on research later under the Ontario College of Education. I notice the whole vote for that particular institution is $1.9 million. Consider what has been done in other departments of the province in research: I see in the civil service there is $50,000 for pay research; in Lands and Forests $733,000; in northern Ontario development $760,000 from The Department of Economics and Development; the Ontario Research Foundation $1 million; again in Economics and Development; something else in another branch $98,000; in the Department of Tourism and Information $80,500. It seems to me the amounts in Education are just very minor amounts when we consider that the most important branch of government here, at least the one that requires the most amount of money, is this Department of Education.

We have heard reference made to the part that the so-called Robarts plan is playing in the educational process in this province. We just have to hark back to the days when that was put into effect and the very strong and trenchant criticism we had from educators and industry and commerce and labour that this particular departure was made without very much research. I have in front of me an article from The Rotarian with the heading "I Predict". In the foreword it says:

Forecasting the shape of tomorrow seems a risky business. In fact, tomorrow in its many forms is already in men's minds and on the drawing boards.

The hon. Minister of Economics and Development (Mr. Randall) is not here today, but I am sure if he was here he would endorse my remarks and would say that industry in this country, industry in any part of the world, has only developed and increased because of research. We can take the great oil companies—and the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Knox) knows how much the Imperial Oil Company has spent on research. They have got some of the best brains in the nation there. And why? Just so they can make better products so they can sell more of their line. It is the same way with all the other great companies across this land.

We in education have done very little on research. The hon. Minister has spoken about this committee on inquiry. The hon. member for York South has questioned it. Certainly we should have a continuing committee on research in all its forms so that, as it says in this article, we may have on the drawing boards the things needed in education and project what is going to happen, not tomorrow, not next year, but what is going to happen in five and ten years from now.

It seems to me that when a budget reaches $400 million and more, a small amount to spend on research would be $10 million. It may not be necessary that the government itself provide the $10 million. I am sure industry would co-operate with this research branch, I am sure that labour would, I am sure that commerce would. Also, there should be co-ordination in research with the federal government, with other provinces, with the very advanced research they are doing in the United States. These are some of the things that we need to know about.

The effect in the United States, they say, is going to be a 30-hour week in a very short time. Over here I do not know how long it will take to get that, although all the while they are working at 30 hours in industry, the teacher will still be working his 60-hour week regardless of how far we advance.

Then there are the other questions; the programmed learning, for example. And the hon. Minister mentioned the use of television. We already have research on the construction of schools. Then there is the use of leisure time and adult education. All these things are going to be very serious matters in the future.

I recall when I was at the conference of education, that is the Canadian conference in Montreal, the particular section on which I sat in had to do with manpower training. The great question there was the effect of guidance on the pupils, particularly guidance in their elementary schools. The important thing is that a guidance teacher must know something about the world of work. I will not say this refers to all our guidance teachers, but some of them may have never gotten a little bit of callous on their hands. But they must know something of the world of work.

Another thing is that the number of white collar workers is going to increase. How much emphasis should we give on the business and commerce branch in our secondary schools?

Then also, there is knowing what the dickens we are training for!

I recall at that conference the representative, I think he was a very prominent official of the Council of Labour in British Columbia, pointed out that they were retraining people in British Columbia at that time and one of the trades on which they were retraining was plumbing. Well, plumbers were a dime a dozen, there was a surplus on the market for plumbers. It is the same thing as the hon. member for Woodbine has said about welders, there is a surplus.

What are the jobs of the future? Again, should we be training in specialized skills; or should we just have one training for a basic skill so that the worker can be flexible and maybe as he goes on the next 20, 25, 30 years he will have to be retrained, as I think probably somebody has mentioned, at least a dozen times.

I have a note here. This is a report of the select committee on manpower training, and I read:

The inadequate state of our knowledge in these respects, that is to the projections and the forecasts of the future, what the trends will be, is most unfortunate.

As a committee we have felt the need for more definite information about these matters over and over again. We know that those who have had to make vital decisions with regard to the allocation of our resources in the field of education and training have felt this need much more so than ourselves. We commend them for having the courage to make decisions which they have to make in the absence of adequate information. We wonder, however, how long they can go on doing this before an unwitting but drastic misallocation of resources occurs.

Then there is a separate chapter on research. The heading is:

A NEGLECTED BUT VITAL NEED

The deficient state of our information in various aspects and in other respects must be quickly overcome if we are to have any hope of developing and maintaining sound programmes to prepare our labour force for the challenges of the future.

Then it continues:

FORECASTING CHANGE IN THE NATURE AND COMPOSITION OF THE LABOUR FORCE

A paramount question which every government should be asking itself, and certainly every government in Canada, the federal government as well as the provincial jurisdictions, they should be asking and trying to find an answer to, on a systematic and continuing basis: what are the current and future needs of the economy for trained manpower?

So then, that committee on research should be a continuing one. As I say, in a budget of $422 million, we certainly should be spending millions on research. Not only people from The Department of Education, not only the professors from the Ontario College of Education—I know that Professor Jackson has made exceptional progress in research and we have others working on research—but also the effort must be from industry, it must be from commerce. This is the recommendation of my hon. friend from Dovercourt (Mr. Thompson) who was a very important member of that committee, and I read:

A responsibility for research, this sort of co-operation is also required on the part of various departments within the provincial government which have a legitimate interest in the field of manpower research. Here are three departments involved: Labour, Education and Economics and Development. How they should decide to divide up their responsibilities in this area, is not of fundamental importance. But what is more essential—the sentence goes on:

—is the need for them to sit down together at the operating level, agree on what information they should develop and get on with it. But aside from the matter of forecasting, the bulk of the responsibility would seem to lie with The Department of Education.

I could continue reading at length here, but no doubt you have read this report over and over again. I am sure your deputy Ministers, and particularly the new director you have, are aware of all this. Again it was something which, after the first conference on education in 1958, we presented to The Department of Education, to the then Minister, our recommendations on the trades training programme, on the fact that you should have a director. Three years after the recommendations were put to The Department of Education it comes into effect, at least is projected; and then only recently, only a few months ago, we have the director.

But, sir, there will be others who will be speaking on various topics under the various headings; and I strongly urge the hon. Minister to recommend strongly to the Cabinet, to the Executive Council and to the Treasury board, that millions be put into research. I would say possibly an amount of $10 million, with the co-operation of industry.

May I conclude these remarks on this particular subject saying, as Dr. Wilder T. Penfield said not long ago, that there is no limit to the uses to which men may put their talents. We have research by all nations, even by our own country, in how to get things into space, in guessing what there is beyond; but what Dr. Penfield also said at one time is:

"We are looking the way to the moon, but we still do not know very much about the human mind."

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, in replying to that, actually I intended to deal with research at some length under the vote for OCE because this is where, at least to a degree, the research of The Department of Education is centred. The budget for the department of educational research at the Ontario College of Education, which serves as the main research branch of the department, is by itself in excess of $450,000 for the current fiscal year. To this sum—and I am taking research in the very broad aspect, and I think you must in the field of education—must be added, within the college, a substantial portion of the funds provided for graduate studies in education.

Research is done by staff, and by candidates for the Master of Education and Doctor of Education degrees, but a fraction of the budget for the regular teacher-education programme must be added to cover the cost of experiments and studies in the University of Toronto Schools and in the teachers courses. These amounts are part of the budget for the Ontario College of Education, which is submitted to the government of the University of Toronto, and the total budget for the Ontario College of Education is paid by The Department of Education.

During the past current year the department made grants in excess of $70 million to the universities. The amount for the last five years totals $200 million. These funds are used, not only for teaching purposes, but for research and the scholarly production of knowledge. Certainly substantial sums should be credited towards educational research directly, or in related studies and fields such as psychology, social work and economics. While these activities are not itemized in any of the specific reports of my department, an indication of their scope may be secured in—and I am sure the hon. member reads this regularly—the survey of educational research for the province, published from time to time for the Ontario Educational Research Council in the Ontario Journal of Educational Research. I am sure the hon. member is familiar with this. Incidentally, the publication of the journal is subsidized to a considerable extent by The Department of Education.

Support is also given directly to students, through the miscellaneous grants, bursaries and scholarships, for study and for research. The Ontario graduate fellowship programme is an outstanding example of this, Mr. Chairman.

In addition to our participation, directly and indirectly, in the activities of the Ontario Educational Research Council and the Metropolitan Toronto Educational Research Council, some portions of the general legislative grants paid to the local school boards must be credited towards research. These grants have enabled teachers and officials to engage in research activities which are substantial in number, variety and scope.

Just over a year ago, the Ontario Curriculum Institute was founded, to work primarily in the area of educational research. And I suggest, Mr. Chairman, there is no better example of research being done in education than is presently being done by the Ontario Curriculum Institute.

This body was founded through the co-operative efforts of the Ontario School Trustees' Council, the teachers' federation, the universities' supervising bodies and, of course, The Department of Education. As you are well aware, we make grants to this curriculum institute. We have also contributed for some years directly to the support of the Ontario Mathematics Commission, to the research activities of the Canadian Education Association and to the Canadian Council for Research on Education.

Within the department—and this does not show in the estimates, Mr. Chairman, but it is there and I am sure the hon. member, having some real knowledge of the educational process must accept this—several branches are engaged in genuine research activities. Among these are the guidance branch; the auxiliary education branch, directly and through the supervision of the registrars branch, whose studies of the examination policies and practices are important parts of educational research; and the teacher education branch, indirectly through research activities with the teachers' colleges. All these make some contribution in the examination of present practices and the implementation of new discoveries based on the research techniques and methods.

Officials of the elementary branch and the secondary branch not only encourage research, they conduct studies of their own. Research in special areas is conducted at the Ontario School for the Blind, and the Ontario School for the Deaf. Many of the studies of the statistical services branch are in the areas of pure and applied research in education. The curriculum and textbooks branch, Mr. Chairman, is closely related to research, as you can guess. It has been expanded in recent years and has increasingly devoted its activity to the application of research findings in the development of new courses of study for the reorganized programme in the secondary schools and for Grades 1 to 6 of the elementary schools.

Large numbers of outstanding teachers and inspectors, supervisors, teachers' college staff, and university representatives have studied, or are studying, and experimenting with new approaches in mathematics and the role of television—to which I have referred—language laboratories, and programmed instructions, in the school programme. The work done in the curriculum branch in this development, with the co-operation of authors and publishers of new textbooks, based on the findings of research, has provided Ontario with unexcelled teaching aids in this area. Officials of the department are constantly being sent to investigate new policies and practices in other jurisdictions, in the United Kingdom, Europe, United States, and many parts of the Commonwealth. The department sponsors other investigations and conferences, of which the relatively recent conference on school design and construction—which gives rise, really, to this item in the estimates, I think—is a very good example.

The figure for research would not be exaggerated, sir, if it were placed in excess of $1 million annually perhaps during this past year or two. It is my intention to continue to expand our support for research. It is my firm belief that only through research study and experimentation can valid solutions be reached for the many problems which now exist, and for others which will undoubtedly arise in the rapidly changing world, my hon. friend mentions, of today and tomorrow.

I would agree, Mr. Chairman, that this is a very critical area, one to which we have to give great attention. At the same time—I do not recall specifically the phraseology in the manpower training report—but if memory serves me correctly, it indicates that there must be some form of manpower assessment which looks forward five to ten years. You indicate that this is, to a degree, perhaps a high degree, the responsibility of The Department of Education. I would suggest that really our basic responsibility is to instruct in those areas where we think we will be of best help to the students of the future.

I think the question of trying to establish job determination or the manpower requirements in the future is certainly of interest to the department and related to its responsibilities, nonetheless I think they should be determined by such a body as the automation foundation or perhaps the federal and provincial Departments of Labour. I think we are all very vitally concerned, but one of the very basic functions of this department, I suggest to you, is the actual instruction of the young people so that they can fulfil the manpower requirements whatever they may be.

Mr. Chairman, I agree with my hon. friend that perhaps one of the very basic things we must retain is a very high degree of flexibility in the programme that our children are undertaking in our school system. I think it is quite obvious that no one, no matter what studies are made, has the type of crystal ball that will indicate what the job opportunities will be in ten or 15 years time. If they have, certainly I do not possess one. I think that our school programme must be such that we will give our students sufficient education that if there is a change in manpower requirements they have certain basic attitudes or skills so that they can adapt themselves to these changes.

I have read very carefully the recommendations of the manpower training committee report. I have something more to say on this, maybe at greater length a little later on. I assure the hon. member that we are concerned about research, but research cannot be and should not be centred in just one specific area within one department. This relates to what is going on at the universities and throughout our school system. It is not research that you can see developed with a separate department as we see in industry. This is a very delicate and specialized field and I assure the hon. member that we are very concerned and we shall do our very best to see that proper research facilities and studies are conducted throughout our school programme.

Mr. Troy: May I ask the hon. Minister, Mr. Chairman, is there a central council or central group to which all of these research organizations report? For example, you mentioned The Department of Labour in regard to its most important function in manpower training, but is the representative of The Department of Labour or are representatives of labour groups on your research committee? Are there representatives of industry and, also, do you have frequent meetings with the research departments in the federal government? I know there is no department of education but the federal government does a great amount of research. Is there harmony and co-operation with all of these other groups?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I think that perhaps you might specifically refer in this area to the Ontario Educational Research Council through which is channelled a great deal of this research. As far as the relationship of this department to others is concerned, I think perhaps our association here with The Department of Labour, The Department of Economics and Development and the automation foundation will be of some help to us although I am still very concerned about automation and its future. I think it should give us all very great concern.

Our relationship with the federal Department of Labour has been most acceptable. We have worked very closely together to develop the programmes not only in the secondary schools but in our planned vocational centres, at the institutes of technology and, of course, in the programme four and five areas. We have a happy relationship with that department as far as these aspects are concerned and I am sure, of course, that this will continue. The federal Department of Labour is very interested in trying to do some of the type of forecasting mentioned by the hon. member.

Mr. Troy: I suppose the council is also concerned with adult education and particularly the use of leisure time. Another factor, too, which must be considered, is that the life span is increasing so that people, long after they have reached the age of retirement, must have something that can interest them. I presume those things are also considered.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Yes, these are being considered. I think if my memory serves me correctly again, I made some reference to this in my observations on the youth branch. I am not sure of this but at some point or other during my main speech on the estimates, I indicated the problem facing this society because of the increased leisure time as one that should give us great concern. Certainly this is being studied by several agencies and we in the department are quite concerned about it.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, now that the hon. member for Nipissing has raised this rather interesting point may I ask the hon. Minister to take a couple of examples? How much money will the department be giving this year to (a) the Ontario Curriculum Institute, and (b) Metro Educational Television Association, or whatever the correct name is?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I am just trying to get the specific amounts. As far as the curriculum institute is concerned, Mr. Chairman, it will be receiving a $50,000 grant, the same as last year. As I understand it, the trustees group will be contributing a like amount. I have been chatting with the new director, Dr. Morgan, and he is hopeful of interesting—which I think would be very helpful—business and industry in financially assisting the curriculum institute.

As far as the grant to META, there will be some assistance, which has not been determined, through the Minister's advisory committee on educational television. I shall be quite frank and tell you that we have suggested to META—we have a representative of META on the Minister's advisory committee—that we are attempting to develop a programme of provincial scope and that the support for META could come to an end when we have solved this type of programme. But META will receive some amount through the recommendation of the advisory committee on educational television.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I discovered today from an answer to a question tabled in the House that a barefoot boy by the name of E. P. Taylor in the fiscal year just concluded got almost $21,000 from the Ontario government for breeding horses.

I am a great believer in the principle of giving welfare assistance to those who need it but in view of the fact that Mr. Taylor has now moved out of the country, I would suggest that we let him struggle along as best he can on his own resources. If we did so, we could increase the grant to the curriculum institute by 40 per cent.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, the only observation I have to make is that Mr. Taylor received no grant under the estimates of my department.

Mr. Bryden: But under the estimates of your government he has received $40,000 in two years.

Mr. Troy: Just one final question on the curriculum institutes—pardon me.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): Mr. Chairman, I just have a very brief question for the hon. Minister. What relationship precisely does the curriculum institute have with the research monies designated under OCE?

Hon. Mr. Davis: There is no relationship between the monies voted under OCE for the department headed by Dr. Jackson and the curriculum institute.

Mr. Troy: In the curriculum institute, are there representatives of industry and labour on that committee, or just members of teaching groups and trustees?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I am just going from memory again. We do not have any direct control over the curriculum institute. This is one of the benefits of the curriculum institute, I think. We are participating and we help finance it but we are very anxious that it operates quite independently of the department. I think there are 30 members on the board and there are six appointed by the five participating groups. As I understand it, there are no set rules as to who these six individuals may be.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, there is one other matter I would like to raise. There have been and there will no doubt continue to be discussions of large and important principles. There is one rather small detail, but important in its own way, that I would like to call to the attention of the hon. Minister. I am not singling him out; this problem arises in a few other estimates as well.

Item 12, under vote 501, asks for $1,000 for what is described as "unforeseen and unprovided." As I understand the new system here—and I think it is a good system—budgeting is done on the basis of programmes. The Treasury board will authorize a budget on the basis of a programme submitted by a department and I would like to know how one draws up a programme for something that is unforeseen and unprovided.

Mr. Chairman, this item appears in some of the estimates of some other departments, but not all of them. I would suggest to the Treasury board that it should strike these items out of all estimates. If matters come up that were not anticipated at the beginning of the year, there are, as we know, proper procedures for having them approved by the Treasury board if they are proper. I think in order that we may fully establish what is a good system of budgeting by programme, we should drop this old-fashioned item of unforeseen and unprovided. I will admit, however, that $1,000 in $400 million is not a significant sum. It is the principle of the thing that I am concerned about.

Mr. MacDonald: Is that mad money for the secretary?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I do not believe we use this too regularly as a matter of fact. I do understand, if I recall correctly, that on one occasion this was used for, I think, a $200 fee for legal opinion. We have no legal counsel directly within the department and this was to do, I think, with certain aspects of the separate school system. This was the item that we used to pay the $200 fee.

Vote 501 agreed to.

On vote 502:

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Chairman, if I may, I would just like to compliment the hon. Minister on his presentation. I think it has been the best I have heard in this House in the five years I have been here.

Mr. Troy: That is also including the former Minister.

Mr. Newman: He certainly is most familiar with his subject and has given excellent answers to every question asked of him.

Mr. Chairman, if I may ask the hon. Minister? Will he consider the teaching of house buying on the elementary level, primarily to the senior grades, because quite a few of these students now do not carry on; or if they do carry on they may get into one or two years of the secondary school level then their education stops at that point? Likewise, they may be 15, 16 and even 17 years of age; generally at the age of 16 and 17, rather than keep them in an elementary school, they are sent to the junior vocational schools.

Another thing I would like the hon. Minister to consider is instalment buying. Were the youngster made aware of the dangers of instalment buying earlier in his life he would not be confronted with the dangers with which we find him faced as he goes on through life. Recently we had presented to the House the various type of gimmicks, rackets, sharp practices and so forth which are employed by certain unscrupulous operators. Were the student made aware of some of these dangerous practices, he would not be so easily led up the garden path.

The third comment I would make concerns guidance. I think that guidance is more important in the elementary level than it is in the secondary level. It is here where we need the more competent guidance teacher because the youngster, when he leaves the elementary level, has only one year and sometimes only two years in which to make up his mind as to what course he is to follow for the balance of his life. If he does not select the proper course of education, he finds himself confronted with the need to be retrained; and not two or three times—I understand the latest figures are 11 or 12 times, in the course of his 40 years of employment.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, in commenting on these three aspects: This question of house buying is a specific subject. I do not know that it really had occurred to me, or the department. Certainly we will consider that. As you know, under the reorganized programme there is, of course, economics.

I was in a school, I believe it was either in Fort William or Port Arthur, some two or three weeks ago, and in one of the occupational courses—and this is perhaps an appropriate area where this type of course of instruction should be given—the gentleman in charge of the class was giving a talk on credit buying. He said that he not only found it an interesting course to give to the students but that the students came to school the day after class with many problems presented by their parents as to the difficulties involving credit buying. Certainly this is an area which will be part of the occupational courses at Grade 9 and 10 level.

I could not agree with the hon. member more as far as guidance is concerned. This is an area which still needs, as I said in my opening statement, considerable work. It is an area which has developed very rapidly. Certainly it must apply to the elementary as well as the secondary level because I think the day is rapidly approaching when the somewhat artificial division between elementary and secondary may conceivably disappear and we will treat education as a continuous process, say from Grade 1 to 12 or 13, as the case may be.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, if I may pursue this one step further? I do not mean to institute a programme in the school on these various topics I have mentioned; but possibly in the guidance programme the department could come out with certain specific topics which should be covered during the course of a year, solely for information for the youngster. Because at that age he probably is not fully cognizant of the dangers with which he is going to be confronted with later on in life. And where topics such as house buying, unionism, maybe instalment buying, are simply introduced, then when he gets into the secondary level he is a little more aware of them.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, there are two areas on which I would like to address some questions to the hon. Minister.

Would the hon. Minister make general reports with regard to the revisions in the kindergarten to Grade 6? Is this being done under the aegis of the curriculum institute, or under whose direction is it being done? And specifically, at what stage are these studies? I mean, they have been going on for two years now and I am just curious to know exactly what is happening. I notice in the annual report that it states they are going to be accelerated with the completion of the courses for reorganization in secondary schools. Has the hon. Minister got personnel there? And when they are freed from secondary, will he switch them over?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I am very pleased to report that the Treasury board as recently as this morning, just as recently as that, has approved the allocation of five permanent personnel for a year or a year-and-a-half to expedite the programme. It is being done very definitely, within the curriculum and textbooks branch of the department. I think there has to be a very clear understanding that the curriculum institute operates independently. We are interested in their recommendations; but the final responsibility must lie with, I believe, The Department of Education, for the actual implementation of their recommendations. We must take the responsibility for the courses in our schools.

As far as Grades 1 to 6 are concerned, they have been delayed, to a degree, but not to a major degree, by reorganization in the secondary school; but I would report to you that studies have been concluded of developments in curriculum in a number of forward-looking jurisdictions in the U.S.

An official of the curriculum branch visited the state departments of education in Minnesota, Illinois, Ohio, Wisconsin, Michigan, and the Chicago Board of Education. He has held discussions recently with officials in all of these areas, and leading educators in several American universities have also been consulted. We are going, perhaps, you may feel, somewhat far afield; but we feel that we should make every effort to contact those individuals who may be able to make a contribution to this revision.

Meetings have been held with the curriculum revision committee of the Ontario Teachers' Federation. The latter group has conducted a survey of teacher opinion on many matters relating to curriculum in Grades 1 to 6. This information has been analyzed and the results have been given to the department. It is proposed to continue and extend the help which may be secured through this avenue. We think this is a very helpful way of trying to determine the type of curriculum in the elementary area.

Meetings have been held with the inspectors, teacher staff, and college members at the fall conference of these groups at the ten teachers' colleges, and these groups have indicated the areas where they believe helpful changes could be made.

Three sets of new primary reading series for Grades 1 to 3 inclusive will be completed this year. New spelling series have been developed and are in use in Grades 2 to 6 inclusive presently. New textbooks in English have been introduced in some grades and they will be extended throughout all grades. Texts incorporating some of the findings of the new approach to mathematics, as we call it, have been approved for Grades 3 to 4 and others for Grades 5 and 6 are now available.

The teaching of French to English-speaking children is under study by a curriculum committee made up of representatives of the university professors, the classroom teachers, supervisors and inspectors, teachers' college staff member, and officials of the department. The committee is examining the whole programme and will make recommendations for an integrated course throughout the elementary and the secondary schools. It will investigate the problem of the supply of teachers, which is not really related perhaps to curriculum, and especially the training of teachers for oral classes in the elementary schools.

Provision is being made, and I have just learned now, that the extra staff we were looking for has been approved by the Treasury board this morning, to complete this revision. But the responsibility for it, Mr. Chairman, lies within the curriculum and textbook branch of the department.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, the question in my mind grows even larger. The government is spending $50,000 for the Ontario Curriculum Institute, along with monies coming in from other sources, and now the hon. Minister has explained to us that within this branch of the department you have a committee which is proceeding with the revision of the curriculum from kindergarten to Grade 6. In fact, you have just got the six personnel for a year-and-a-half, which is another few tens of thousands of dollars. It is the relationship between the two of them.

I agree that the curriculum institute is an independent body which makes recommendations this government will have to implement in its wisdom. But it would appear that you are now coming into the picture in what in effect is a parallel study with the Ontario Curriculum Institute.

Let us take a hypothetical case. Suppose the curriculum institute comes up with a recommendation with regard to Grades 1 to 6 about a year from now, and meanwhile you have this other body within your department, doing a study on curriculum and it comes up with a different recommendation. Why do you have two bodies doing that basic job?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I think, Mr. Chairman, it is a very excellent question. I think that the answer is not easy to give or explain, except that the prime purpose of the curriculum institute is to be independent and objective. The department officials have certain views—

I am just taking one area as an example—in reading or the instruction of reading in the elementary schools. There is a certain school of thought in the province which would indicate that the view taken by the department is not correct. In order to be completely objective, and realizing the great importance of this particular area at the elementary level, we have asked the curriculum institute to do an objective and independent study and to assess what the department is doing in relation to what other groups are suggesting and what classroom teachers are suggesting.

I think there is very definitely a spot for both types of study. It would be my thought that the curriculum institute will concentrate on one, two or three specific areas during the course of its year, that it will take perhaps a wider or broader approach, that it may be sort of holding out carrots or goals that the department should aim for in a broad sense, and that it, I hope, will fulfil a very necessary role. The fact that it is separate and independent from the department, I think is what will make it effective.

I do not think there need necessarily be an overlapping. I feel quite confident there will not be. I realize the possibility of it, but the attitude to date of the people on the curriculum institute is that they do not want to overlap what we are doing. At the same time they want to look at some areas in depth because they think it will be helpful to the curriculum and textbook branch of the department.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, my other question has to do with letters of permission and letters of standing. As I understand it, a letter of standing—is that the correct term?—is in effect a temporary certificate given to somebody who has training in another jurisdiction and presumably the training is roughly the equivalent of ours. Is that correct? Well, I am a bit puzzled. In a system the size of ours, we have only 942 people who are persons with no professional training at all, 546 holders of expired third-class certificates—that sounds like a pretty dead professional place, an expired third-class certificate; I do not know how low down on the totem pole you can get—

Hon. Mr. Davis: They are not the top professionals.

Mr. MacDonald: Persons who failed the teachers' college total 91; teachers holding high school certificates, 17; then, teachers holding certificates from other provinces—holders not eligible for letters of standing.

This may be a small point, but what is the distinction?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, this is a very involved situation but these are people who do not have the equivalent qualifications. It is an area that gives me some concern on occasion, because usually these people are the ones who end up in the Minister's office wondering why their qualifications are not equivalent.

Quite frankly, we are extending our assessment of outside jurisdictions. I have run into a situation, for instance, in Windsor and as a matter of principle I had to accept it. There is a very excellent course at Wayne University in geography, if memory serves me correctly. Yet because of the fact that it is so difficult to evaluate the courses at all the surrounding universities, a student taking a course there, which might be a very acceptable course, at the present time does not receive credit here in Ontario. These are areas I feel we must assess, but I think you appreciate the great difficulty in trying to evaluate courses at all the institutions of higher learning in other jurisdictions. This is not an easy task.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the hon. Minister could tell us what percentage of the students in the primary system get their entrance, that is accomplish Grade 8 successfully, in less than the eight years? Just roughly—half of them?

Hon. Mr. Davis: This is difficult to determine. It cannot be determined from the report. We would have to get you very accurate figures but we estimate it would be somewhere between 35 and perhaps 40 per cent. These are quite often the same students who go on to the 12-year system, at least the 13 in 12. It would be very close to the same percentage, roughly 35 to 40 per cent.

Mr. Nixon: In fact there would be very little opportunity to accelerate a year after Grade 8?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I think it would be almost impossible, certainly under the reorganized programme, Mr. Chairman. I think it would be very difficult to accelerate after the Grade 8 level, the way the courses are constructed at the moment.

Mr. Nixon: So approximately, let us say 40 per cent of the students do accelerate a year in some way or other, during the public school system. I would like the hon. Minister to comment on whether or not the methods of doing this in the various educational jurisdictions are uniform or whether the responsibility is left entirely to the local boards.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I think it would be inaccurate to say that it was uniform. I think that obviously certain ideas and philosophies carry over from one board area to another, but the actual responsibility for the promotion of students lies very definitely within the local board area, and usually then, of course, on the recommendation of the individual teacher and the principal.

Mr. Nixon: It is because of this fact, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the possibility for an average student, or an above-average student, to accomplish a little faster academic progress is not available in all jurisdictions. There are many school boards who have the philosophy "one-year-one-grade" and that is it. I wonder if the hon. Minister would comment on whether he feels there should be this kind of freedom of choice in every area, or whether or not the student has the right to accelerate if in fact it has been indicated he can do so?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, this matter is subject to review, if the board refuses, by the inspector. I think it is a situation that perhaps over a period of time may be resolved in the development of some overall policy for the acceleration of students. Actually, this is developed to a degree. There has been, I understand, some reference—if there has not there will be—to the Grade 13 committee on this whole question of telescoping or perhaps altering the programme for Grades 1 to 8 as it relates to the secondary level. Of course, into this comes the philosophy that although many students might be able to do it in the 12 years, you are then perhaps graduating some students theoretically from school at 16½ or 17 years of age, which may be too young emotionally or socially to attend university. This is also being considered by the Grade 13 committee.

Mr. Nixon: But the fact of the matter is that a large number of students do this now. It might be a good subject for research to examine the various means whereby acceleration is possible and come to some conclusion as to which way is best and then implement it in the province of Ontario.

I would like to ask the hon. Minister, Mr. Chairman, if the teaching of French in the public schools, which is a matter of choice by the individual boards, must be paid for entirely at a local level.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I am not sure exactly what the hon. member means. If he means are there any special grants, there are no special grants but they are given the same type of grant per student that would be given for any other type of course. They are not treated any differently; there is no special grant for it.

Mr. Nixon: The hon. Minister said, either in his remarks yesterday or in his report, that there is a shortage of teachers qualified to do this. Then is it just on a strict salary competition basis that the communities get this service?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I see what the hon. member is asking. Yes, this is a case, Mr. Chairman, of the boards endeavouring to obtain the appropriate teacher for the instruction of oral French. There is no additional grant given to any board. The boards must compete for this individual, and of course, as I say, there is a shortage of this type of individual. This is still one of the stumbling blocks, although I said in my estimates the number now I think is close to 104,000 presently taking oral French at the elementary level.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for York South has touched on letters of standing and letters of permission. How would it be that a teacher would have a letter giving permission to teach in our elementary schools for 19 years and still not have any kind of a certificate?

Mr. MacDonald: It is like a permanent casual.

Mr. Troy: The tragic part about it, too, is that this particular teacher, according to the inspectors, is a much better teacher than those who have Grade A certificates. Would there be something in the department which would allow, would compel, that type of teacher to get her certificate long ago?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well, Mr. Chairman, these are quite often the situations which find their way to the Minister's office as well. Quite often these cases occur where a married woman, say, has gone back to the profession. She does not want to leave her family; she may be in some more remote community and is not able to upgrade herself to obtain the appropriate certificates. Then I think it is true in some cases—they are not many, but in some cases—the teachers probably are as competent as those with their certificates and this is the way the situation develops.

It is theoretically possible, of course, for the department to force some of these people; yet at the same time many of them are doing a quite adequate job. As the hon. member has said, the inspector suggested this one teacher is doing better than those who had their qualifications; but there are these rules and regulations we must observe and this is what complicates matters. This is how the situation develops. It is really very simple, and one I run into fairly regularly.

Mr. Troy: This particular teacher to whom I refer, sir, is married to the profession of teaching; that is her marital status. The tragic part about it is that she is bilingual, an exceptionally good teacher, and it is very unfortunate that she still has to have that letter of permission.

Again, too, I have seen people come from other countries into our province and teach. At least they had PhDs, but just because they had a doctor of philosophy degree does not mean that they are good teachers; in fact they did not last any time.

I noticed in the press not very long ago that there is a special course for teachers in conversational French this summer, I think, at Waterloo or Kitchener. Is that under the department?

Hon. Mr. Davis: It is the same summer course as last year, Mr. Chairman, and it is being held in Ottawa.

Mr. Troy: A crash programme!

Hon. Mr. Davis: There is a crash programme, an experimental type of programme—this is another area I did not touch on—being run by the curriculum institute; and I believe they are doing this in London.

Mr. Troy: Well, if a certain institute or committee is considering Grades 1 to 6, how then would it be possible to integrate that very fine suggestion of the hon. member for Brant that we shorten the school years to 12 years, just as is done in the province where I was born, Quebec? And in the province of Saskatchewan they can proceed to their senior matriculation in 12 years. Surely Ontario can. What is the strong objection to compressing the pre-university education into 12 years; what is the objection?

Hon. Mr. Davis: This is related to the study being made by the Grade 13 committee. And there have been references made to this at the committee gatherings already, although I think that in fairness the hon. member should know that comparative studies made—and they of course are not complete and may not be entirely accurate—would indicate that a Grade 13 graduate in this province does have some slightly greater knowledge than a comparable graduate from Grade 12 in a lot of other jurisdictions. I think it is only fair that we should tell him.

Mr. Troy: That is a matter of opinion.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Yes.

Mr. Troy: And guidance; a final question about guidance in the elementary schools. It seems to me that the most important people to be guided are not the youngsters themselves but the parents. I think they should be brought into the picture, to discuss the future career of their offspring with the guidance teacher.

Hon. Mr. Davis Well, Mr. Chairman, I cannot speak for all areas, but I can speak for those I know rather well. Many of the parents of the Grade 8 students, or sometimes the Grade 7 students, are invited to the elementary schools to discuss with the principal and the room teacher the future of the student when he proceeds on to Grade 9. This is not general because in many areas they still have not got people who are competent enough to handle this situation; but it is developing and it is one with which I certainly agree. I agree with the hon. member that the ultimate responsibility for selection of the course must lie with the student and his parents.

Mr. L. A. Braithwaite (Etobicoke): Mr. Chairman, I have a question of the hon. Minister in connection with the curriculum institute and the association for better basic education. Apparently a brief entitled: "The elementary educational system in Ontario schools, its shortcomings, adverse effects on pupils, and suggestions for corrective measures", was presented to the Minister on November 5, 1962. Apparently at that time the Minister promised investigation. Then a second meeting of a committee of the association with the Minister, his director of education, two other staff members, and the director of the newly formed institute for curriculum research, took place about March of 1963.

From what I understand, the committee had asked that tests for phonic knowledge be presented at all educational levels, that experimental classes taught by a modern phonetic system—not augmented Roman—be set up and results compared with those of equivalent classes using the current mixed method, that is the sight plus the phonic.

The committee was advised, I understand, that the test results and experiments they sought demanded scientifically controlled and conducted experimentation, and that a great deal of research and analysis was necessary by experts before results would be meaningful.

I have been told that the hon. Minister suggested, at the time of the second meeting, that since the curriculum institute would be studying the reading programme—I guess that is what is going on now—and with the institute's team consisting solely of educators, perhaps one of the members of the institute's committee might be a parent appointed by himself or his department. I am wondering, Mr. Chairman, if any of the requests of the Association for Better Basic Education have been or are being carried out by the curriculum institute. Has any member of the Association for Better Basic Education been appointed to the curriculum institute?

I wonder: has the hon. Minister any other comments in connection with this question of the teaching of phonics in the elementary schools?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I actually touched on this a few minutes ago. I informed the hon. member for York South, when we were discussing the role of the curriculum institute as compared with, or in relation to, the role of the curriculum and textbook branch, that this was one area where we had specifically asked the curriculum institute to undertake a study.

The suggestion made by the hon. member is quite accurate. I do not recall any meeting with the head of the curriculum institute and members of the department in March of 1963. Actually the head of the curriculum institute, Dr. Morgan, was appointed, I think, in December or March 1963 or January, 1964. The terms of reference of the study being undertaken follow very closely to the suggestions contained in the question of the hon. member.

I have no further comment to make on phonics as it is being used at this stage. This is why the committee has been asked to study the matter and the initial or organizing committee set up. Consideration, I understand, is being given to either having somebody from this association on a continuing committee, or certainly to allow and ask the committee on this particular problem, to make a presentation of their particular interest to the committee on the study of phonics, the use of phonics in the reading programme.

Mr. Braithwaite: Mr. Chairman, I would like to follow that up with just a very brief question. I wonder if the hon. Minister could tell us when or if the Association for Better Basic Education has been advised as to whether or not they will be allowed a representative on the curriculum institute? This, I understand, is one of the suggestions that came from the hon. Minister.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member perhaps was not here when I outlined the setup and the functions of the curriculum institute to the hon. member for York South.

They are an independent group. We have asked them to do this study for us and they have agreed. We are not in a position to dictate to them as to who should be on the committee. I cannot tell the hon. member, but I shall certainly ask the departmental officials, or I shall personally ask the director, to inform, if they do not already know, the people in this group.

I know some of them. They have been to my office on one or two occasions. The first time they were there they brought in a report from the San Francisco Board of Education on this particular subject. I was interested in it because I had just been to the same area and I discussed this problem with one of the authors of this very report.

I have sympathy with these people because their children, many of them, have difficulty in reading; yet I think you would be interested to know that our statistics reveal that there are as many young people learning to read properly today as there were some years ago; this is the belief of the departmental officials. But certainly we are concerned enough to have this study undertaken by the curriculum institute and I shall certainly ask the director to keep this group well informed as to the progress of this particular study.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the hon. Minister if the department tape records courses in various subjects. For example, a youngster may be ill in a community and will miss, let us say, two months at school. I know he could probably go into a correspondence course, but rather than go into that he might prefer to get some other type of help.

If The Department of Education would have various subjects in the science course tape recorded, all they would have to do is send the tape to the youngster and then he could play it at his own home and educate himself in that fashion.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, the department itself does not instruct by way of tape. In the use of tape not only is there the recording, of course, but the student must have a machine to play back the tape. As to whether some of the local boards use this for students who have been ill or are incapacitated and cannot attend regular classes, I do not know. We do, through the auxiliary education branch, provide certain special services, but we do not generally distribute tapes with instruction for the students. This is done, as you know, through the correspondence course.

Mr. J. P. Spence (Kent East): Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the hon. Minister a question with regard to central schools. There is quite a discussion in certain parts of the province with regard to central schools. I think the hon. Minister made some comments at the opening of his estimates. Could he tell me how many municipalities, rural municipalities, have adopted central schools up till now in this province?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I believe, Mr. Chairman, that there are over 700 central schools now in the province. This would not necessarily indicate the exact number of municipalities because some of the municipalities might have one, two or some may even have three central schools. But assuming that the average would be, say, one or one and a half, there would now be somewhere in the neighbourhood of 550 municipalities with central schools in this province. The great bulk of our students are presently attending graded schools throughout the entire province.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, the teaching of religion in the elementary schools received a lot of comment over the past year or two and in looking up some of the background on this and reading the debates in some of the first issues of Hansard that were taken in this House, it was interesting to note that this was introduced, I believe, in the year 1944, so that we cannot regard the teaching of religion in our schools as having a strong and great historical background. There is a strong feeling among those who are opposed to this that the time has come to reassess this part of the curriculum very carefully to see what its value is and see how it is regarded by the community in the province at this time. I would ask the hon. Minister for his comments in this connection.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is quite right as to the date of the introduction of religious education in the schools. It was in 1944. I think the hon. member is also correct in saying that there is a body of opinion in the province that feels that—I do not know whether you would say that they were actually opposed, you might say they feel it is not necessary. I have had representations from the North York board, through the chairman, Mr. Stanbury, and I think two or three days ago received a petition, or at least a resolution, from the Scarborough board related to the subject. You should also know that there are certain groups who still feel there is merit in having religious education in the schools and I can assure the hon. member that this matter is receiving my very careful attention at this time.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, following this subject; this of course refers to public schools. The hon. Minister will not make any commitment; but let us say he is not going to have any religion in schools: we in our separate schools can continue with something that we think is a vital part of a youngster's education?

Hon. Mr. Davis: We have received no representation about this at all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. S. Lewis: I understand that in the public accounts of 1962-1963, there was a considerable unexpended portion dealing with inspectors in both votes 502 and 503. The basis for it apparently was that the pay is not sufficiently high to attract inspectors, and that the people who are most likely to become inspectors, namely, principals, did not have a sufficient financial inducement to make the changeover. I am curious as to whether in fact there were unexpended portions, and whether these reasons for them are valid.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I would say that this is the prime reason for the unexpended appropriation for inspectors. I am just going from memory—this may also apply actually to the secondary—I would be less than frank if I did not acknowledge that we have a problem in obtaining staff through the province as far as inspectors and senior personnel are concerned by the very competitive nature and the very high salaries presently being offered by the boards. The assessment that my hon. friend has made is to a very high degree accurate.

Mr. S. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the hon. Minister: Are there any specific plans that he might have in mind to alter this situation?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I think we are all concerned, Mr. Chairman, and these matters are all being explored.

Mr. S. Lewis: I shall move to one other small field, Mr. Chairman. The hon. Minister has kindly opened up some of the areas of curriculum at the elementary school level relating to elementary education. I have one or two minor comments—not in as facetious a way as might first appear—to make about one particular part of the elementary school curriculum.

I gather that there is considerable sentiment in this country at the moment that Reader's Digest and Time magazine should not have special exemptions or special inducements for Canadian editions. I would heartily concur in such a feeling. I would particularly concur in the suggestion that The Ontario Department of Education not act as a promotion agency, as a public relations outlet for one of these publications.

I hold in my hand the Reader's Digest reading skill-builder which I understand is actually used in—maybe not many—certain schools, certainly in the Metropolitan Toronto area.

This came to me from one of those schools. It is a very ingenious little book, having the actual format of Reader's Digest. It is a superb inducement to young people, having memorized the contents therein, to rush out to their newsstand years hence and buy Reader's Digest.

Now, apart from personally thinking that Reader's Digest is one of the more pernicious magazines available for public consumption, I would like the hon. members to know the contents and quality of the material being disseminated through the educational system in this fashion. There are several cute little parables and stories and instructive moral homilies in this book, some of them dealing with the saving of money and learning from a moneybags, others of them discussing fox shooting and the value of shooting foxes as they move in and out of ends of a hollow log—

Mr. MacDonald: A Victorian virtue, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. S. Lewis: A very Victorian virtue and perhaps consonant with certain Victorian educational principles. But the story that appealed to me most was the little excerpt from "Goofy Gobblers", which was a friendly little piece, three-quarters of the way through the book. This little excerpt is entitled: "Some Learn, Some Don't", and I would like to read it for the edification of the hon. members of the House.

One of my friends is really smart. His baby turkeys learned to eat and drink but he had to trick them into it. He put bright marbles into their food. The crazy things pecked at the marbles. They were not trying to eat. Their beaks slipped off into the food. They couldn't help getting some of the food into their beaks. In that way his baby turkeys learned to eat.

Ah ha; instructive.

But this farmer had a hard time getting them to take a drink. He put water in pan after pan but the little turkeys did not drink. They began to get sick for lack of water. So the farmer took each one by the head and put its beak down into the water, then it had to drink.

And again, no doubt, my agricultural friends in the House will agree that is an appropriate approach.

Another friend was not so smart. While he was feeding his baby turkeys the breakfast bell rang. He put the empty pail down in the yard. Off he went into the house. Half an hour later he found the pail almost full of dead turkeys. They had jumped in to see what they could see, then they had not known enough to jump out. So big turkeys or little turkeys, I think they are all goofy, yet I keep on raising them. I want to see what crazy things they will do next.

Apart from any facetious undercurrent, I might say to the hon. Minister that this kind of incorrigible claptrap has no place in an educational system, either as an ancillary text or as a workbook or as an educational stunt, and certainly not as any substantive educational content. I find it difficult to believe that anywhere we could be promoting Reader's Digest in this fashion. It may not be a specific policy of the department, but I feel it should be acquainted with the nature of the material.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I would assume the hon. member, knowing the regulations of the department to a degree, fully realizes that this is not being promoted by The Department of Education, that this comes under the ancillary books or periodicals that a board may provide. Knowing the great interest that the hon. member must have in the subject to bring this matter to my attention, I presume that he has already brought this to the attention of the local board, whose responsibility it is.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, a question. In The Canadian School Journal some time ago there was a problem that was discussed by the executive director of the Ontario School Trustees' Council in regard to divided allegiance of the principal—his allegiance to the school board and his allegiance to the teachers' federation. Has the hon. Minister any comments in that regard?

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, I have no comment on this, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Troy: Has the hon. Minister had representations from the trustees' association that there be a change in the law?

Hon. Mr. Davis: The trustees' council has for some years made representations perhaps to suggest that the principal should not be a member of the OTF and not be construed as being part of the teachers' federation organization. There has been no decision or action taken on the representations. I have no comment on this, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman: Vote 502 agreed to.

On vote 503:

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, on vote 503, may I suggest to the hon. Minister that he establish some policy concerning summer schools? That is where a student in a secondary school fails one or two subjects and at the end of the school year attempts to pick up those subjects by the attendance at some summer school, either in his community or in some other community.

Quite often after the six-week or eight-week programme, the student returns to his community and finds that the principals of the schools frown on or look with a jaundiced eye at the type of education that he received at that summer school. They frown upon it; they claim it is not up to standard.

I think the department should set certain standards for these summer schools so that when the students does attend them, he has to pass certain types of set exams and that they be recognized in all schools in the province.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, this is a matter that has been left to the discretion, as the hon. member knows, of the local board area—the question of summer school, what the tests will be, and so on. The suggestion of the hon. member that we evolve some form of overall policy certainly is worthy of consideration, but to date this has been a matter, Mr. Chairman, determined by the local boards themselves. Some local boards, as the hon. member is well aware, do not have summer schools of any type and this is perhaps a matter that could be and perhaps should be considered by the department.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, my own school board does not have a summer programme—

Hon. Mr. Davis: I understand that.

Mr. Newman: —but a lot of students from the Windsor area do attend a programme in the Chatham district. They complete the programme there and then when they attempt to have credit for the completion of that programme for that subject in the local area, there is always some comment: "Well, you just spent eight weeks at the Chatham area. You did not learn as much as you could have in the programme back in the local area." Or they also frown upon the idea that the youngster goes there while he loafed all year in the school, and that is the reason for his failing. There are other things that have to be taken into consideration. I do not think a youngster should have to sacrifice a whole year of school simply because of one or two subjects which can be made up by attendance at a summer school in some area.

Mr. W. D. McKeough (Kent West): Mr. Chairman, if I might add that—

Mr. Chairman: Order! Order! The member for Scarborough North.

Mr. T. L. Wells (Scarborough North): Since we are on this subject, Mr. Chairman, I will be fair to the hon. member for Kent West.

Mr. McKeough: I certainly was not aware that there had been any criticism by the Windsor board or others of the programme which has been run by the Chatham Board of Education for the last two years, and I believe very successfully. I can only suggest that if the Windsor people feel this way, the best thing they could do would be to organize their own programme, instead of looking to Chatham for assistance and crying about it down here.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, if I could answer the hon. member, we do not complain. I would like to compliment Chatham on conducting a programme like this. I think this is forward thinking. I wish my own board would do exactly the same thing.

Mr. Wells: Mr. Chairman, in rising to speak on vote 503, the secondary education branch, I would first like to quote from the hon. Minister's remarks of yesterday. He said:

A nation that forgets its past is likely to have a short future.

And then he quotes Mr. J. Bascom St. John as saying:

Let us not make the fatal mistake of letting history "go out of style".

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that we can approach this, as the hon. member for Brant I think has already suggested when he spoke on the teaching of history, in the secondary school field on a non-political basis. It is something that affects all of us as Canadians. I have talked over the years with many teachers in our schools and I find that many of them feel that Canadian history is dull and uninteresting. I certainly would strongly disagree with this; I think that Canada has an exciting and challenging history and I think that the people of our nation, and especially the young people, must be taught to know the difficulties that have faced the people who have come before them: starting right back from Champlain and the founding of Port Royal, the United Empire Loyalists, Lord Selkirk's settlement at the Red River, and moving all through our history to the Rebellion of 1837, struggles to achieve responsible Cabinet government, and then the vision and the establishment of Confederation. We have to go all through it right up to the development of Canada into the nation that it is today.

I think, Mr. Chairman, many of the problems facing us today, facing our Confederation here, these serious and complex problems, could be solved, sir, or at least better understood by our people if they realize that they are not new problems—as has been said many times before. They are not new problems. They have faced people in this country all through the years, through our history, and they go right back to the founding of Quebec and its conquest.

I think these problems can only be solved by Canadians knowing their roots and by our young people realizing how our forefathers faced these problems. I think this will only come from an intense study of our history. Without the knowledge, without the vision, the courage, the faith, the hardiness, the resourcefulness in all these things that our forefathers had, without the leadership which they showed as to how this nation could be founded and brought into the position which it holds today—without our young people realizing all these things, I think that we will perhaps flounder in the ignorance of our own history.

Having said that, Mr. Chairman, I think that, getting right down to our problem today it is that we really do not have an adequate Canadian history course in our secondary schools. The fact is that there is no course of study, in any year in secondary school, which is devoted completely and exclusively to Canadian history. Canadian history is taught on a compulsory basis in two grades—Grade 10 and Grade 12, I believe.

In Grade 10, Canadian, British and American history is taught—roughly about one-third for each of these—plus a section on government or civics. How can we have an adequate appreciation of the history of Canada when we have to study the complete history of three nations in about four periods per week?

Going on to Grade 12, here the course concerns world history, and Canadian history is only barely touched upon. It is a fraction of a part of the history course which covers the major history of the world since 1500.

Mr. Chairman, if you take the textbook used in many of our schools—I think it is called, The Modern Age—we find that this textbook has in it 600 pages. Of these 600 pages ten pages are devoted to the history of Canada. And if you look through the text, Sir John A. Macdonald's name—if I dare mention his name again—is only mentioned twice. I apologize to my hon. friends to the far right—

Mr. S. Lewis: Why should it be mentioned more than that?

Mr. Wells: I have not checked to see if George Brown's name is mentioned at all but I dare say it is not. Really the Grade 12 course, Mr. Chairman, is only a broad survey of world history and not really Canadian history.

I might say this: in Grade 13 an excellent course in Canadian history is offered: about 50 per cent of the subject matter deals with Canadian history and deals with it in a very fine manner; but of course, as we all know, it is an optional course in Grade 13, and very few of our students either choose it as an option or else arrive at the Grade 13 level where they even have the chance to choose it.

In rising on this vote I would like to suggest to the hon. Minister that his department and, perhaps through this discussion in this Legislature, the Ontario Curriculum Institute, will tackle this very important problem. It is an important and pressing problem, which should be tackled particularly in view of what I said earlier. We must realize our history to realize and face the problems we face in this country today. I hope that these groups will tackle this problem and that they will study it so that we can arrive at some solution.

I would just like to add a couple of suggestions which perhaps could be adopted. I would like to see us perhaps go back to where we would have a complete Canadian history course in Grade 10; one that would be devoted completely to Canadian history and the government of Canada. The Grade 11 course in world history could be—it now ends at the year 1500—advanced to the year 1763. Then, in the Grade 12 course, we could have a much greater emphasis on Canadian history, as it relates to the modern world, particularly since 1867. Here we could have a real study by our young people of all these problems: provincial rights, national schemes of social welfare, how the Canadian constitution can be amended, all these things which are so vital for their knowledge of the problems we face today.

Then, in closing, Mr. Chairman, there is just one other suggestion I would make. In the English courses of study there should perhaps be more emphasis on compulsory reading of biographies of great Canadians. There are available many fine biographies of Canadians of the past. Why should these not be made compulsory reading in our English courses?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, just to comment on that for a moment. I think perhaps I have indicated to the House in my opening remarks that we share this concern about history and I think that much can be done in the schools of this province; but I think it is only fair to observe as well that this attitude, or lack of interest in history and other developments within this province, does not confine itself to the school system. This is something which has spread throughout, I believe, our entire society. It is a reflection of the attitude of the many parents in this province and I think it is something which we maybe should consider, if we can, in a more general way than confining our interest to the school system alone.

Obviously we can do much to engender this interest through schools but I would suggest, and this is not the appropriate time nor the place, but some discussion might be entered into to determine how we could better interest not only the school children of this province in Canadian history, but the entire population. The problem certainly extends beyond the school system itself.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, last summer the Ontario high school principals met in their annual conference at McMaster University. One subject among those discussed was the question of standardized examinations. I read, from the Canadian Press dispatch from Hamilton:

The standard exams which would be optional for schools that wanted them would provide a basis of comparison for schools at lower levels.

As we all know, at the moment, only Grade 13 students write their final set of examinations on a province-wide basis. The principals' resolution—the article goes on to say—implied that lower grade examinations would not be used for credit as Grade 13 are at present. The exams would, the resolution said, afford all schools an opportunity, if they wish it, to compare achievement in their schools with the normal across the province. That is the first thing.

Another subject discussed was the archaic laws of the province of Ontario which do not permit retired teachers to teach, as they do in other provinces. For example, a retired teacher from Ontario can go to the province of British Columbia or Quebec—I knew a principal, Mr. Chairman, who was retired from a high school in northern Ontario, and then taught for years in the province of Quebec without affecting his superannuation. In this province, there is a certain limit.

The principal pointed out that a great number of highly qualified teachers are lost to the high schools, particularly when we have a shortage of teachers. As Colonel King—I believe he is a high school principal—pointed out, there was a shortage of qualified teachers and it was not improving. Only 866 students entered the Ontario College of Education last year for teacher training and the province actually needed 2,500. Then this principal pointed out, again in regard to superannuated teachers, that if they teach more than 19.5 days they have their pension affected.

It brings up the point that they can go to B.C. if they want to, they can leave this beautiful province of Ontario, the richest in the land, and they can go to the province of Quebec and they can teach there as long as they can totter to school. They still draw their full superannuation. Why not in Ontario? Because you are losing the benefit of many teachers who could contribute much to the system, particularly when you have to resort to getting people into our schools on letters of permission and letters of standing.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well, Mr. Chairman, dealing with the second subject first. As the hon. member knows, this is the stipulation under The Superannuation Act. This is the agreement that was reached and it is one that may, I think, restrict us to a degree from the use of some of these teachers. It is debatable just how many of them are involved. There are a number who go into the private schools in this province, as well as going to other provinces. It is one of those areas that I would not want to be put in the position of saying that we should alter because of the shortage that exists at the moment, if in the long run and with the general benefits under the Act it is indicated that this is perhaps the best overall policy. I fully appreciate that you can find certain exceptions with validity to every rule, and yet, nonetheless, rules must I think, be maintained and this is one of them.

I would like to reply to the first question, mentioned by the hon. member, with reference to some other type of external examination, or some external examination at the other grade levels. As you know this year we are having Grade 12 examinations in the technical subjects, and Latin and I believe geography as well for the Grade 12 students. This is being done for several reasons, one of which is the preparation for the type of examination that they will experience at the Grade 13 level. So to a degree we are implementing the suggestion made by the headmasters at their meeting last summer. It does not go as far as they would suggest, Mr. Chairman, but certainly I think it indicates that we are interested in doing this type of thing.

Mr. Troy: Last fall, or sometime within the last few months, there was a meeting in Sudbury of male and female high school people and they had a strong resolution. I do not know if they sent it on to the department in regard to the possibility of French high schools. We have of course French Grades 9 and 10, but under The Department of Education we have French high schools across this province that are supported in Grades 11, 12 and 13 entirely by the parents themselves with no grants from The Department of Education. Have you any comments to make with regard to high schools under The Department of Education in which the instruction would be in French?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I do not recall this coming to the department. I do not recall it coming to myself, this recommendation from the students, although I do believe I saw something about it in the press.

More recently the association visited us here at Queen's Park—I guess about two or three weeks ago—with the thought of discussing this whole matter.

As you know, we do now instruct in French in two or three of the courses. Pupils write their examinations in two courses in French and Latin, I believe. The department is presently looking at the possibility of translating literally the existing history book. Whether this is possible or not, only time will tell. But we are considering this at the present time.

Mr. Troy: Finally, what is the hon. Minister's opinion in regard to driver instruction in our high schools? I know many of the principals frown on it. I certainly know the safety league endorses it, but what is your opinion?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, the department pays grants on driver education if it is outside the school hours. You might construe this as being in the same area perhaps as—not the physical fitness programme—but perhaps practising football or hockey. Quite frankly, we feel the school today, in both the academic and the technical streams, is full. We are interested in students learning to drive properly, but we feel it is an area that can be accomplished after the regular school hours. This has worked quite well in many schools.

Mr. Troy: The only difference, sir, between the teacher of the driver education and the coach of the team is that the teacher of driver examinations get a special salary. For the coach there is nothing special. He can be there for four hours and gets nothing extra.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, may I ask of the hon. Minister, what is the number of the personnel in the department of physical and health education?

Hon. Mr. Davis: A total, Mr. Chairman, of 20—the director, nine special services inspectors—four secondary and five elementary—six stenographers, and four camp maintenance workers. In addition, 70 are employed on the instructional staff in July and August to conduct the leadership programmes.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, that is 20 in the department itself, not counting clerical staff in all?

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, this is right within the physical and health education—

Mr. Newman: Yes, but I do not care about clerical staff. I am only interested in the number that is actually involved in physical and health education and inspecting.

Hon. Mr. Davis: During the regular year there would be ten, plus the people who are employed on the instructional staff at the two camps during the summer months. These would number 70.

Mr. Newman: Is that a substantially improved number over last year and the year before?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I am just going by memory, Mr. Chairman, but I believe we have added one "phys-ed" inspector each year, for the last two years. I can get this accurately for the hon. member, but I think this is correct. We added one "phys-ed" inspector last year and we have added another this year.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Minister, has the curriculum P-5, Primary Division, been adopted as a required course of study?

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe it has been adopted as a required course of study but it is a reference publication. As the hon. member knows, it is used extensively by many of the "phys-ed" people throughout the province. They regard it rather highly.

Mr. Newman: Have the courses of study for both the intermediate and the senior divisions been revised in physical education?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member is referring to some specific revision, I would suggest the answer would be no. There has been, I hope, a slight change in philosophy as far as physical education is concerned, the change being toward greater participation by the student body in the sporting activities rather than the concentration in certain areas on a specialized few. As the hon. member knows, under the physical fitness programme that we are administering here in the province there is also the philosophy of attempting to create leadership ability and to develop this type of talent in the young person. The course of study that perhaps the hon. member might be referring to directly is the health course, which is under revision. The physical education part of it is pretty much as it has been, except that I understand there is the greater desire to engage more of the students in the physical education activities of the school programme, which I think is very necessary.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, it has always been the desire of physical education people to involve a larger percentage of the students.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well, this may be very true, Mr. Chairman. I know many of them have attempted to do this. I was there not too many years ago; I have been very interested in physical education, and there is still a tendency to develop a very excellent football team or hockey team or basketball team, which is also very natural, and when this happens certain other physical fitness activities must necessarily suffer.

Mr. Troy: They all add to the morale of the school, though.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well, this is important too, I agree; but there is a happy medium.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, there are very few schools which do not stress after-school programmes in addition to the team effort. Has the maximum time allotment for Grades 7 to 13 been set at 120 minutes per week?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I wonder, Mr. Chairman, did the hon. member say Grade 7?

Mr. Newman: Grades 7 to 13.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Grades 7 to 13, that is four periods; yes, this would be roughly 120 minutes per week.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, has physical education been restored as a compulsory subject in Grade 13?

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, it has not been, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Newman: Then, the last question; these are all questions from the physical fitness report of three years ago, and I have another 30 after these. What is the department doing to overcome the serious problem of unqualified physical education teachers in the elementary schools?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, the problem of unqualified "phys-ed" teachers in the elementary schools is related to a degree to the personnel, the salaries being offered, and the fact that in the many areas of the province there are still small schools. We have provided for, under the physical fitness programme, for scholarships for the "phys-ed" courses at the universities. Whether these will appreciably assist at the elementary level is debatable. It is one of those areas which, I think, only a period of time and an excess of personnel will solve.

It is difficult to single out any one particular part of the school programme and say that an instructor in this area is worth "X" dollars more than say in the English field, or music, or some other field; and it is difficult to get a number of qualified people in the elementary school section. While we are debating the secondary school field, I am quite happy to present this information for the elementary field to the hon. member.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, the balance of the questions I will ask under the more appropriate vote; that is vote 511, Ontario fitness programme.

Mr. Troy: Since there is only one section where it says physical and health education, there are a couple of questions I want to ask the hon. Minister.

Last fall, when the funeral of the late President of the United States was being held, a couple of students up in Elliot Lake stayed home with their parents' permission, and then were suspended from school by the board. Not very long ago, sir, in the province of Quebec, in fact in Quebec City, right in the midst of the school year, there was a hockey tournament for youngsters—I do not know just what age, maybe 12 and 13. According to the press 17 teams went down there for this hockey tournament, including a number of schools in this area. I noticed Sault Ste. Marie was represented and I believe in the final game a Toronto team won; they were all school youngsters. I understand also that in order to win in the inordinate desire to get a victory, they used only nine of their best players. And just imagine, too—they had been playing all week—imagine also that youngsters of that age, in order to keep physically fit for the game, had to receive oxygen during the game. And only nine students—this is hearsay evidence, of course, it is from the representative from Sault Ste. Marie who was down there at the time.

What comments does the hon. Minister have to make about all these youngsters, right in the midst of the school year, competing in hockey tournaments who at the end of the week are in such a condition that they had to have oxygen to play? I remember some years ago, because of certain pressures we put on the National Hockey League, Clarence Campbell, the president, directed the National Hockey League clubs that they could not have anything to do with high school students during the school year. But here we have youngsters of that age taken down just as an attraction at the Quebec carnival. Has the hon. Minister any comments to make about that type of policy?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well, Mr. Chairman, I am not sure really what the hon. member wants me to comment on. I am not sure that this really comes under the direct control of The Department of Education. I assume part of the question was to do with the two students of the Elliot Lake high school at the time of President Kennedy's funeral; this is a matter very definitely for the local board, one which I understand was determined at that level.

These hockey tournaments: I am not sure whether the hon. member is referring to the ones which the young people were participating in at Easter or is this—

Mr. Troy: No, no, this was not Easter time; it was right in the midst of the school year. It was some time in February. It was during the Quebec carnival. It was not just a weekend, it was all week. They left on Saturday or Sunday and returned the following Saturday or Sunday.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well, Mr. Chairman, as I see it, there are two aspects to the problem. Can I have any comment as to whether they were away from school as school teams? This I did not gather from the hon. member's question.

Mr. Troy: I presume, under the truancy law, and because of their age, they would be school youngsters. I do not think they are in university or Grades 12 or 13.

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, no. But I did not gather from the hon. member's question whether these were teams under the direction of the local schools, or whether they were associated with service clubs or minor hockey clubs within the municipality. They were not sponsored directly by the school?

Mr. Troy: Oh, no, no. No school would do that.

Hon. Mr. Davis: In that case, Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that this is a matter which must be determined by the local school authority, if they feel some truancy has been committed. If they feel that, to a degree, this has been reflected in their school work this is a matter they must consider. I am very happy to hear that they were not school teams, that they were local teams; and as far as some comment on whether or not I feel they perhaps were extended beyond their physical limits is concerned I think this is going beyond the area in which I have too great knowledge, and where I should pass any comment.

I am concerned; I think we all are, about any young person in athletics being extended beyond his capabilities physically. I think it is one about which we should be concerned, but I believe, and I hope this to be the case, that this does not happen very often. It has not happened, certainly to my knowledge, to many of the school leagues around Toronto. I think perhaps the hon. member is expecting us to go beyond our duties as Ministers and comment on the approach that municipal teams or managers take to their players.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister has said that certain tests are marked by computers so that the results can be sent back very rapidly to the schools concerned. Are some of these tests administered to the Grade 13 students partway through the year?

Hon. Mr. Davis: No. This has been done at the Grade 12 level. These are the papers which were given last year and, as I recall, two years ago, to the Grade 12 level. Some of them were part of the Atkinson study—I am just going by memory again—but they have not been given at the Grade 13 level.

Mr. Nixon: There has been much comment about the possibility of introducing some sort of test part way through the Grade 13 year whereby university registrars might have some advance idea of the general ability of the applicant. It might well be that a test of this nature, which could be marked quickly and would require no special preparation by the students concerned, might be implemented so that the universities in selecting from the applicants from Grade 13 would have more to go on than just the results of the Grade 13 examinations.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, this might be a possibility. It may be an area being discussed at the Grade 13 committee. I think the universities would be better served—and I will check on this, they may even be at this present time—by a fairly comprehensive report of the Grade 12 examinations.

Mr. Nixon: Are these results available to the—

Hon. Mr. Davis: They certainly are available to them.

Mr. Nixon: Are the universities using them?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I am not sure of this. I will check because certainly they are available to them if they desire.

Mr. Nixon: I would also like to ask the hon. Minister for comments on uniformity in the secondary system. He has already said that flexibility is very desirable and with this I am in complete agreement. Nevertheless, within a section of the course, let us say, science in Grade 9 or whatever it may be, surely there is some advantage in the content being uniform throughout the province.

Would he refer also to the advantage of uniformity of presentation? I think particularly of the freedom that the individual boards have in presenting, let us say, physics taught in either Grade 11 or 12 and in the other year, chemistry. This works a hardship on students who move from one area to another. They may find when they leave an area half way through the physics course, that at the other school chemistry is being given. I do not know whether this is still such a problem as it was, but I would like the hon. Minister to comment on this.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I think this goes back a number of years. Perhaps the hon. member will be more familiar with the background than myself but it occurred, as a rule, in the smaller schools and sometimes depended on the staff available. At the present time there is a very high degree of uniformity as to what grade level of physics, chemistry and the other subject areas might be taught. Some of the smaller schools still may vary from the larger schools here in the province. Quite often in these cases it is the question of staff that may bring this about. I think we would agree that it would be desirable to have this uniform across the province and it is certainly headed now in that general direction. There are not too many schools left that are varying from what might be the established norm.

Mr. Nixon: The time might come when the hon. Minister would give an edict on this.

Hon. Mr. Davis: It is possible that we might suggest this.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, is the hon. Minister carrying on studies with other provinces so that mobility of student population from one area to another would be more readily accomplished by standardization in certain programmes?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, this is being discussed. It was on the agenda at the Ministers' conference at the CEA last session. It will be on again. There are some difficulties, although in some areas I am sure the hon. member would have difficulty in understanding why there should be problems. As far as we are concerned here in Ontario, we are very anxious to establish at least some degree of uniformity with our sister provinces. I can assure the hon. member that we are not standing in the way of any such development.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, I notice this Canadian Press despatch of September 6, 1963. It is a statement by the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) but it was read, it says, by "Provincial Secretary Allan." I do not know who "Provincial Secretary Allan" is, but I presume it meant the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan). In the statement, the hon. Prime Minister urges greater use of school buildings in Ontario. Has the department by correspondence and other ways, urged the school boards to throw open their facilities to the community endeavours? I know that the Gladstone Athletic Club here in Toronto sought to make use of a running track in some of the Toronto schools and it was told it could have it at $50 a night. I do not think any amateur club in Ontario would be able to pay $50 a night for the use of a facility like that.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, the speech that my hon. friend is referring to may have related—and I am not sure of this, perhaps to a degree at least—to the use of secondary schools. I regret the hon. member was not there—perhaps he was not invited—I made a speech in his community about a year-and-a-half ago. In fact, one of my first trips outside to visit some of the schools was to North Bay. I can recall at that dinner urging that the facilities, both recreational and educational, in our secondary school plants be put at the disposal of the other community organizations within the municipality. I have re-echoed this view on several occasions.

I think, sir, we must accept the fact that there would have to be minimum charges for janitorial services and so on, but certainly I believe quite strongly that the physical plant facilities should be made available to recognized recreational or educational organizations within the community. I quite agree, Mr. Chairman, that this is something that should be done and is done in very many areas.

Mr. Troy: That visit of the hon. Minister was not an official visit. It might have been to visit a certain organization in my community with which I was not affiliated.

The township of West Ferris is concerned—naturally, like all municipalities—with the expense of education. The reeve of the township has been quoted as suggesting that the school boards have staggered classes, so many in the morning and so many in the afternoon. He carried his project forward to the northern Ontario municipalities and they recommended, at least they endorsed it, and they are going on to the Ontario mayors.

Is there any necessity for special legislation to cope with that situation? Cannot school boards if they wish have staggered classes now? I know that there probably are certain factors that are against it. It may not be as effective as they think it will be but there is nothing in the legislation, is there, against it?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, as the hon. member knows, during the period when school facilities were in short supply, many boards were operating under staggered classroom situations. Of course, I think the experience at that time illustrates that it was not desirable educationally. Sometimes this is forced upon a board due to the lack of facilities, but to be quite frank about it, in the department we do not encourage this because we do not think it is in the best interest of the students. It certainly imposes additional burdens on the staff and our experience is that many of the parents also object to it. We are anxious to find any way to effect economies in the school system, but I suggest there may be other areas that could be explored before this one.

Mr. Troy: But the hon. Minister does not refuse if a municipality wants to go ahead in that regard?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Other municipalities have been able to do it, yes.

Mr. Troy: Apparently the reeve of this township wanted to make it a general move all across the province and he wanted the mayor to support him, that is why I brought it up.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, my hon. colleague brought up the question of the greater use of school facilities. Does the department compensate the local boards of education for the additional expense as a result of this greater use of school facilities?

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, Mr. Chairman, we do not compensate. If the Windsor Greater Basketball League, for example, wishes to make an arrangement with the Windsor board of education for the use of its gymnasium during the winter season for the local basketball league and if the board so desires, then it is up to the board to arrange for whatever cost is necessary to look after, say, the lights or janitorial services, heat and so on. We do not provide extra grants for this type of activity.

There are certain programmes that are administered through the community programmes branch of the department where certain sums may be available to the school boards, but this is very negligible and in most instances the arrangement is made between the board and the organization wishing to use the school.

Mr. Newman: Is the hon. Minister aware that one of the recommendations of the Ontario Fitness Council was that grants be made to compensate boards for such additional expenditures?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I fully appreciate this was one of the recommendations, Mr. Chairman, and there are many recommendations with which I agree in that report as a matter of principle. Some, quite frankly, are very difficult, practically speaking, to bring about. This is one recommendation, as far as the monetary side of it is concerned, with which I perhaps do not agree. I agree with the general principle of using the facilities but I question whether it is up to The Department of Education to compensate the boards. I think this is an area, surely, where the local people can become involved, and this would help the development of a physical fitness programme within the municipality. I think that, somewhere along the line, the local groups must become interested and I think this means financial involvement.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Dovercourt): Mr. Chairman, I am not sure whether my question is on this vote or whether it would be on the next one. I am talking about vocational guidance counsellors. I am thinking of them in terms of secondary schools.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I would think that this would be vocational guidance in the secondary schools.

Mr. Thompson: I am thinking of all schools as well as secondary schools.

Hon. Mr. Davis: We touched on the elementary school guidance problem earlier. I think if the hon. member wishes to ask a question on guidance in secondary school this would be the appropriate place to do so, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Thompson: Fine. Relating to the remarks of the hon. member for York South—I do not want to intrude in his area because we are overlapping—but I am referring specifically to this report of the select committee on manpower training. I would just like to say that, having been a member of this committee, I thought it was a most worthwhile experience for me. I have, on a number of occasions, congratulated the chairman of the committee. But the real test of this committee, in its recommendations, will be whether they are put into practice.

If I may, I will just quote some of the suggestions made in this committee with respect to vocational guidance counselling in all the schools. I am referring to page 79 of the report, and it says:

The need for adequate counselling begins in the public school and does not terminate until an individual finally retires from active participation in the labour force.

Going further on, it says:

Adequate facilities must also be made available at the high school and post-high school levels in connection with guidance. There is a particular vital need at the point of transition between school and employment. All too often the student is left completely to his own resources once he leaves school. The schools no longer assume any responsibility for him and the National Employment Service has only begun to establish a youth counselling service.

At this most critical juncture in their careers, many youths are today without competent advice or counsel. Under these circumstances, it is hardly surprising that so many of them cast about aimlessly for long periods of time.

It suggests in view of these considerations:

It is inconceivable to permit those who have not undergone specialized training to engage in vocational counselling. The work involved is too vital to be entrusted to partially trained amateurs. In the future, therefore, we—and I refer, by “we”, to the select committee:

—we would recommend that nothing less than university graduates with two years of additional specialized training in career guidance be employed for this purpose.

And I would ask the hon. Minister's comment if I could continue my approach on this. Perhaps he might make a note that that is one of my questions.

The suggestion in the report is that we do have only partially trained vocational guidance people, and the experts who came before us are recommending that we should strive toward university graduates with two years of additional specialized training in career guidance employed for this purpose.

We would also suggest that during the course of this training they be compelled to spend considerable time with the National Employment Service. Beyond this, it is to be expected that anyone who makes a career of vocational guidance will make a determined effort to keep up with the latest developments applicable to his work.

And the recommendations with regard to vocational guidance are as follows:

1. Vocational guidance must be accepted as a vital and integral part of our overall education and training system.

2. Expert counselling must begin in the grade school and be continued to be available to all students and workers until they finally retire from the labour force.

I will not go through all the recommendations because I am quite sure that the hon. Minister has read this.

I think one point, it seems to me, is important. The hon. Minister may suggest that it is very difficult to get vocational guidance teachers placed throughout the whole of Ontario at this time. The suggestion is made in this manpower study that there should be a close liaison with the National Employment Service, that if necessary you should have a group of vocational guidance counsellors—a competent team, it suggests—who are in touch with the National Employment and who also would go out on a circuit to various schools.

I notice the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Rowntree) is there, and I am just thinking of the whole area of responsibility of training. We go back again to our friend, the hon. member for Nipissing, who suggested that it was very important, about a manpower study and so on, that there is some purpose the people and the students can see.

As well as that I cannot help feeling that if you have vocational guidance counsellors who are not adequately prepared, if they are not in close touch with the National Employment Service and getting data from all areas—The Department of Labour, industry, unions, and so on—then really these people are travelling blind and perhaps may be doing harm instead of good.

Realizing the importance of this, as I am sure the hon. Minister does, I wonder if he could tell us: Are all the secondary schools covered with respect to vocational guidance counsellors? If not, what kind of approach is taken? Second, how do they fit in with the National Employment Service? And third, since I do not think the hon. Minister has a manpower study, how at this time does the hon. Minister get statistics, and what kind of statistics does he get with the portraying of future opportunities for students?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I am not sure that I fully understand the hon. member's question. It may be that he is expecting too much of the school programme. We were discussing guidance actually earlier this afternoon, when I made some observations about it at the elementary level.

I suggested then that this is one of the very important areas because of the reorganized programme and because of the great change in the technological nature of our community. At the same time I suggested that, guidance not being an exact science, there was a great responsibility still with the parents.

Guidance counselling, or vocational guidance, at the secondary level naturally requires a university degree, and in many instances the counsellors have either their year at OCE or they have summer courses. Last year we had a total of 732 taking the special course in guidance.

We still need qualified individuals. Whether these people need an additional two years beyond the regular programme or not I think it is debatable, because it is not an exact science. It is not like mathematics or some other areas; it requires a great understanding of the students; it requires a relationship, perhaps in this area, which does not exist in many other areas of education.

At the same time I doubt whether many guidance counsellors or vocational advisors can specifically state to a student that this is the profession, or this is the vocation, he should approach. I think they have to look at this in a more general way, and try to determine whether the student is better suited to the general field of academic study, or to the general field of commercial study, or to the general field of vocational study.

I think that to suggest that any guidance counsellor is going to say to an individual, "You will be a tool and diemaker," or "You will be a doctor," is asking a great deal, and perhaps doing the student a great disservice. But I think a guidance counsellor can very definitely help in directing the students into, say, the academic stream, where he may decide even to become a lawyer. Or you can direct him into the vocational stream where he may become not a tool and diemaker but a tool designer.

I think this is the area where perhaps guidance is most appropriately used. I think the reference to guidance counselling in the manpower training report, as I recall, perhaps suggests more than one can expect to accomplish at the secondary level. Perhaps to a degree it refers to some form of counselling or guidance that might be available to the adult population under the retraining programmes.

Mr. Thompson: Sir, I would say that in the manpower study one of the real concerns was direction for young people. I appreciate thoroughly that it would not only be perhaps a fallacy to tell a young person that he should be a tool and diemaker, other than a plumber or something, but also it would be a little foreign to our approach with respect to freedom to mould them so thoroughly. On the other hand there was concern in this manpower study that in this whole area there was a number of students who had not been counselled—I am not going to any length on this thing—and who had drifted without any sense of direction.

The question was: If you are going to have a vocational guidance counsellor, surely one of the things apart from all the personality studies and tests that you give—and I do not know if IQ tests are exceptional today or not—but apart from the variety of aptitude tests you give surely one of the important aspects is that he also is factual. Again it was hard to know how factual he can be. But if he has a number of close contacts with the people who make job opportunities with industry, if he knows of research taking place with the National Employment Service, and perhaps if he has been down to the National Employment Service and worked there for a period, then this is the point I am making, Mr. Chairman.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, there is not sufficient information available, perhaps there never will be sufficient of anything. There is, however, a large bulk of information available to the guidance counsellors as to the specific areas where the demand exists at the moment. As I have stated, this comes through NES, with which we have very close relationship. The NES takes, I think, in many areas quite an active interest in the vocational programme at the secondary level.

But guidance gets back really to the basic problem of determining which general area the students should be encouraged to pursue. I think this is the basic decision that has to be made and the other skills will develop from that point. But we have a good number of guidance people—the 1962 course had 590 and the 1961 course had 349—so I think this indicates to you the increasing interest in guidance in the secondary school programme.

Mr. Thompson: Sir, one of the arguments that has been raised in connection with The Department of Labour looking after the apprenticeship division, and which I do not agree with, is the fact that The Department of Education does not have a close contact with working conditions, with unions and with management. In trying to dig down and see whether there is validity in this, you come back to the point that, well, teachers are academic and they have their school and when you go in through the portals of the school that is another community.

I would suggest from what I am saying that the vocational guidance teacher has not got his tentacles out throughout the community to derive knowledge. And then could I ask you, sir, in view of this—

Hon. Mr. Davis: And the vocational instructors within the schools have a knowledge, too. They are not straight academic people.

Mr. Thompson: Fine. In view of this I would say that this seems to me to be the principal argument on the part of a number of Department of Labour people for making a foster child, an orphan child, of apprenticeship. When I think of the role to give prestige to vocational courses, to technical work, I ask you, sir, because of this and the fact that you tell me that it is not really a valid argument that The Department of Education is in touch with industry and with others, in your terms could you explain to us, why is the apprenticeship branch placed under The Department of Labour instead of under The Department of Education?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I think the answer to that is obvious. Certainly, historically this has been perhaps the appropriate place for it. But times and conditions change and the hon. Minister of Labour and I have been discussing this matter. We are making provision, as you know, for a certain amount of apprenticeship instruction throughout the secondary school programme. This is an area which will be jointly explored by The Department of Labour and The Department of Education. There are arguments that are valid in both directions and these arguments, of course, alter with times and with the circumstances.

Vote 503 agreed to.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves that the committee of supply rise and report progress and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report it has come to certain resolutions and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow I would like to go to the order paper and second readings. Then when we have completed what has to be done there we will return to the estimates of The Department of Education.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 6.00 o'clock, p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

THURSDAY, APRIL 30, 1964

The House met at 2 o'clock, p.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: We are pleased to welcome to the Legislature today as guests, in the Speaker's gallery, members of the Canadian Bible Society, who prior to the opening of the House today made a presentation to the Legislature through the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) a copy of the Bible for the use of the hon. members and the public servants connected with this House.

We also have as guests, in the east gallery, students from St. Clement's School for Girls, Toronto; in the west gallery, students from Deer Park Public School and St. Peter's Separate School, both of Toronto; and in the east and west galleries, students from Grandview Public School and Holy Family Separate School, New Hamburg.

Presenting petitions.

Presenting reports by committees.

Mr. D. A. Evans (Simcoe Centre), from the standing committee on labour, legal and municipal bills, presented the committee's eighth report which was read as follows and adopted:

Your committee begs to report the following bill without amendment:

Bill No. 120, An Act to amend The Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto Act.

Your committee begs to report the following bill with certain amendments:

Bill No. 121, An Act to amend The Municipal Act.

Mr. Speaker: Motions.

Introduction of bills.

THE TEACHERS' SUPERANNUATION ACT

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Teachers' Superannuation Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education): Mr. Speaker, several of these amendments are in the form, really, of administrative improvements.

However, the first section does refer to the change of status of Ryerson Polytechnical Institute. There are two other sections designed to abolish disability pensions, due to the entitlement now to service pensions. Two of these sections fall in line with the amendments to The Pensions Benefits Act. It also provides that where pensions were paid during the month, they will be paid monthly in advance, to simplify the administrative procedures.

The bill also contains a provision whereby on the death of a beneficiary, the payment will carry on to the end of the month. This month-end rule will assist in the efficient administration of the Act.

The balance of it is pretty well administrative and I will have a much fuller explanation on second reading.

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I would like to take the opportunity to inform the House as to a further step that is being taken to assist in alleviating the water shortage, which has been handicapping the farmers of southwestern Ontario.

Hon. members of the House will recall that a few days ago it was announced by the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management (Mr. Simonett) that increased government help would be available for the construction of farm ponds and toward the building of reservoirs. This programme is being undertaken jointly by The Department of Agriculture and The Department of Energy and Resources Management.

A further step in combating the water shortage in this section of the province has been taken by the transfer of an agricultural engineer whose specific responsibilities will be in dealing with farm water problems. He will be located in London. Mr. Vernon Spencer, a graduate of the Ontario Agricultural College and the University of Toronto in engineering, will have specific responsibility within The Department of Agriculture in relation to water problems. He will also co-operate with other engineering specialists within The Department of Agriculture.

In addition, there will be utmost co-operation with the research on water resources being conducted through the Ontario Water Resources Commission and the agricultural college, and with The Department of Energy and Resources Management in carrying out the joint programmes of both departments endeavouring to develop means of alleviating conditions throughout this section of the province.

I can assure the House that this government is fully cognizant of the gravity of the situation and that every possible step will be taken to provide for the future needs of agriculture, as far as an adequate water supply is concerned.

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, in reference to that statement, may I ask the hon. Minister a question?

Mr. Speaker: If the Minister cares to answer.

Mr. Troy: In a recent issue of the North Bay Nugget, Mr. Speaker, I notice that there is a story about, not the same scarcity of water as in southwestern Ontario, but a very severe shortage in Nipissing. Has the hon. Minister given any thought to having one of his engineers located in northern Ontario too, because the water shortage there is acute according not only to the paper, but also a statement of The Department of Lands and Forests?

Mr. Speaker: I wonder would the member ask his question.

Mr. Troy: I am just finishing the question, sir.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, I must confess I did not see this article in the paper that the hon. member has mentioned, but I would like to say that the policy announced by my hon. colleague, the Minister of Energy and Resources Management, applies to the whole province of Ontario, insofar as assistance is concerned. Our extension engineers, operating in The Department of Agriculture, will be available to assist all farmers across the province in every locality. The idea of centring one specialist in this particular area is to co-ordinate the whole programme and to assist the other engineers in the specific areas.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

THE POLICE ACT

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General) moves second reading of Bill No. 99, An Act to amend The Police Act.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

Mr. Speaker: Did the member wish to speak to the bill?

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Yes, I do, Mr. Speaker. Since we are dealing with the principle of this bill, I thought perhaps the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Wishart), or some of his hon. colleagues in the House, would have something to say.

Mr. Speaker, I want to refer briefly to one aspect of this bill, because I think we have a remaining problem after all the travail in considering this in the House. Our task was to achieve a balance between the first, the pre-eminent consideration, namely, protecting the individual rights, and secondly, strengthening the investigating powers of the police commission so that it might be in a better position to cope with the threat of organized crime.

I do not need to review in any detail the fact that by unanimous consent we recognized that we had ignored the rights of individuals and therefore there was an almost unprecedented political storm in this province as a result of which we have had a complete revision of the Act.

Mr. Speaker, in my view, the Act now in almost every conceivable way is framed in a fashion that is going to protect the rights of the individual. Indeed I would go one step further and say that in one or two areas—one particularly that I want to refer to here by way of reviewing a rather lengthy discussion that we had at the committee level—I think we have leaned over too far the other way, with the result that we are going to cripple unnecessarily the very needed power for tracking down information as to the existence and the operation of organized crime in this province.

I am referring to a portion of the new section 17, as in the reprinted bill, to be found in subsection 4. The nub of the issue here, to put it in layman's language, Mr. Speaker, is that under subsection 4 of section 17, it is going to be the right of the witness by request or by consent, to decide whether or not an investigation of the police commission is going to be in camera or whether it will be open. If it is going to be in camera it must be on his request or with his consent.

I would draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that in all of the existing investigating bodies on the North American continent where we are attempting to cope with the same threat of organized crime that we have seen emerge in the province of Ontario, the right to an in-camera session is the basic right of these bodies. They have done it with accompanying legislation or a civil rights statute that has certainly protected the rights of individuals involved to the point that on no occasion have I ever been aware of any outcry as to the violation of individual rights in their activities.

But here we are leaving with the individual who is brought before the commission the decision as to whether or not it is going to be in camera. Now let me go back, just so that there can be absolutely no misrepresentation of what I want to say, Mr. Speaker. I agree that the first consideration is that we have to protect the rights of the individual. But I submit that in his bill we have now done so.

Whether it is an open session or whether it is a closed session, the individual is going to have right to counsel. He is going to have, through his counsel, as is spelled out in the subsections, the remedies by way of habeas corpus, certiorari, prohibition, mandamus and other extraordinary remedies.

He is going to have every protection for a witness available under The Evidence Act. He is going to have all the rights of a witness in the civil court. Indeed, as a result of our discussions in the committee we put this point, subsection 4, in there so that he has all the rights of the civil court in addition to what has been spelled out in detail in advance.

Therefore I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that we have protected the rights of the individual. Now we must take a look at the original objective of this bill; the strengthening of our capacities to get information with regard to the existence and the operation of organized crime. My submission to the committee, and in which I did not succeed in getting a majority decision and approval, was that we have unnecessarily crippled the capacity of the police commission to get this information.

Let us, just for a moment Mr. Speaker, review why you might want to have a closed session. In the first instance you might want to have a closed session for the protection of the witness. If this person is a person who has been involved in organized crime, as we have discussed many times in this House before, he is involved in a world all of his own, in which they have their own laws, their own moral codes, their own forms of punishment. And if he is overstepping the moral code and the rules as laid down in the world of organized crime, it is very possible that within a few days of his emerging from a commission hearing he is going to be clubbed into insensibility in a back alley, or he is going to get a bullet in his back. This is their way. They deal—in a very arbitrary and peremptory manner—with anybody who violates their rules. So there is a very necessary protection of the individual if he is an individual in which there is very good reason to believe he is involved in the world of organized crime.

However, there is an even more important aspect of it, Mr. Speaker. This is the question of the police commission being able to gather evidence in the manner in which you have to do in the intelligence world, in the military, in the navy, or in the air force. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that the proposition that anybody who is involved in what, in essence, is the gathering of intelligence, by forcing him to do this openly, publicly, so that all of his activities and all of the bits and pieces of information that he has gleaned are going to become public information immediately and get into the hands of the "enemy" who, in this instance, are the leaders of organized crime, means that you have frustrated, to the point of nullifying, these activities. Therefore, my contention is that, having protected the rights of the individual in every conceivable fashion, we have leaned over backwards. Now our necessity is that the police commission should have the right to hold in-camera sessions, as is done by the New York crime commission and is done in the American Senate investigations. In so doing there is no threat at all to the rights of the individual.

Mr. Speaker, let me be perfectly fair. I am quite aware of the sensibilities of people with regard to a possible violation of civil rights. I am quite aware—after what has happened politically in this province in the last month or month and a half—as to why these sensibilities are even greater today than they have been in the past. But I think we have to be rational. I think we have to be sensible in our approach to this.

I was interested, for example, to learn in the committee that—I believe I am being fair in saying—the hon. Attorney General tends to agree with me, if he does not agree with me completely. But he left it in the hands of a committee and for this I do not blame him under the circumstances at the moment. But the simple fact of the matter is that there were other people on the committee who, in my view, completely misrepresented it.

For example, when I acknowledged the existence of these sensibilities and said:

Well fine, if you feel that you do not want to leave the decision with the police commission because now, for very good reason, you have become a little anxious about the exercise of arbitrary power on the part of the police commission, could you not amend it to say that if they wanted to have an in-camera session they could appeal this decision to the Lieutenant-Governor in council?

Even this did not find favour. One hon. member—the hon. member for Russell (Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence) for whom I have a growing respect—interjected at that point and said: “This would be Star Chamber.” This is a bit ludicrous to suggest that the situation would be Star Chamber when you have all of these built-in protections for the individual; and when you have an appeal, as I am now suggesting, to the Lieutenant-Governor in council. This, too, was discarded by the committee.

I submit, in summary, Mr. Speaker, that I think we have leaned over so far backward that we are now going to destroy the effectiveness of getting information at what is happening in the world of organized crime.

Let us not forget this, Mr. Speaker. The reason why we are having all this debate; the reason why this bill was brought in, in the first instance, was because the police commission stated in their report to us that they were uncertain as to their powers during an in-camera session. They had gone to the deputy Attorney General and he, too, had said that he was uncertain of the powers. He came back for a clarification and, in the report, they said to us specifically that there were certain reluctant witnesses, people who from general information and from past activities, some of which has been in the courts, involving convictions, are people who are obviously involved with organized crime in this province.

But they simply would not testify. They would not assist the commission in getting the information that was being sought. So, by leaving the power as it is, you are now, in effect, saying to the police commission that it can proceed no further with its work because no more of these reluctant witnesses will come before it and testify. They will say that they will want an open session so that all of their friends in the underworld will know that in an open session, anything that they are compelled to say or is extracted from them willingly or unwittingly, is immediately going to be communicated to “the enemy.”

With that intelligence in their hands, they will be able to take counter measures.

In other words, we are frustrated in our capacities to move forward in coming to grips with organized crime in this province.

We have done it even after including all of these protective measures to safeguard the rights of the individual. I regret it, Mr. Speaker, so I reiterate my views here. I acknowledge there are people in all political parties on both sides of this issue. But I was rather interested the other day, in reading in the Toronto Daily Star, in an article that reports on a meeting which was held in the city of Toronto and addressed by Mark McGuigan the day after the revised Bill No. 99 was brought into the committee. Just let me read two or three paragraphs to you:

New Police Act provisions for private hearings of witnesses are over-restrictive, an Ontario Liberal Party legal advisor suggested in his speech yesterday. A new amendment introduced at Queen's Park yesterday by Attorney General A. A. Wishart shows that the government does not appreciate what is needed to combat organized crime, said Dr. Mark McGuigan, associate law professor at the University of Toronto.

The amendment states that when holding an inquiry the Ontario Police Commission, if a witness consents, takes his evidence in private. The original bill would have given the commission the power to question witnesses secretly without counsel or on threat of jail or fines. That is all very right for responsible citizens, Dr. McGuigan told a meeting of the Toronto Women's Liberal Association at the YWCA, McGill Street, but no member of the Mafia wants his voice testifying in private. Criminals would never consent for fear their associates would suspect them of giving too much information.

So that henceforth you are going to have them testifying in public and communicating everything immediately to the people with whom you are attempting to come to grips.

Mr. G. A. Kerr (Halton): Why did the hon. member not say that a month ago?

Mr. MacDonald: Well, Mr. Speaker, I am not exactly certain as to the significance of the interjection from the hon. member over here. But without getting into an argument, I will say that I have said to this House from the first day this bill was debated, that there was a double-barrelled objective in this legislation; one of them is to protect the rights of the individual; and the second one is to strengthen our arm in getting at organized crime in this province or they will destroy all of our rights. And I said that the first time I rose in this House.

Mr. L. M. Reilly (Eglinton): That is what we have done, we have done both.

Mr. MacDonald: And if hon. members over here did not hear it then, it is about time they quit playing bridge and paid a little bit of attention to the issue. This rather cheap kind of interjection is wholly out of place in a matter as serious as we are considering here today.

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to recapitulate any further, except to say this, that I am convinced that the hon. Attorney General in essence agrees with what I am saying.

And I also know that everybody who is attempting to cope seriously with organized crime on both sides of the border on this continent, tends to agree with the proposition that you must have in-camera sessions. So the responsibility for frustrating the original objective of this bill, that we should be able to cope with the threat of organized crime, now rests with the majority on the government side of the House, with the Liberals going along with them, and all I hope is that in the course of the next year or two, we do not discover that we have to suffer the consequences of not being able to cope effectively with the threat of organized crime.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Speaker, speaking in connection with the principle involved in this bill, and for my hon. colleagues in the Liberal Party, let me say that we have over the past several weeks made as searching an examination of this bill as we felt was possible.

On the Thursday, when the bill was first introduced, it took us a minimum of time—not like some other hon. members in this House—it took us a minimum of time to be aware of what this bill at that time represented. We did not say, as at least one other hon. member of this House was quoted as having said, "Well, maybe it's a little restrictive but the ideas behind it are good." The ideas expressed in the original Bill No. 99 we found thoroughly abhorrent to us. We still find the original ideas as expressed in the first form of Bill No. 99 as thoroughly hateful to democracy.

Mr. Speaker, I think we are as aware as any group in this House of the problems involved in crime, organized crime, syndicated crime, breach of the law, or anything else, that will hurt our democratic system of government. In fact, Mr. Speaker, without repeating what has gone on in previous debates, the reason for the Roach commission and the reason for the police commission's investigation of the Roach commission was the result of speeches and action taken by the Liberal Opposition of that day. As I said previously in this House, sir, we are proud that our leader at that time brought these matters to public attention and awakened public interest and the government's interest, first to recognize that a problem existed and, secondly, to take some action.

But the action indicated, Mr. Speaker, was not to abandon all of our civil rights. It was not to allow an appointed body arbitrarily to take people off the street and hold them incommunicado for unlimited periods of time, to be judge and jury as to whether they were in contempt or not and send them off to jail for eight-day periods, to descend upon their homes and seize all of their documents, to prohibit them from advising anyone under the pain of further penalty, that they had been taken or questioned. Those are the things that we will not stand for at any time.

Mr. MacDonald: Nor will anybody.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for York South, having said his piece, should sit and listen to some of the things that have emerged. It is not too strange to me, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for York South was unaware on the Thursday of the dangers inherent in the original form of Bill No. 99, was unaware on the Friday, and it was only when this debate flowed over on the Monday, after having had a full weekend of public discussion, of front page newspaper editorials and so on, that suddenly he realized that something was at stake.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we come back in the committee and the hon. member for York South is taking it upon himself to say the new bill that is brought in by the present hon. Attorney General is not restrictive enough.

Mr. MacDonald: That is what Mark McGuigan said.

Mr. Singer: I will come to Mr. McGuigan in just a moment. Surely one would have thought that it is the duty of an Opposition party not to assist any government in measures that are restrictive of the rights of citizens. Surely one would have thought that this is one of the prime duties of an Opposition. In saying this, Mr. Speaker, I am suggesting that if this government had felt that the measures in the present Bill No. 99 were something less than they wanted, they had a duty to come in here and tell us why, to make out a case. The hon. member for York South indicates that the hon. Attorney General does not agree with what is in Bill No. 99. The hon. Attorney General has brought in a bill and if the hon. member for York South is right, and the hon. Attorney General has brought in a bill that he does not agree with, then he has no business being Attorney General. Surely we must presume that the bill he has brought in is the bill he wants, is the bill that he thinks is satisfactory. How then can it lie in the mouth of an Opposition member, whose role should be dedicated to defending the rights of the citizens of this province, to say that this is not restrictive enough?

Mr. Speaker, if, in time, the hon. Attorney General wants to come back to us and say, "Problems have arisen, our thinking was incorrect and for reasons A, B and C, we think something more should be done," we, as is our duty, will listen to the case that he makes. And at that time we will judge it. But again, Mr. Speaker, and I cannot emphasize this too strongly, we are never going to be found in the camp of those who advocate restrictive measures, just for the sake of restrictive measures. Our duty, as we see it, is to defend the rights of citizens. Our duty, as we see it, is not to impose restrictions of the type to which the hon. member for York South refers.

He makes reference to what went on as he did in the committee and again this afternoon, in time of war. In the committee he told us what happened to German submarine captains who were captured and brought in for investigation. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that there is something that I, at least, cannot follow in the thinking of the mind of the hon. member for York South. He used the word "caught" insofar as a witness was concerned, before the committee, and in his earlier remarks he talked about people whom you know are guilty when you bring them in for examination. We, in this party, do not believe that a man is guilty until he has been proved guilty beyond all reasonable doubt. We do not believe that somebody whom a police commission wants to examine for any reason—and it might be you, Mr. Speaker, or any hon. member of this House—has been "caught." We do not believe that merely because the police commission has come to an arbitrary decision that it wants to ask Mr. X some questions, that he is in the same position as a German submarine commander, captured in time of war. We think this type of thinking is the most arbitrary type of thinking.

Mr. MacDonald: This is a misrepresentation.

Mr. Singer: We think this is the most dangerous type of thinking that could inflict itself into the democratic process and, as I say, Mr. Speaker, we will oppose any arbitrary measures until the government has been in a position to prove chapter and verse, word by word, that such restrictions are absolutely necessary. Up to this time there has been no such case made out. At this moment, sir, we have Bill No. 99 before us in its present form. If this is not the view of this government, let them stand up and say so. But I think we must conclude that this is the view of the government.

Finally, just a word about Dr. McGuigan. Dr. McGuigan is a very fine young gentleman, who ran as a candidate of ours in the last election. He is learned in the law. He is, in fact, a professor at Osgoode Hall. As with anyone in this province, he has a right to his own opinions. The opinions he expressed, to the extent that they were quoted here, are not opinions that we in this party share in this particular aspect. My hon. friend from York South has brushed off on many occasions, the views of members of his party who are not in the House. The official view of this party, insofar as Bill No. 99 is concerned, are the views that I have been authorized by my hon. colleagues to express and am expressing. I hope, this afternoon.

I suggest to you, sir, that when the hon. gentleman from York South says that in other jurisdictions they allow these arbitrary procedures to carry on, that he has not investigated at all what goes on in any of these other jurisdictions. Comparing the New York crime commission to the Ontario police commission, is like comparing apples to oranges; if he studied it he would know full well that this is the case. Or to compare the Senate investigations in the United States, to the investigations that have been suggested in the original form of Bill No. 99, again, is like comparing apples to oranges. And there is one other very substantial difference—as the hon. Attorney General pointed out in committee—there is a privilege enshrined in the United States constitution, for better or for worse, called the Fifth Amendment, which is jealously guarded through all of its courts. Nobody in the United States can override the privileges as set forth in the Fifth Amendment. And the hon. member for York South would know this if he wanted to make a real study of the problem and not try to throw red herrings across the trail.

I say, sir, that Bill No. 99, as presently presented, is not too unreasonable in its approach to this problem. My grave reservations, insofar as this whole scheme is concerned, are these. I have great difficulty in reconciling in my mind the gentlemen who presently make up the police commission, with the type of action with which they are now charged. However, sir, this does not lie with us. We do not have the task of appointing them, nor can we remove them. The government has appointed them and the government, as the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) said on Monday, is responsible, and he is responsible, for their actions. But we have grave doubts in our minds as to whether or not the gentlemen who make up that commission in view of their arbitrary thinking, as expressed in their report, should be the people charged with this very serious responsibility.

As I say, sir, we are not going to concern ourselves, nor is it our job, with the way in which individual members of the civil service conduct themselves, other than to point the criticism to the hon. gentlemen who occupy the front benches. The hon. Prime Minister, as he rightly admitted, is responsible for the introduction of the original Bill No. 99. He and no one else. And if there is something wrong in the present police commission, it is the hon. Prime Minister's fault and we think now the public is aware of where this responsibility belongs.

Just one little aside, Mr. Speaker, and then I am through. Even in commonsense, other than in analyzing the philosophy of the hon. member for York South, I cannot comprehend the case that he makes, that the gentleman who he believes would be called before the commission and who is in danger of having a bullet in his back, or a knife put into him in the place that would do him no good, is going to be most anxious to have a public hearing. It would seem to me that a person who had these fears would be most anxious to let nobody know that he was going within miles of any police commission and rather than being urged to ask for an in-camera hearing, if—as his privilege is in this bill, and he knows it—he has the privilege of doing it, he would be the first one to be most anxious to say, "Do not tell anybody; if I have to come, please do not tell anybody I am here."

For all of these reasons, Mr. Speaker, we certainly express as strongly as we can our violent disagreement, not only with the suggestion put forward by the hon. member for York South, but with all of the thinking that lies behind it as he has expressed from the Thursday afternoon on, when this bill was first introduced.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I am not going to abuse the rules of the House by repeating my arguments here, but I just want to say this—

Mr. Speaker: Point of order?

Mr. MacDonald: Point of order! I have never on any occasion said that I am in favour of an arbitrary exercise of power. I am opposed to it; that is why I was opposed to the original Bill No. 99 and I am in favour of this one because I think we have removed that danger. The second and final point that I want to make, Mr. Speaker, is that it is all very well for the hon. member for Downsview to say that there is all the difference in the world between the New York commission and the American Senate investigation commissions and the original Bill No. 99. Of course there is all the difference in the world. But the difference perhaps between the hon. member for Downsview and me is that I accept the fact we have killed the original Bill No. 99. It is dead and I suggest to you that there is no difference in essence between the American Senate investigations and the New York crime commission and the investigations empowered under the new Bill No. 99, except that in the United States they generally have secret sessions.

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Speaker, in moving second reading of Bill No. 99, I did not speak to it at the time for the reason that as the hon. members of this House are aware, the bill had been referred after the first reading, to the standing committee on legal bills and with instructions that section 14 be deleted. This was done. In the committee the bill as now presented, was discussed by the committee, clause by clause, and very thoroughly considered in every respect there. Now that it has come back to the House for second reading, it is my thinking that it will then be debated in committee of the whole House, perhaps again clause by clause, and it is perhaps scarcely necessary to speak to the bill at any length, at least on second reading.

I note that the discussion today in the House is related apparently solely to one section, that is the present section 17 of the bill. I would say this, that there are certain other amendments in the bill as it now comes before the House and that these other amendments are of considerable significance and I know that they will come before the House in committee of the whole for discussion. But I shall confine my remarks to section 17, because the discussion, as it has so far taken place, has been with respect to section 17.

I should like to take occasion, Mr. Speaker, to say this to correct something which was a very great misapprehension, a great fear, based upon a lack of knowledge—a lack of knowledge of what was in the original section 14 and what it implied, which perhaps fomented or furthered ideas which were baseless and without any ground whatsoever. First of all, I would like to say this, that the original section did not take away the right of a witness to have counsel. That was not in the section and yet it was broadcast and rebroadcast repeatedly without any hon. member taking the trouble to deny it.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Who started it?

Mr. Singer: That is not what the former Attorney General (Mr. Cass) said.

Mr. Bryden: Who started it?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I say it was not there and I say I heard no one deny it. The rights of the witness to habeas corpus and to certiorari were not taken away and I heard no one take the trouble to deny it. I say this to correct a wrongful impression that went abroad and created a great fear and apprehension in the mind of the public.

Now we come to the section under discussion and to the particular portion of it. The words that were in the original section—and I shall read those words—said “for the purpose of an inquiry” under subsection one:

The commission may summon any person and require him to give evidence on oath in camera or otherwise and to produce such documents and things as the commission deems necessary.

This was one of the great things which was played up—the in camera, the secret hearing, the Star Chamber. An impression went abroad across this country that one would almost think witnesses could be brought in there and pulled up by their thumbs and tortured to give evidence which, of course, was so fantastic and so far from the fact that it deserves now to be said that this was just so fantastic that it was entirely unbelievable that this could happen. However, this was one of the great fears which was built up by various means and it was one of the things that we attempted to allay.

There was, therefore, in this section, an attempt to spell out clearly and specifically, that witnesses had certain rights in this type of hearing before a commission made up of persons who are not judges, a body which is not a court; a body which was investigating the broad field of crime. It became necessary and, I think, very advisable to spell out there the rights which the witness would have and always enjoy, many of which he enjoyed under the section as it stood.

We are discussing here today, as I understand it, the question of the advisability of having an in-camera or secret hearing. In this I would like to say to the House I speak for myself and for the government and I need no one to tell me what my views are or what the government's views are. This bill as presented is the bill which the government presents to this House and it contains the views of the government. In the bill as presented, the section now is that:

(4) Upon the request or with the consent of a witness at an inquiry under this section, his evidence shall be taken in private.

That safeguard is included in order that no witness may fear to come before this commission, in this type of hearing, and be afraid that the fact that he is there will be published abroad or that what he says there before the commission will be published. This is so that he need not fear that he will be found in a field the next day with a bullet in his back.

That is the reason for the secrecy being placed at the discretion of the witness, so that he can say, “I have a story to tell you but I will only tell it, I can only tell it, in the circumstances if you will afford me absolute secrecy that what I say shall not be known.” That is there and spelled out along with the other safeguards upon which I do not need to dwell.

In fairness, particularly to my friend the hon. member for York South, I must say this, I did admit in committee, and I admit it here, that this is the bill as presented, this is the policy of the government, this is the policy presented to the committee and this is right and proper. However, there are occasions, and I agree with the hon. member to this extent, when hearings in camera have their value, when things can be learned in such security that cannot be learned in public. There are occasions of this kind but this is an area in which we face, in this type of situation, a great sensitivity and a great sensibility—as to the paramount consideration of making certain that a witness who will come before this commission and tell his story may do so with the utmost and the most absolute safety to himself, to his family, and to his friends and relatives.

This, I think, must be done. Whether in the course of time it may appear that something further should be done to give the commission on some occasion the possibility of holding a hearing in camera is something that would have to develop. I would draw your attention to the fact that the subsection which I have just read does say that the commission:

Upon the request, or with the consent of a witness—

I think there is quite a field there for the commission to say to a witness who comes forward and is prepared to give his evidence in public “we would like with your consent to have this in private.” True, the commission is at the behest of the witness. He can say no and the commission must conform. It must be held in public. But we have thrown this safeguard around the witness rightly, properly and fully and there can be a very honest difference of opinion here. Much can be said on certain occasions for the value of a hearing in camera, but I think that in the circumstances we face where we are dealing with such a dangerous subject as crime and where the danger to the witness is so great we must take, as our paramount consideration, the protection of the witness.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE INSURANCE ACT

Hon. Mr. Wishart moves second reading of Bill No. 102, an Act to amend The Insurance Act.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Speaker, this amendment to Bill No. 102—I think I need speak very briefly about it—simply is an amendment to bring about certain administrative changes. They are very simple and I would say in general, self-explanatory. The “Minister” it defines as the “Attorney General”. Dealing with the departmental administration there are certain additions as to the type of records to be kept, the audit, and statistical returns which are to be maintained by the department. The type of statements which are to be filed, and so on, are the subject matter of this bill. It makes no change in the principle of the Act as it now exists but simply fortifies and improves certain of the administrative features of the present Act.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE WAGES ACT

Hon. Mr. Wishart moves second reading of Bill No. 108, An Act to amend The Wages Act.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: This bill reduces generally the exemption of wages, in the sense that it increases it on one side and reduces it on the other from 30 per cent to 25 per cent, giving the wage-earner that much more protection where garnishee proceedings are taken to attach his wages. This is the main purpose of the bill.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, I think everyone in the House will probably agree with the basic purposes of the Act.

There are some implications, though, that are not entirely clear to me and I would like to raise the matter with the hon. Attorney General now. Perhaps he could consider what I have to say with a view to making amendments in committee, if in his opinion and the opinion of his legal officers, such amendments are necessary.

The difficulty that I can see here arises in connection with this matter of wage assignment. I think I can understand what the hon. Attorney General has in mind in trying to limit voluntary wage assignments, but what would happen to assignments a man makes, for example, to a credit union? As I see it, the activities of credit unions could be interfered with a way that is not necessary or desirable by the bill as it stands. I would appreciate it if, between now and the time the bill goes either to special committee or committee of the whole, the hon. Attorney General would take a look at it from that point of view.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I thank the hon. member for the comment. I take it he is referring to the general content of section 2 of the bill?

Mr. Bryden: Yes, that is right, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: We shall be glad to consider that and I trust when we come to the committee of the whole we will be able to satisfy the inquiry that the hon. member has.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE ONTARIO WATER RESOURCES COMMISSION ACT

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer), in the absence of hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs), moves second reading of Bill No. 124, An Act to amend The Ontario Water Resources Commission Act.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE ONTARIO HURRICANE RELIEF FUND ACT, 1955

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour) moves second reading of Bill No. 125, An Act to amend The Ontario Hurricane Relief Fund Act, 1955.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE PUBLIC HOSPITALS ACT

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health) moves second reading of Bill No. 128, An Act to amend The Public Hospitals Act.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE PUBLIC SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT

Hon. Mr. Allan moves second reading of Bill No. 129, An Act to amend The Public Service Superannuation Act.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION ACT

Hon. Mr. Davis moves second reading of Bill No. 130, An Act to amend The Department of Education Act.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE SCHOOLS ADMINISTRATION ACT

Hon. Mr. Davis moves second reading of Bill No. 131, An Act to amend The Schools Administration Act.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE PLANNING ACT

Hon. Mr. Allan, in the absence of hon. Mr. Spooner, moves second reading of Bill No. 132, An Act to amend The Planning Act.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, I did want to say a word or two on this, but it is not perhaps fair to the hon. Provincial Treasurer to ask him a somewhat technical question relating to this.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, if we could leave this over, I will call that order again.

Mr. Speaker: Did the member wish to ask a technical question on sections of the bill or—

Mr. Singer: It is partly the principle, but again, in any one of these sort of omnibus bills it is difficult to debate the principle—

Mr. Speaker: You wish to debate the principle as well?

Mr. Singer: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

THE MOTHERS' ALLOWANCES ACT

Hon. L. P. Cecile (Minister of Public Welfare) moves second reading of Bill No. 134, An Act to amend The Mothers' Allowances Act.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

ONTARIO HOUSING CORPORATION

Hon. S. J. Randall (Minister of Economics and Development) moves second reading of Bill No. 135, An Act to incorporate the Ontario Housing Corporation.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a word or two about Bill No. 135. The hon. Minister in his estimates seemed to think that Bill No. 135 was the magic answer to all of our housing problems and I would hope that he is right, Mr. Speaker, but as I have read this Act carefully and as I have read the hon. Minister's references to it, the light just has not dawned on me as yet.

He is doing away with the Ontario housing advisory committee and setting up the Ontario housing corporation. The hon. Minister has suggested to us that this is going to cut down a lot of the red tape. I would sincerely hope this end is achieved. But I would like to know how the Ontario housing corporation is going to be able to deal better with the multiplicity of authorities that now exist in the housing field, than the present machinery. What I had rather hoped for when the hon. Minister was moved to bring in a new Act, was some sort of new approach that would cut down on the number of people who had to pass these various housing plans. There is no mention of this at all in the Act, and I was not too clear in my own mind, as the hon. Minister replied to our criticisms in his estimates the other day, that the hon. Minister had really turned his mind to this particular problem.

Is it the hon. Minister's thought that the Ontario housing corporation is going to be able to cut down on the number of authorities that are going to have to pass new plans for houses? And if so, how is this going to work? In Metropolitan Toronto, for instance, is there still going to have to be various reviews taken by the local planning board, by the local council, by neighbouring planning boards and neighbouring councils, as it might affect them? By the Metropolitan council, by the Metropolitan planning board, and so on?

I would hope that there is something in this Act that I missed that will lead to some clarification, and I anxiously await the hon. Minister's word as to how this situation is going to be cleared up by this bill.

Hon. S. J. Randall (Minister of Economics and Development): Mr. Speaker, answering the hon. member, I think first of all we have removed some of the main restrictions that we have to contend with on our present basis of borrowing 75 per cent from the federal authorities. In other words, the federal authorities are quite prepared to give the Ontario housing corporation almost the same freedom of action as they give Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in Ottawa. In the first place, I think that will speed up the programme for housing, and secondly, the problems that the hon. member brings still exist, I think, and many of them will continue to exist, because of the nature of the programme of building houses in various municipalities, with their various restrictions. I do not think it is possible to say that we will eliminate all of those difficulties, but I certainly think that now that we have—let us say—more freedom of action to plan the housing programme for this province, we will certainly be able to speed up the negotiations of these various parties, if not to eliminate a good many of them.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

SHERIDAN PARK CORPORATION

Hon. Mr. Randall moves second reading of Bill No. 136, An Act to incorporate the Sheridan Park Corporation.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY ACT

Hon. Mr. Allan moves second reading of Bill No. 137, An Act to amend The Legislative Assembly Act.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE HOTEL FIRE SAFETY ACT

Hon. Mr. Wishart moves second reading of Bill No. 139, An Act to amend The Hotel Fire Safety Act.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

Clerk of the House: The 27th order. House in committee of supply; Mr. W. G. Noden in the chair.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION

On vote 504:

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence (Russell): Mr. Chairman—I will let the hon. member's question go ahead, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Mr. Chairman, I wanted to ask the hon. Minister of Education (Mr. Davis) to what extent parts of the courses that are given at the Ryerson Institute are offered at vocational schools across the province—that is, the same courses?

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education): Mr. Chairman, I was going to deal with that perhaps to a degree with the Ryerson vote, but really we have covered Ryerson rather thoroughly already.

We have two or three schools or boards that are offering the first year of Ryerson. It is offered here in the city of Toronto. Actually, now there are five such centres: the city of Toronto; London, at the Beal Technical School; Sault Ste. Marie; Sarnia and Kingston. These cities have been granted this right for next year.

Looking somewhat to the future of Ryerson and discussing some of the possibilities with its principal, Dr. Kerr, we are seriously studying the extension of this programme to other communities. We feel there is some merit in this economically. It will enable students to remain within their home community for an additional year and, at the same time, use some of the technical facilities that exist at established schools.

Now the plan has not become a matter of any firm policy yet, but it has worked reasonably well here in Toronto. We have had, I think, very excellent results in London and we are extending it to these three other communities next fall. We intend to hold discussions with the principal of Ryerson and their new board of governors to explore further the possibility of doing this in those areas that cannot be easily served by an existing, or perhaps a planned institute of technology.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, just to pursue this a bit. Do the high schools that present this part of the course require additional facilities to what is presently there for the regular vocational courses?

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, my understanding is that the facilities that are used are the ordinary facilities, that they have not had to extend them for this particular course. They will not be required to do so until we decide whether we will do this as a matter of permanent policy.

Mr. Nixon: So no special grants are given to the schools that—

Hon. Mr. Davis: They are paid the usual grant for this.

Mr. Nixon: Is there any thought that perhaps the work that would be done at a trade school, I believe you call them—

Hon. Mr. Davis: Vocational centres!

Mr. Nixon: Vocational centres—that the work that is normally accomplished in a vocational centre could also be done by the regular vocational section in the collegiates across the province?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well, Mr. Chairman, this is a possibility, except that we feel that if the work being done in vocational education is considered by levels, there would be the secondary school as the first level, the vocational centre as the second level, and the technical institute and the specialized work at the vocational centre as the third level. It is possible, but I think that perhaps there would not be as much merit in trying to do vocational centre work at the secondary schools. But if we find that the vocational centres are being taxed to capacity and that the courses are proving useful, we would certainly explore doing this in the secondary school facilities, if this were necessary.

Mr. Nixon: There certainly is, Mr. Chairman, the merit in the fact that the facilities are there, offered in profusion; and that if they could be worked into these other streams of technical and vocational training, it would be very useful and economical, too, I would think.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Yes, well this is our feeling as well. We want to see that many of these new vocational additions are used to the maximum of their capacity. Of course we will not be in a real position to see how this can be done until the vocational centres themselves are opened and established, and until the reorganized programme extends into Grades 11 and 12 and we see the student population that will be pursuing these courses. But very definitely, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member's observation is well founded. We all want to use these existing facilities to their maximum potential.

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence: Mr. Chairman, my remarks are going to be a little more extended than a question, but not much over ten minutes, on a subject which I started to raise yesterday a little more broadly than was permitted at that time. The subject I want to discuss, Mr. Chairman, is post-secondary school education, post-high school education in the province generally, and I started off by referring to it under the heading of senior education and including as a form of definition for the word "senior" in the use I was proposing, those people who are close to the age of 18 and who have completed Grade 12 level, or what used to be called in our day, I think, junior matriculation.

First, Mr. Chairman, I want to outline for a few moments very briefly, some of the problems which are very familiar to us. I think we have discussed them in this House and we certainly have found them in our own families and our own experience. I might tabulate them, with your permission, Mr. Chairman.

First, the problem of university enrolment and the oft-described tidal wave of students with which the universities and the provincial and federal governments will have to cope. Second, the problem of quality of students and the dreadful wastage by way of failure in the first and second years, particularly, of university. Third, the problem of sheer size and physical management that faces the University of Toronto in particular.

Fourth, the problems facing the universities in their fight to maintain high standards and their oft-repeated objective of excellence. And allied with this is their plea for more financial support of post-graduate work and for a larger proportion of post-graduate students. Fifth, the problem, the demand for more training and more retraining in the technical, vocational, industrial and quasi-professional skills which are required more and more from day to day by technology and automation. Sixth, the problem of the future of Grade 13, a grade which, as has been mentioned in this House very recently, is unsatisfactory for many students, is of concern to The Department of Education and the universities themselves.

Finally the last and perhaps the most important, the problem of financing education for more people and its impact upon students, universities and the taxpayers.

Mr. Chairman, I have mentioned those seven particular problems. They are readily discernible to a layman's eye and as a layman I would like to suggest, sir, to the hon. members of this House, some solutions for these problems. The first step, I submit, in finding a solution is to realize that all of the problems mentioned fall within one definable and comprehensible field—the field I have defined as senior education—and involve one task, that of providing a varied and comprehensive system of education for all our adults and post-secondary school population.

The second step follows from this, I suggest, and requires that the government of Ontario establish a department of senior education, organized and qualified to deal with senior education in all its aspects. University affairs would, in my submission, become a division of such an overall department.

Next, I suggest that the department proceed with all deliberate haste—this would be the new department of senior education that I am suggesting—to establish a system of what are variously described as junior colleges or, by another name, community colleges or two-year colleges, across the whole of the province.

These community colleges would comprise a complete and distinct section of our whole educational system. Their responsibility would be to provide for two years, and in some cases three years, further education beyond Grade 12. The courses offered would provide: firstly, Grade 13, and first-year and in some cases second-year university equivalent for students wishing to go on to university after community college; secondly, vocational, industrial, commercial, technical, agricultural and home economics training leading to employment in those specific fields; thirdly, general and liberal arts courses.

These community colleges would not be a mere extension of high schools. They would not be controlled by The Department of Education, they would be organized on the same pattern as the present universities with local boards of governors reflecting local situations and closely identified with the needs, the interests and the personality of local communities in which they would be situated.

Apart altogether from our cities, I can picture, Mr. Chairman, some towns, often county towns, in this province ideally suited as locations for community colleges. Their financial support would be a blend of provincial, federal, municipal and student support, with the province carrying the main burden and the support from the students being essentially nominal. I would foresee, Mr. Chairman, local charitable and industrial support being greatly encouraged, and I am sure it would be forthcoming as one pictures the local communities receiving the benefit of such educational opportunities.

Not all students, in my mind, sir, going beyond Grade 12 would be required to enter community colleges. However, only those having excellent scholastic records would be directed to university, short-circuiting community college. This would mean that only excellent students and those who mature early from an academic point of view would move to Grade 13 in the present academic high school course and then straight to university. As a result, the universities would be asked to accept, firstly, only the very cream of the students graduating from high school, and secondly, students who have passed through the university preparatory courses of the community colleges themselves.

Mr. Chairman, the new department would, I repeat, in no way be an extension of the existing Department of Education. The universities must remain as independent of governmental and political interference as they are today. Once established, the community colleges should be encouraged to achieve an independence similar to that enjoyed by the universities. The new department's responsibility would be limited basically to the following fields: firstly, the provision of financial support of the universities and community colleges, and secondly, acting as a co-ordinating agency and a clearing house for advice and information between the universities as a group, the community colleges as a group, The Department of Education, The Department of Labour, The Department of Economics and Development, and all the professions.

Mr. Chairman, as all hon. members of this House and all persons interested in this topic know, there is essentially nothing new in the proposals placed on record by me at this time. The junior colleges or community colleges or two-year colleges, as they are variously called, form part of a movement developed several generations ago in the United States. They have played a very significant part in the educational systems of some 42 of the states of their union. From all I can learn, sir, the recognition of their importance generally has been accelerating.

Nor is debate concerning their introduction new in this province. In fact, 14 years have passed by us since the Royal Commission on Education in Ontario, the Hope commission of 1950, came forward with unreserved and sweeping recommendations for the introduction of a comprehensive junior college system for Ontario. One may disagree with the techniques and details recommended by the Hope commission, but the reasoning and the principles of the recommendations have become, I feel, sir, more valid with every passing year.

In the United States, with its tremendous resources for research, we find a steady flow of books, reports, commissions, committees and legislatures weighing the merits of the community college system and confirming its value. In 1947 the President's commission on higher education reported to President Truman:

As one means of achieving expansion of educational opportunity and the diversification of educational offerings it considers necessary, this commission recommends that the number of community colleges be increased and that their activities be multiplied.

In 1957 the President's commission on education beyond high school reported to President Eisenhower:

These institutions respond to the increasing demand for a greater variety of more accessible training and education, while at the same time helping other colleges and the universities to concentrate a greater proportion of their energies than would otherwise be possible on upper division, graduate and professional work.

And it went on to say:

Community colleges are not designed, however, merely to relieve an enrolment pressure on senior institutions. They have a role and an integrity of their own. They are designed to help extend and equalize opportunity to those who are competent and who otherwise would not attend college, and present a diversity of general and specialized programmes to meet the needs of diversified talents and career goals.

This committee, Mr. Chairman, went on to discuss the opportunity which community colleges provide for students to live at home and often to continue in part-time employment. In addition, it stressed the ability of community colleges to provide special services and educational opportunities for adults in their local communities.

In his book, Citadel of Learning, President Conant, of Harvard, referred to the important way in which junior colleges could relieve the tremendous physical burden on universities. President Sproul of the University of California has written of their significance as a part of higher education in the state of California. He mentions the different purposes they can serve when compared with university extension centres and the advantages involved in their lower cost-per-student for education.

More recently, in 1960 and in 1962, the United States Department of Health, Education and Welfare published reports on research, including detailed recommendations as to how best a jurisdiction should proceed in developing two-year colleges and how they may be financed. There is also available an extremely interesting and exhaustive study made in California, entitled The Master Plan for Higher Education in California, 1960 to 1975. This survey covers the whole field of higher education in that state in great detail and emphasizes the extremely important role which junior colleges have played and should in future play in that particular state.

The California study, sir, foresees the role of community colleges expanding over the years and gives these reasons: First, easy accessibility to students and the consequent reduction in cost to students. Second, the high scholastic records made in both state colleges and universities by junior college transfers. Next, the junior college screening function of indicating those students most likely to succeed in their education beyond the lower division. Fourth, a means of permitting the universities and state colleges to place increased emphasis on upper division and graduate programmes. Next, a means of preventing the state colleges and universities becoming unmanageably large. And finally, a provision of a cost per student to the state for both operation and plant at a lower figure than state colleges and the university are able to achieve.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I would like to refer to three recent Canadian sources of comment on community colleges. The first is a book published in 1962 by Professor Macdonald of the University of British Columbia. This comprises a survey of higher education in the province of British Columbia and a number of strong recommendations for education in the future in British Columbia. Professor Macdonald reviewed the whole field in depth and recites the problems of post-secondary education which are essentially the same throughout North America. In the result, he comes out strongly with the recommendation that his province develop a system of community colleges. I feel, Mr. Chairman, that his reasoning is as valid in Ontario as in British Columbia.

When we discuss community colleges, we are not dealing with a matter of mere educational technique, we are dealing with a fundamental answer, I suggest, to fundamental challenges—challenges arising out of the very nature of modern North American society itself.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, in concluding my references to sources, I would like to refer to certain authoritative opinions which are very close to home and very topical. They are expressed in speeches delivered very recently by Dean Smyth of Atkinson College, York University, and by Dr. Bissell, president of the University of Toronto. In fact, they are so topical that they have appeared since I began putting together my notes for these remarks today.

Dean Smyth deals with the basic problem of the need for new answers to new questions and believes that the community college idea deserves serious consideration in Ontario. He suggests as a first step in this province, that community colleges be established on an experimental basis in centres which at this moment have no local institutions of higher learning. And in addition, he is of the opinion that community colleges could perform a most useful function in the field of adult education.

Dr. Bissell in his speech suggests that Grade 13 be turned into a university preparatory year for students with scholastic aptitude and that community colleges be developed for the purpose of giving two-year courses after Grade 12 in technical, academic and artistic subjects for young people and adults. He would relate the courses to the interests and needs of the communities in which the community colleges again were placed.

Mr. Chairman, the reasons for the rather slow acceptance of the community college idea in Ontario are probably these: First, a fear that the community colleges would be mere "ersatz" universities—wasteful imitations of the real thing. Second, a fear that they would draw faculty and public funds away from our hard-pressed universities. Third, we were fully occupied with the great projects involved in the growth of our present university system in this province.

But, sir, fears do not solve problems, and we still face the problem of exploding university enrolments, the problem of wastage of failures, the risk of overly large institutions, the need for a larger post-graduate population in our universities, the need for more training for more people, the problem of Grade 13 and the problem of financing our educational needs.

However, in 1964, I feel that the opinions of our university presidents, of the academic world and of the public, despite difference in emphasis, have converged to such an extent that the government of Ontario and we laymen of this House can now give active, useful leadership in a common assault on these problems by establishing a community college system in this province.

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Chairman, I do not think that this is under this vote, but it will probably come up under university affairs. I am very pleased to hear the hon. member bring up community colleges, because I think they have a lot of merit and serve a place in the overall educational picture.

Earlier in the debate we had a mention of trades training and the use of the vocational school for trades training. It does have some merit but it is only a stopgap measure. You are confronted with a discipline problem in a school when you try to combine the normal technical day schooling and then the trades training immediately after. You have two different ages of individuals attending the school and as a result—I should not say as a result—but generally those who are taking the trades training do not have the educational background that we would like to see them have, and as a result there are certain types of problems that the youngster is confronted with if he stays in after school, meeting the individual taking trades training.

However, the trades training should not be forgotten and I think the hon. Minister should seriously consider setting up the trades training institutes as was recommended in the manpower training report. It mentions: "It will thus be necessary for the government to establish more trade schools and to disperse them more widely across the province". I stress the point "widely" because you have three trades training centres in the Toronto area; one is being set up in London and I think there is one in Ottawa. One is contemplated in Hamilton, and then in Welland. Well, if you are going to distribute your trades training centres widely—I would say to use the word “widely” in its full extent, that is, spread them out a little farther apart—my own community has been after a trades training school now for quite a number of years because of the labour difficulty. When I say “labour difficulty”, I mean the unemployment picture—and I certainly think that more consideration should have been given to the community for the establishment of a trades training centre. Not only a committee of interested citizens but the Unemployment Insurance Commission has recommended this. The mayors’ committee has recommended the establishment of a trades training school or a vocational centre, as is the common appellation now, and I would certainly hope that the hon. Minister would not wait until the time that conditions in my community have reversed themselves to the difficult days, but think seriously of planning for one now so that within two or three years the vocational centre could be a reality.

In 1958, the department set up a Western Ontario Institute of Technology. In 1959 and 1960 I discussed this in this House and the comment always was that it had not proved its value. They were a little hesitant to expand the institute there because they did not know if it would work or not. Well, the institute is now operating very efficiently. However—and while I am at this may I say that it is in five different buildings in the one complex—the facilities in there are not of the best. The students make do with what they have and they are most appreciative of having even this type of facility. However, the day has arrived when the hon. Minister should seriously consider setting up a new Western Ontario Institute of Technology.

Not too long ago a delegation from the local community met with the hon. Minister. He received them very cordially and gave them assurances that it would be set up within—I think it was mentioned—three years. May I say that when General Motors decided to set up a plant in the local community—and that was a body trim plant—they decided that within one year they would have the plant in operation.

Hon. Mr. Davis: They have more money than the department.

Mr. Newman: Not in Canada though.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I am not sure about that.

Mr. Newman: In the United States they may have, but not in Canada.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Maybe they would help pay for it, then.

Mr. Newman: The bare assets are not as great as the province’s assets in Ontario.

I would like to ask of the hon. Minister at this time to what extent have arrangements been made for the setting up of a new Western Ontario Institute of Technology in the Windsor area? Have the properties been purchased?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, the properties have not been purchased. There have been two or three sites which have been explored, if this is the correct terminology. I have had several recommendations from not only the city of Windsor as far as site is concerned, but from two or three of the municipalities surrounding Windsor. The site selection is under active consideration and, as I told these young people who were up to visit with the hon. member and myself some few weeks ago, I hoped we would be in a position in the not-too-far-distant future to establish where the site might be.

I explained at that time that there was some interest in having it, perhaps, located in a downtown area. I indicated that, perhaps, the preference of the department would be for a larger acreage, perhaps 15 or 20 acres, where certain recreational facilities might be provided. But I can assure the hon. member that I have not forgotten the visit of these young people to this department, and we certainly will let them and the hon. member know just as soon as a site is selected.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, if I may say of the hon. Minister, I always hear this story: That we are progressing, that we are having difficulty in purchasing properties, and so forth. How is it the department always seems to have difficulty, but private industry never seems to have difficulty arranging the purchase of properties?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I do not imagine the difficulty is involved in the actual purchase. I do not think the government has any difficulty in the mechanics of purchasing a piece of property. But certain considerations must be taken into account and, of course, there is always the problem of finding the funds that are required. This is what determines the expansion of any programme of this type.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister leaves us in the community with the idea that he is sort of neglecting, or disregarding us. He sees the need there. He sees the programme has proven itself. He knows that in the coming year the programme is expanding and that it is going to take in commercial education also. He is going to be using another building. As it is his department now uses two different gymnasium facilities. There are five different buildings in the complex and he is going to add to it another building in the following year. Surely the department should hasten the day when we, back there, can look with pride and see a nice new Western Ontario Institute of Technology.

Now we have 400 students. Next year's contemplated enrolment, I think, is 525. Inside of three years—I understand it takes, normally, three years from the drawing up of the plans until the student actually enters the classroom—I certainly would like to see the hon. Minister speed up things if he would for the local area. Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Davis: We will do our best.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Chairman, I want to remind myself and the House that at the moment we are discussing the technological and trades training branch because, while I acknowledge there are difficulties in these divisions that become blurred, and I will have to stray momentarily beyond the division, I reiterate this is where we are. I have a basic question that I want to ask the hon. Minister, then elaborate on it and then come back to the question. My question is: Where, in heaven's name, are we heading in this field?

Yesterday, when we started the estimates, the hon. Minister commented on the observations of the hon. member for Brant and myself. In the course of his commenting he implied—if he did not state—that there was no need for more technological institutes. I pointed out, for example, that the Deutsch committee report had called for a tripling of the objective to 18,000, and he dealt with this in a skillful way so as to not indicate that we were building any more; thereby leaving the implication that they did not need any more. Because, he said, in the vocational centres and in a tri-semester approach to the existing facilities, we could accommodate 26,000—

Hon. Mr. Davis: Forty-six thousand.

Mr. MacDonald: Forty-six thousand, well, even more: 46,000.

The hon. member for Brant queried the hon. Minister this afternoon. I tried to detect from his answers exactly what is the position of the vocational centre as compared with, for example, the trade school that we have been talking about up until now and as were recommended in the manpower report. If I understand his replies correctly, the vocational centre is just a step beyond the vocational secondary school, so little beyond that if we found that our facilities were not great enough we could go back without any difficulty and build up the secondary school system to meet this need. With respect, I say to the hon. Minister that this picture is confused.

I raise this—and I raise this as pointedly as I can—because this is only the beginning of the confusion. Let me remind the hon. Minister that when the Deutsch report came down in 1962—at least it was prepared in 1962 although I think it was made public in the early part of 1963—their suggestion, apart from pointing out that we need triple the number of places by 1970, that were then envisaged or on the drawing board, was that we should take a look across the province of Ontario, and in implementing the recommendation of the manpower committee we should pick on some of these new secondary technical facilities that have been built with the assistance of federal money, use them as a sort of capital base and expand. In this way, you would avoid the duplication of a considerable amount of the capital expenditure involved.

Fine. There was one proposal. But nothing happened on it. Within less than a year the same group, in what is known as the supplementary report to the committee of presidents of provincially assisted universities, came out. This proposal has apparently disappeared. The basic objective of this secondary report was to look into the proposition of junior colleges. They dismissed the idea of junior colleges, but before they were finished they came back to something that was, I think to be fair, the Canadian equivalent of a junior college. In relation to what they are proposing perhaps I can just quote a paragraph or so here that indicates specifically what they had in mind. I am quoting from page 28:

We also agree with the committee's recommendation that the existing institutes of technology should be expanded and that more institutes of technology should be dispersed more widely across the province. We support the present policy whereby they are initially controlled by The Department of Education but given independence when they mature sufficiently to have well established standards.

Now I will just interject here. Whether or not this is to be done by building on the nucleus of some of the secondary schools they do not say here. That specific proposal of less than a year before has gotten lost completely in the shuffle. But to continue on page 28:

In addition, it is clear that there is a place for a further adaptation of the institute of technology, a post-secondary institution approved by The Department of Education, but under local control, that would concentrate its efforts on providing post-secondary and adult education for the immediate community. We have pointed out already in our discussion of the need for technological education, that the spectrum of careers requiring specialized training beyond the high school has widened to include a great variety of commercial and service occupations as well as industrial technology. This trend is going to increase to the point where it will not be possible for a small number of centrally directed technological institutes to meet the need and the demand for different kinds of adult education will surpass the existing offerings. Because the name "institute of technology" carries more of an industrial emphasis than we intend, we would prefer for the new institutions to be called "college of technology and applied science."

So here is another new, distinct, positive proposal—a college of technology and applied arts. That proposal was dropped into the pot of ideas and proposals. The hon. Minister a day or so ago got up and referred in passing—as though he were pleased to have still another proposal—I do not know how confused he wants to get—from President Bissell when he advocated community colleges. Whether it is the kind of college just mentioned, or whether it is some other variety, we do not know. Now, heaven help us, the Tory backbenchers are moving in and they are all going to drop in a new proposal, because we have had the one from the hon. member for Russell.

Seriously, Mr. Chairman, I submit that the time is long since past when in this area, at least, if not in the broader picture, and I have made my plea on the broader picture, we have got to have some resolution of the direction we are going. If we are going to build institutes of technology across the whole province, I personally think there is some unnecessary duplication of the proposal that the university presidents' supplementary report makes, along with that for the college of technology and applied arts. The finances are such that it would seem to me that you would telescope those two ideas.

The basic point here, Mr. Chairman—as the hon. Minister, I know, is aware—is that we have got to bear in mind that our record in the province of Ontario is an utterly shocking one in this respect.

I was just reading Mr. J. Bascom St. John again this morning—an article in which he refers to all of the shortcomings in our educational achievements and says that the one that really leads all the others is on the technical side. We in the province of Ontario have often pointed to the province of Quebec somewhat condescendingly, with regard to the problems it has in its "quiet revolution" today, because its education has been concentrated on the classical side so that young people did not have the broader opportunities. Let us face it, Mr. Chairman—in the province of Ontario, Dr. John Seath recommended in the first decade of this century the building of trade schools—over 60 years ago, in 1908 or 1910. We passed an Act in 1911, and in 50 years we built one trade school; the one on Nassau Street. If this is not a shocking revelation of our failure to live up to this responsibility, I do not know what could be.

I give credit to this government in acknowledging how desperate was the distance that we had fallen behind when under the leadership of the now hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) they seized upon the money that was made available from Ottawa. But we are still far behind. Again, Mr. St. John points out this morning, six per cent of our working force is skilled. In the United States, 32 per cent of the working force is skilled. We have got away with our neglect for years, because we have been poaching on the countries of Europe. We have been going over and drawing our skills from Europe. We are not going to be able to do it in the future. So of all areas of the educational field, my basic point is that here is where we should have some clear indication where we are going amid all the clutter of proposals of where we should go. I earnestly say to the hon. Minister, when is the government going to take some action to resolve this lack of direction?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, perhaps answering the first question posed by the hon. member, and that is the suggestion in the initial report, which has now been forgotten in the second report, of the possibility of using the new vocational centres as sort of a core for some type of further technical training; I think the answer is that the vocational facilities that are presently in the secondary system, if they are not in use to their capacity today, are very close to it and certainly will be within a year's time. I think when the initial report was made—and I cannot say this with any authority, I am only guessing—I think the feeling was then that there could be a surplus in capacity at many of these vocational additions or vocational schools. While I suggested that perhaps we might consider extending the first year of, say, Ryerson into the secondary area, I would say to you without any hesitation that to extend it to beyond, say, a one-year period in the secondary school programme would not be wise.

The vocational centres—we have changed the name from institute of trades—really encompass or envisage the principles that are set out in the manpower training report. I think they refer to them there as institutes of trades. We are calling them vocational centres. We are extending the scope of their courses beyond what was contemplated by the manpower training report. As I said yesterday, we are relating them to the courses that are being given at the institutes of technology.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member has raised a very valid point, and one that concerns the whole area of post secondary education, apart from the universities proper. The institutes of technology obviously are directed toward primarily the technological or technical fields. The vocational centres are to a very high degree in our present planning, related to this same field. I think I said yesterday that we feel that the actual estimate that was given in the first report of 18,000, is a very conservative estimate. I think perhaps the number will far exceed this by 1970 or perhaps by 1973, and I can assure you the department is planning accordingly.

There is still a problem that gives me concern. It is one that the department is studying and one that I think some of the university people are now beginning to study, although when that report came out, I can recall two or three of them who really were not too enthused about the terminology, "institute of technology and applied arts." This is the problem of the academic student who wants perhaps another two years of school, but who is not yet qualified for, or who does not want to go to, a university. Now, I am just expressing my own views and this is not government policy, but it may be that this type of academic course could be offered at the vocational centres, because these are being located in community areas. I do not know. We are planning them on a regional or geographic basis, in the same fashion as we have done with our institutes of technology. Whether these vocational centres, over a period of time and after study as to the need, can be used for an expanded or extended type of programme to include some other areas of adult education, Mr. Chairman, I do not know, but this is an area we are presently studying.

I cannot tell the hon. member today exactly where we are going since this is one of the very great problems facing us at the post-secondary level. It will be compounded, obviously, in three or four years' time, when the first graduates start leaving the re-organized programme at the secondary level. I anticipate we will have some more concrete answers for you in this field in the fairly near future. However, I regard this as a problem area, and I think my hon. friend is quite proper in observing that we must resolve it and this we are attempting to do. We have to remain flexible, if at all possible, because the needs will obviously be changing almost from year to year. Certainly you cannot say that this is the best pattern for the next ten years. This in itself would be foolish. What we must do is to see that there are adequate physical plants that we can adapt to whatever type of courses are going to become necessary in the years that lie ahead.

I am not suggesting to the House that the figures I gave it yesterday are the end as far as this programme is concerned. We are exploring three or four sites and actually have had suggestions of many prospective sites for vocational centres and institutes of technology. All I am saying to the House, to give it some encouragement, is that the figures mentioned in the first Deutsch report of 18,000 students can be met earlier than was suggested in the report. But this does not satisfy me because I think we shall have to meet a greater demand than that, perhaps even earlier than is suggested by the Deutsch committee.

So, Mr. Chairman, I cannot specifically answer the hon. member. I can tell him however, that this is a problem that concerns the department and the government and that it is receiving very serious consideration at this time.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, just let me pursue this. I appreciate the hon. Minister's explanation. It reduces the uncertainty to a degree but when he said, "We are studying this," may I ask him pointedly who "we" is?

Hon. Mr. Davis: The Department of Education, Mr. Chairman, through the technological branch.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, Mr. Chairman, with respect, I want to suggest that this is an urgent enough and an important enough issue, that, if there ever was an issue that should be placed in the hands of an advisory committee—call it what you will—that will devote fairly full time to it and get the answer as quickly as possible, then this is the issue.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I think there is some merit in what the hon. member suggests but I suggest to you further that one of the areas that must be tapped for suggestions will be from the universities. I am not content with the depth of the report that you refer to, the second report, because as I see it this goes beyond the technical and vocational field. It involves both the academic and the nurses' training. When the new Department of University Affairs is functioning I think one area that must be explored by that department in conjunction with the universities is a joint study by the people who are responsible for higher education in this province and the department or this government, as to what might be done about post-secondary education, apart from the universities. I think they have a real contribution to make in this area.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, if in effect what the hon. Minister is stating is that this is now going to become a major project of study and research by the university affairs department, at least this is an answer to the question; but whether or not this is exactly the place for it to be done, I am not certain, because I think it should encompass experts brought in from many fields.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I agree with this. We have already made one or two preliminary visits personally to two or three other jurisdictions to look at this whole question of community colleges. Not only will we consult experts from other jurisdictions in Canada but we may learn from experts from south of the border where they have had considerable experience in this type of development.

Mr. MacDonald: I reiterate finally my plea for getting a plan, and a resolution of this confusion—and for this reason.

The hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville was pleading, Mr. Chairman, as to when he is going to get his institute of technology. He says he now has 400 students, next year it will be 525 and so on.

You know, if you will forgive me, Mr. Chairman—and this is the last Minister I would like to be sarcastic with—I have a horrible suspicion that they are going to get their institute with a capacity of about 1,000 after they have reached the thousand, and when they are just about to have 1,200 or 1,400. I say this advisably—

Mr. Newman: In two years we will have a thousand.

Mr. MacDonald: —for this reason: We have just built a new Eastern Ontario Institute of Technology. The wisdom of building this kind of an institution, which, I understand, even now is overcrowded, in that they are going to be using labs for classrooms right from the very outset. In addition, I submit to the hon. Minister, their inadequate library facilities; there are more cubby holes for many of the office needs of the staff in the institution. Within a year or so this institution is going to be really bulging at the seams.

Now whether it is a wise proposition, in face of the kind of a development that we all anticipate—and the hon. Minister at least has shown the magnitude of it when he has dismissed 18,000 as a conservative figure—

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, no, I just said conservative.

Mr. MacDonald: In other words, a wrong figure, and he suggests a 46,000 level. This, at least, indicates and confirms the proportions of the problem we have got. I think we have to have plans, we have to have them clarified and we have got to start to build these institutions in Windsor and elsewhere so that they are not going to be overcrowded before you almost get the doors open and the ribbon cut.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I am one of those who does not like to be over-optimistic about the numbers of students we can handle because I do not want to mislead the House. But take Ryerson Institute alone; we anticipate that when the three-semester system is introduced—which will take place in the latter part of 1964, or in the early part of 1965, depending on how the semesters are worked out—there will be 6,000 students on Ryerson's downtown main campus alone.

With the board of Ryerson and their principal we have been discussing this. We have been considering how this can be done fairly rapidly by providing—I do not like the word "satellite"—off-campus branches of Ryerson in the three areas, perhaps, surrounding the main campus that would accommodate 3,000 students. This too can be done rather rapidly. This is one reason, Mr. Chairman, that there is merit certainly at this point in confining post-secondary institutions of this nature within The Department of Education because we can move with some rapidity in spite of what the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville may feel.

At the same time the hon. member raised the problem of Ottawa. We already have tentative plans for additions to that building. When the student population increases there to the point that we anticipate in the fall of 1966, the plans, I can assure the hon. member, will be well prepared in advance, some of them are ready now.

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Mr. Chairman, I am very much interested in what the hon. member for Russell has presented and it certainly is in line with our thinking in sections of northern Ontario. We also support the view of the hon. member for York South because it is a project about which I have been quite concerned since coming to this Legislature. He pointed out that it is years and years since Dr. Seath presented his report and it was years and years before anything was done about implementing any of the suggestions.

The hon. Minister has said that the new vocational centres are regionally located. With all due respect to the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Wishart)—who is now a Minister of the Cabinet—it is a very narrow region where that vocational centre is to be located. I think if you took the advice of your inspectors in northern Ontario you would find that they would suggest the centre should be either in the city of North Bay or the city of Sudbury. I presume that there must be other factors though, in addition to political, that dictate where you are going to set these up.

Finally, sir, in regard to the programme which you spoke about earlier this afternoon—in reply to the hon. member for Brant—you said that there would be an opportunity in some of our technical schools already in operation, to have the first year of the Ryerson course. I understand, sir, that a change has been made and in order to get into Ryerson Institute and the other institutes of technology you must have senior matriculation and be a graduate of Grade 13, which went into effect, is it this fall or next fall?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well, Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member is perhaps under some mistaken impression. There are some courses at Ryerson that do require Grade 13, I believe journalism requires it, but there are still a number of courses that you can enter at Ryerson with a Grade 12 graduation.

Mr. Troy: And will that continue for some time?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well, Mr. Chairman, I cannot tell the hon. member that this is going to continue indefinitely. I am not in a position to say that.

Mr. Troy: I agree that certainly in the course of journalism one of the prime requisites should be at least Grade 13. I think that is a very good idea. We have evidence of it in our press gallery.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Is the hon. member suggesting that the press gallery are not properly qualified?

Mr. Troy: Oh, no, no, I say it is quite evident that they had a very fine course before they became members of the press.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Ryerson has an excellent course.

Mr. G. A. Kerr (Halton): Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the hon. Minister a question about the department of youth that was announced some time ago. I believe the name—

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I do not mind the question at this time, but there is a particular vote for the department of youth.

Mr. Kerr: I thought it was under technology.

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, it is 513.

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the hon. Minister a specific question. Has he an estimate of the number of women enrolled in the various institutes throughout the province?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I can get this specific information for the hon. member. I have visited, I believe, nearly all the institutes now. I can tell the hon. member that with the exception of Ryerson, there are very few women enrolled at the technical institutes. But at Ryerson we do have a high percentage of women, comparatively speaking.

Mr. S. Lewis: Well, in the absence of a percentage, I am sure—

Hon. Mr. Davis: It is a low percentage.

Mr. S. Lewis: —the hon. Minister would agree the percentage is low. I want to perhaps make one or two points which I think might rightly be made in this vote.

One of the most striking phenomena, I think, Mr. Minister, is that women now occupy one-third of the work force. If memory serves me they are coming into the labour force at a remarkable rate. The male infusion into the work force has been something like six to eight per cent over the last five years. But women have increased at a rate of 20 per cent to a total of one-third of the work force.

The significant thing here is that their jobs are the most vulnerable jobs in an automated society, at least in a society that stands on this verge of immense technological change. I think it is true to say that it is in the area of women's employment that the computer will strike so that typists and key-punch operators, and this vast area of related skills will simply be eliminated.

Indeed, in a recent federal Department of Labour study, I think it was demonstrated that of 11,000 to 12,000 jobs affected in a survey of office automation, the number of women's jobs affected was twice as numerous as those of men. In the immediately foreseeable future one can see very, very serious dislocation of women. Although you may not get an army of unemployed, for by the mere process of attrition women will be removed from the labour market.

Now, the ironic and unfortunate thing is that women in the process of retraining are not the ones who were invited into the area of computer programming and electronic data processing. These have become the preserves of the male, and more and more the preserves intensify. Indeed, women are perhaps excluded in the sense that, as I understand it, their wages for the same job tend to be less.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, just for the information of the hon. member, I spoke to the Data Processing Management Association the other evening. When I discussed some of the implications of data processing in the future of the school system, I made this specific inquiry. Ten per cent of their membership is made up of the female of the species and they tell me that this is growing, that the women are quite adaptable to this type of work. Because I was curious I found out this information last Monday or Tuesday evening.

Mr. S. Lewis: That is interesting because IBM, on the other hand, in its programme to teach computer programming and EDP to people in the field, originally had female instructors. Those instructor places are now being usurped by males, partly because males have now taken an interest in the field, and partly because female salaries for identical work—this is fairly natural in this society—tends to be less.

The true fact is that even in the area of computer programming and electronic data processing, there are by no means sufficient jobs to absorb the vast masses likely to be technologically displaced by keypunch and typewriter automation.

I think, Mr. Minister, that this presents us with a truly serious problem. I do not think it can be underestimated and I suspect the hon. Minister would agree. I would be sad indeed were there to be a new movement of suffragettes on the economic plane. I would strongly suggest to the department that a very special emphasis should be made to provide skilled trades and new jobs for women, so as to overcome the discrimination that is naturally inherent in society, and to make some kind of programme available for the automated techniques by which women will be displaced.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I should point out that I think that there has been at least one, or several young ladies taking nearly every course at the institutes of technology with the exception, perhaps, of the mining course, but the numbers are limited, except here at Ryerson. The courses are definitely open to them. The home economics course is open to the female and the male, but of course this is where the young ladies do predominate.

At Ryerson—and I intended to send the hon. members a copy of this—they are instituting two new courses starting in September: a nursing course and a welfare services course. Both of these are directed obviously to the female students. The difficulty will be not in having the facilities. The difficulty will be in interesting the young ladies leaving secondary schools to go to the institutes of technology. Mind you, having some great interest in the availability of teacher supply, I would still encourage the bulk of them, if possible, to go to either teachers' colleges or OCE.

Mr. H. S. Racine (Ottawa East): Mr. Chairman, may I thank the hon. Minister for his very precise explanation of the programme of his department. I have noticed, particularly, the remarks he made regarding the very large expansion in the teaching of French at all levels. I would like to point out to the hon. Minister that because of the lack of facilities in all of the trades schools and the institutes of technology for the teaching of various subjects to French speaking pupils, they find it quite difficult to get all the advantages offered by the schools.

Mr. Chairman, I am sure the hon. Minister is aware that students coming from the bilingual schools find it very difficult to follow classes being given entirely in the English language after receiving most of their previous instruction in French.

My point, Mr. Chairman, is not to ask any special favours for French-speaking students. These students will be found predominantly in eastern and northern Ontario and in the southwestern part of this province. The hon. Minister is no doubt aware that these students have greater difficulty than others in following the classes, and more especially in trying the examination. My suggestion to the hon. Minister would be to make an effort to have French-speaking instructors, Mr. Chairman, more particularly in the areas that I have mentioned before.

Now, without mentioning any names, I would like to mention two cases that have come to my attention. One was an apprentice electrician. His employer told me that this young man was one of the brightest apprentices he had ever had in his employ. Unfortunately, he had received his elementary education in the province of Quebec and found it very difficult to follow instructions and pass examinations entirely in the English language.

The second case is that of a young apprentice plumber who had to be dropped by his employer because he had failed some of his subjects. He had been employed for a period of four years and nine months and, as in the other case mentioned, had developed quite nicely in his trade.

Unless something is done to help cases such as the ones I have mentioned, we shall find in the ranks of the unemployed people with tremendous skill who cannot receive their certificates because of language difficulties.

May I ask the hon. Minister, through you, Mr. Chairman, to give this matter very serious consideration, particularly in relation to the new trades school to be opened this fall in Ottawa, and for the institute of technology which will move to its new quarters in the near future? I would ask the hon. Minister to consider the possibility of employing in those two schools a number of French-speaking instructors who can do a tremendous job.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I am aware that this problem may exist. I think there would be no purpose in my telling the hon. member specifically, today, whether or not we shall do this. It will depend on the number of applicants that would be available and the type of courses, because you obviously cannot provide a separate instructor for a class of two or three individuals. The hon. member would be interested to know that we have a number of French-speaking graduates from schools in the province of Quebec presently attending our Hamilton institute of technology. They are specializing in the textile field and the results from these students are quite excellent. I assure the hon. member that we will be quite considerate of this problem. We shall see that something, if possible, is done about it, but it will depend to a very great degree on the number of students and the different courses in which they are interested.

Mr. E. Sargent (Grey North): Mr. Chairman, before being critical of the government on this bill, I should like to congratulate the government and the hon. Minister on his choice of the director of education, Dr. Rivers, because we are very proud of him in Owen Sound and of the job he is doing.

I do want to put this point as a citizen of a small, remote city, in that various times we have made approaches to the government and to the department for the location of a higher education institution such as a university in the Owen Sound area, in that geographically we are away out of the picture so far as having our graduates come to Toronto, London or McGill for their higher education is concerned. This is a real problem for parents in that they have to put at least one of their children through university with a financial hardship. And therefore it is reasonable to assume that we have a just request that the government consider such a location of a university in our area.

The answer usually is that there is not enough money, big money, in an area like Owen Sound to finance initially the capital costs of a university. Now, I think it is important to ask, is this the yardstick where we will locate our universities? Where there is enough money? We all talk about decentralization of everything from soup to nuts, but we have a just case here and I would like to ask the hon. Minister, is it the policy of the government in locating universities where there is enough money? I understand that in North Bay they made approaches along the same line some years ago and they were told probably the same thing, that money was the basic starting point in the locating of a university. I think that policy should be defined, Mr. Chairman, if the hon. Minister would like to tell us.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I do not know where this policy came from, I cannot recall any group from Owen Sound since I have been Minister, approaching me on the possibility of a university. I shall check whether such a group has approached the university advisory committee. I am not familiar with it if it has. I do recall a group coming from the Owen Sound community to chat about the possible location of a vocational centre or institute of technology. The policy of the government has been clearly enunciated without referring to the question of money at all; that there will be no new universities considered prior to 1970, that the efforts will be expanded on the existing universities and the new ones which have already been created or are in the process. As to the suggestion of the hon. member that the amount of money in the community determines whether or not there should be a university there, certainly as far as I know, Mr. Chairman, that is not the criterion. I think it is quite obvious that the population of the centres, the availability of students and so on, are more important—I assume this should really be under the university affairs vote rather than here—but dealing with this question at the moment, the policy of the government as enunciated a year and a half ago, was that there would be no new universities created, and, as I say, I do not recall any representation, certainly in recent months, to myself, from the community of Owen Sound.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, in 504, quite often one of the difficulties in programme No. 5, the retraining programme, is to get staff. Now, there is available in practically every community in which programme No. 5 is operating, sufficient staff in the academic line in retired school teachers. Yet these school teachers are a little hesitant when it comes to getting involved in the programme of teaching because of superannuation difficulties.

I think that the hon. Minister should give serious consideration to perhaps overcoming some of these difficulties so that this available source of skilled, experienced teachers could be used in programme No. 5. The teachers that you do get sometimes are not as good as you would like to have in the programme. And here you have a source of skilled teachers that could be put to its full use.

Now, the next is the setting up of courses for young ladies, as has been mentioned by the hon. member for Scarborough West. One of the difficulties, Mr. Chairman, we have found in our own community, is how do you interest girls in technical education? The school of which I happen to be on the staff, a technical school, has advertised throughout the secondary schools in the community that there are courses available in the school for them, but yet in the one year all they could do was interest eight girls and the following year six girls. Surely there will have to be some type of awakening of the female half of the population, if they are going to work in the technical fields, that they should get some type of technical education first. And I think probably the department might have to do a little better selling job in this case.

Mr. Nixon: The hon. Minister does not want to comment on that? Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the hon. Minister would report to the House the findings of the committee that investigated irregularities in the programme number five work in the Windsor area?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I guess this should be under vote 514, but to bring the House up to date—I recall that the former Attorney General issued a statement wherein it was stated that the matter in Windsor was investigated quite thoroughly and that as a result of the investigation, there was a recommendation that no charges be laid. That, Mr. Chairman, is the result of the investigation. The programme number five course in Windsor I understand is operating quite effectively at the moment. The courses are being well administered. Now, this is the information that we have, of course, in the department. The hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville may have some other views and we would be happy to hear them, but our information is that the programme is now working quite effectively.

Mr. Nixon: Is it true, Mr. Chairman, that Mr. Taylor, the man whose services were used by the programme number five authority, has been offered a position in The Department of Education?

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, Mr. Chairman, this is very definitely not true.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, seeing that the programme mentioned is in the community from which I come, may I state that the programme is coming along very well. We have a top-notch programme and we are certainly meeting the needs as we find them in the community. However, I would like to suggest possibly now, through the House here, that maybe the programme try to look into the idea of running some type of programme for young ladies in the sewing trades, because General Motors will be setting up a body trim plant back in the community.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, I subscribe to the remarks of the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville. We had a very fine programme, too, in the city of North Bay and a very fine and interested director. Unfortunately, he has left and I do not know just what the state of the programme will be next year.

Vote 504 agreed to.

On vote 505:

Mr. S. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I believe that the hon. Minister would allow under this vote a discussion of OCE, inasmuch as it is normally contained in the estimates under university affairs. If he does permit it, I have some observations I should like to make.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I have no objections, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member wished to make a speech on secondary school teacher training and actually this would come under OCE, which is considered as part of the university estimates. In speaking to the hon. members for Brant and York South, it was decided that we would deal with the whole question of universities, per se, at one time if possible. Therefore if the hon. member wishes to discuss the general problem of teacher education at the secondary level under this vote, while technically it perhaps is not in the right place, I have no objection.

Mr. S. Lewis: I should like to express very considerable appreciation to the hon. Minister for allowing it. I have some comments, perhaps a little extended, but I trust they will be greeted as comments which are the fruit of some thought.

Our party is exceedingly anxious about the state of secondary school teacher training in the province of Ontario. As you know, on the North American continent generally, the Great Debate is now waging, and within the last few months you have had two major treatises: firstly, James Conant's rather excellent book, The Education of American Teachers, to which I will refer later, and secondly, Koerner's book, The Mis-Education of American Teachers; not to mention the number of learned articles in the field.

I rise to speak on the question of OCE, because I am greatly disturbed about that institution. If the feelings are strongly put, they are not meant in belligerence, they are meant simply because they are strongly felt.

I would like to suggest, Mr. Minister, that something has gone wrong at the very heart of OCE; that the institution is sinking beneath reputable academic waters and that in large degree the whole area of secondary school education is transfigured in a state of rigidity, of frustration, and alas, of mediocrity. In a recent article in the Toronto Varsity weekend review, a fascinating study appeared called, "Alice, OCE and Teaching Standards." It began with a quotation from Alice in Wonderland, which I would like to read to the hon. members in the House.

"Once," said the Mock Turtle at last with a deep sigh, "I was a real turtle. When we were little we went to school in the sea. The master was an old turtle. We used to call him Tortoise."

"Why did you call him Tortoise if he wasn't one?" Alice said.

"We called him Tortoise because he taught us," said the Mock Turtle angrily. "Really, you are very dull."

"Yes, we went to school in the sea. Though you may not believe it, we had the best of educations. In fact we went to school every day."

"I have been to a day school too," said Alice. "You needn't be so proud as all that."

"With extras?" asked the Mock Turtle anxiously.

"Yes," said Alice. "We learned French and music."

"And washing?" said the Mock Turtle.

"Certainly not," said Alice indignantly.

"Ah, then yours wasn't a really good school," said the Mock Turtle in a tone of great relief. "Now at ours they had at the end of the bill, 'French, music and washing extra.'"

And that in the minds of many, Mr. Chairman, is just about an accurate evaluation of what OCE is deemed to offer. Instead of being viewed as an exciting intellectual milieu, it is viewed as an oppressive and much-to-be-avoided tedium.

For a vast number of people, OCE is the last refuge of the undecided. It does not have the tremendous appeal that an institution of that kind should have. It is considered as a year wasted in the curriculum of students entering the field of secondary teaching.

If I may give a personal observation; when I finished my university work, I too contemplated the illustrious profession of the hon. member for Brant and others in this House, and was positively deterred by the thought of the ignominy and humiliation of spending a year at OCE.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I understand that you were contemplating law.

Mr. S. Lewis: I quite appreciate that. I was not so deterred in the law until experience taught otherwise. Nonetheless, I might say, I might have been better equipped to handle The Police Act.

On the other hand, I do not think the personal reflection is far from typical, Mr. Minister. I think that teachers in the field will agree. There is surrounding OCE at the moment an atmosphere which is not particularly conducive to attracting people. Why did this attitude infiltrate the community? I suggest to you that the critique of OCE, from those who are presently in attendance and those who have passed through its gates, is essentially seven-fold. I want to deal very briefly with all areas, and to elaborate each to the degree that it is worth.

First, whether the staff or principal wishes it otherwise, OCE still has a definitely high school atmosphere imbued with some regimentation, what students feel is an excessive degree of classroom discipline. A sort of paternalistic knuckle-rapping has haunted OCE for the last several years. As I say, although I understand that situations have changed and there is a very real effort on the part of the principal and the staff to correct it, the atmosphere tends to prevail.

Hon. Mr. Davis: But there is a change.

Mr. S. Lewis: There is a change, I grant that.

Hon. Mr. Davis: As long as you mention that.

Mr. S. Lewis: I grant there is a change, but the change is not yet decisive. Indeed, the same article from the Varsity describing the 700 students who passed through OCE portals in the winter session, says this:

This lonely remnant chooses to endure the manifold indignities and horrors of the winter course at OCE. As the year progresses the group establishes itself as an entity, developing a camaraderie within itself and an esprit de corps and good will which may well be compared to the kinship among the passengers singing on the decks of the sinking Titanic.

That is the first part of the critique.

The second part is that the very building itself, Mr. Minister, is a study in depression. As you know, I spent a little time with the principal of OCE recently, and he was kind enough to take me through the institution. An institution it is—an impossible environment. It is bleak, it is overcrowded, it is cramped, it is desolate, it is cell-like. The greatest instinct is to flee. There may have been an old theory—

Hon. Mr. Davis: I wonder if the hon. member would answer a question? Do you recall seeing a number of students in the same building attending one University of Toronto school and sharing the same facilities? Do you recall seeing that?

Mr. S. Lewis: I do.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Yes, and would the hon. member be interested to know that these young people not only do not flee these premises, they regard it as being something of a great opportunity to attend this school. The results from UTS I think are rather significant.

Mr. S. Lewis: Well, as a matter of fact—

Hon. Mr. Davis: I am not saying that the facilities at OCE are perfect, by any means. In fact, we have plans to alter the facilities. But nonetheless I do not think that one can say that the facilities, because I have examined them very closely myself, would tempt a person to flee the profession.

Mr. S. Lewis: I did not say they would tempt a person to flee the profession. I said they would tempt a person to flee the facilities. I was thus tempted, and I know of others who are so tempted, and I have a couple of observations to offer on UTS later.

I find the hon. Minister's interjection interesting, because, of course, that is precisely one of the points. The people about whom I am talking are not high school students willing to accept any environment into which they are placed. These are university graduates and the environment, I suggest, should be rather more conducive to maturity and to the learning process. There should be, perhaps, a greater degree of physical amenity and a much greater attractiveness. But the hangover of paternalism and the actual physical facilities, if I may say, Mr. Chairman, are not nearly so important as the third part of the criticism which I would like to emphasize.

I would suggest that the course structure at the Ontario College of Education is obsessed with technique and methodology at the expense of almost everything else. There are, in the winter course, only nine weeks of practice teaching and in the summer course, six weeks. Although there are other courses which I will enumerate in a moment, the essential emphasis is on straight methodology.

What is more it is a methodology of a "how" and "what" kind. It is the ancient type of methodology. It does not probe "why"; it does not ask the goals for approaching certain subjects in the schools. It is essentially a "what" formula.

Indeed, I was amazed to find that the former principal of OCE—and I stress that it is not the present principal—wrote a fascinating letter along these lines to a young man who had applied to him for a teacher's certificate in the province of Ontario. This person, as I understand it, had received his qualifications and his degree in another jurisdiction—the United Kingdom, I believe. He had been a public school principal in Nova Scotia. He wanted to know why he would be forced to take a summer course in methodology at OCE. One of the sentences which was in the letter returned to him from the principal of that institution read as follows:

In Ontario schools we consider academic qualification and experience less desirable than methodology.

With the greatest respect to the former principal of OCE I suggest that that is a seriously misplaced emphasis.

There are, of course, other subjects. There is psychology and the philosophy of education. But these, I suggest to the hon. Minister, are exceedingly superficial. They are survey courses, not substantive—"Why Will James was a pragmatist" or "What John Dewey believed"—in a sense highly uncritical, as all survey courses tend to be; and leading to undesirable results.

I do not want to tax the House, but I think a fairly lengthy quote from James Conant's book, The Education of American Teachers from the chapter on "The Theory and Practice of Teaching" is here relevant. I should like to read it:

In the philosophy of education course a well-trained philosopher should turn his and his students' attention to the problem, the language, the assumption and the value premises that enter into educational theory and practice. Using the new tools of the logical analyst and demonstrating by his own behaviour the philosophic impulses for clarity, the professor of the philosophy of education should train his students to think clearly and critically about educational issues, including those raised by the psychologist, other professional educators, and informed laymen.

And then Mr. Conant says this:

Occasionally one finds a course in philosophy of education so taught. Far more often one finds that it represents little more than the professor's attempt to indoctrinate the student with his own educational values or to make the student vaguely familiar with the views of eminent men who have written about education—a few of whom may have sought to put their views into practice.

I suggest that it is the latter approach which characterizes, if you will, such courses at the Ontario College of Education. Indeed, one of the things which astounded me was that in a recent summer examination in the course "psychology of education," there was held an objective examination! I ask hon. members to contemplate that. An objective examination; 200 multiple-choice questions in a field of that kind, supposedly training high school teachers!

In another recent incident to which some of the students would be willing to attest, they were asked to check a list on what makes a good teacher. On the form were listed all the various attributes—voice modulation, gestures, etc., etc. One of the students put up his hand and said, "What about knowledge of subject matter?" and the professor said, "Surely that is there." The student said, "No, it is not there." The professor replied, "Well, that is a very good idea—put it down, class."

That, I think, is basic to the fundamental problems in the psychology and philosophy of education courses that they are taught at OCE; that they take second place to the methodology fixation and preoccupation; that they are essentially survey courses; that they often teach too little, and too little knowledge continues to be dangerous, and that they breed—and this is what disturbs me—an anti-intellectual atmosphere.

I want to quote again from the Varsity. It said this:

Significantly, the mental vitality, the fact of deep intellectual involvement and mutual commitment, the sense of developed and developing wisdom which ideally characterize the academic community and which in part are the very qualities which justify its existence, are absent from OCE.

Now the fourth part of the critique then follows very logically from that, because the anti-intellectualism spreads. It is reflected in the predominant mentality—and I submit to the hon. Minister that this is a fictitious mentality—that only teachers can teach teachers; that only the practical classroom experience gained over a certain period of time is relevant to the Ontario College of Education; that the total emphasis must be to demonstrate to people how to teach a class of 30 in 35 minutes.

Indeed, if I may suggest to the hon. Minister, the emphasis on “only teachers can teach teachers” is reflected in his establishment of the Minister’s committee on the training of secondary school teachers. When one looks at the people who comprise the committee, you find only a solitary member of the organized university community and he in the administrative field, to boot.

As Bascom St. John pointed out, this meant that:

The continuance of departmental control of teacher training will delay indefinitely the teachers’ goal of a self-governing profession. And the result of setting up this kind of committee with only teachers-to-teach-teachers attitude is that you have—

Hon. Mr. Davis: Was that Mr. St. John’s recent article?

Mr. S. Lewis: That was Mr. St. John’s article of March 20, 1963, which was a commentary on the report.

Hon. Mr. Davis: He wrote a very similar article about elementary school teacher training. I just want to tell the hon. member that we have university people on the elementary school teacher training committee, which I mentioned yesterday, or the day before.

Mr. S. Lewis: In the one the hon. Minister is now establishing for an elementary school? Well, I am glad that perhaps the lessons of the first will be applied to the second. I appreciate that that may perhaps have prompted it, maybe not. But what Mr. St. John says about the outcome of this report is as follows:

Therefore Ontario is destined to retain a secondary teacher training system of a type which exists almost nowhere else. In other words, in this particular we are right and all the rest of the world is wrong.

You may take issue with Mr. St. John but these are his thoughtful comments from the same article on the report.

I might add one aspect in discussing the anti-intellectual atmosphere, and the non-university character of the report and the particular philosophy which pervades it. I should point out that in the make-up of this committee there was not a single representative from the technical or vocational side. When the hon. leader of my party stood up today with a very justified sense of urgency about the direction in which society is heading in its technological training field, I think his urgency is considerably bulwarked by the make-up of the committee. If I can come back to him, Mr. St. John referred to it this way in a subsequent article on the same report:

This is a fine example of the haughty snobbery of the academic toward a profoundly important aspect of our educational programme. The irony is that their side of the programme is certain to diminish in relative importance in the ensuing decade.

This has implications of course, beyond technical and vocational training alone. When we will be discussing Ryerson as an independent institution later on, it will of course be pointed out that many Ryerson teachers have been and will be compelled to take certain instructors’ courses at summer school at OCE, over which courses they have absolutely no jurisdiction and about which content they have never been consulted.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. S. Lewis: Again, I think it is a reflection of the approach that the teachers at Ryerson must take, I believe, a summer instructor’s course. Many of them have been told that it is arbitrary. They must take it and certainly none of these people who themselves teach at Ryerson—now to be elevated to an institution comparable to that of a university—have been consulted, to their knowledge, on the content of the course structure. If, in fact, they should have been consulted, then I suggest that the committee or the hon. Minister should communicate it.

Now, what I would call this general sterility of attitude leads me to the fifth point: the attitude also extends to the practice teaching in which the teacher trainees engage. It never ceases to amaze me that the reports of student practice teachers from OCE are expected to be non-critical, they are expected to be non-analytical. Indeed, if I may say so, it is fairly common knowledge amongst the regular teaching community that when inspectors visit their ranks, teachers often alter the lesson planned to meet the predetermined expectations of the inspectors and of the Ontario College of Education as it communicates them. I would not suggest that this applies to any of the eminent members who sit in this House, but it may indeed apply to others. But that is a peripheral point. It is true, however, that a wholly uncritical attitude is required of the student teachers who are expected to comment.

Sixth, Mr. Minister, I want to suggest that there is a serious lack of experimentation and exposure to educational cross-currents at OCE. I am not sure that practice teaching at UTS as such is anything to be vastly admired now. UTS is very much an eminent high school, but part of the establishment not generally reflective of community trends and classes.

What we want to see as a party are experiments in predominantly low-income areas or with underprivileged adolescents, in rural teaching experience, in special work amongst the emotionally disturbed children and the slow learner, and experience in special techniques—such as use of educational television.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, dealing with the slow learners and emotionally handicapped, how many of these students does the hon. member anticipate that the teacher, the graduate from OCE, will be dealing with at the secondary level? My own information is that this would be a very small percentage of the group. If he were to apply this maybe to the teachers college's training in the elementary field this would have more validity, but I question really whether his observation in this regard holds too much water for the secondary school teacher.

Mr. S. Lewis: Well, as a matter of fact, I am prepared to defend the statement. Not long ago, in fact within the last month, the hon. Minister was presented with a brief which I trust will be raised under vote 507 of his estimates, a brief from the Ontario association of the emotionally disturbed children. The contention in that brief, based on various studies, a health survey in 1950 made by some professional people in the field, general news reports, and indeed on a specific study of communities in the United Kingdom, suggests that anywhere from six to twelve per cent of the students attending secondary schools suffer from some degree of emotional disturbance. Now, if that is in fact true, Mr. Chairman, then teachers at the secondary school level having to deal with, let us say, ten per cent of the student body, should have some practice teaching exposure, some experience in the areas of experimentation related to the emotionally disturbed.

Indeed, what of the fields of the Robarts plan and the terminal classes and all the aspects there involved? One indeed feels that the teachers at OCE are not getting the training and stimulation of atmosphere that I think they should have.

That leads me to my final point. In the opening of the hon. Minister's estimates in this branch—I cannot appreciate too fully the nature of his estimates and the work he is doing—in the opening of his estimates a great deal was said about research. Now I want to suggest to the hon. Minister that the Ontario College of Education is not a humming centre of research in the meaningful sense.

If it is a humming centre, it certainly is not filtering down to the students. The graduates who attend the Ontario College of Education are certainly not feeling the communication of research materials. It may be that Dr. Jackson is off doing a highly statistical study of patterns of students over a generation. This is exceedingly valuable. But clinical research, meaningful teaching pattern research in methodology goals, special experiments, and all the aspects that now come within the ken of modern thinking on education; these things are not being communicated to the students at the regular level.

I am told, and I believe it, that at the graduate level of the Ontario College of Education there is a very good research programme. If true, it, too, has not filtered down to students who are taking the winter and the summer courses. What do you have? Such students are exposed to new experiments and new methods only in isolated examples, if they are lucky enough to come within the area of a school board or a principal specifically enlightened and prepared to implement them.

Now, frankly, for all the aforementioned reasons—and I know the hon. Minister will disagree with a great many of them, although some he might agree with to a lesser or greater extent—for all the aforementioned reasons I suggest to you that secondary school education in the province of Ontario is, at the moment, tottering. The problem is a pretty serious one, and I do not think I present a purely subjective judgment. I daresay that it would be corroborated by those who have passed through OCE, by those who are presently in OCE, and by those who are about to enter OCE. Indeed, if the hon. Minister thinks that I speak too subjectively, I would be happy to undertake to table in this House a week hence a petition embodying these basic criticisms and the ideas I am about to put forward from at least a couple of hundred teachers in the area, all of whom have had association with OCE.

I think that I present a mirror of a deep-seated feeling. It may be that as a person who speaks rather strongly about it, I exaggerate the extent of the reflection in certain areas for certain people; but the general reflection, I think, holds true.

As for the solution—the answer to the malaise—I have no pat revelations to put before the hon. Minister. But I want to suggest to him a series of four fundamental revisions. They are these:

First, the Ontario College of Education should be a defined post-graduate university faculty or institute, comparable to medicine or to law, and under university control—not under the aegis of The Department of Education as such.

Indeed, I think one of the invidious and sad facts of these estimates is that OCE has been isolated within The Department of Education and, at the same time, alienated still further from The Department of University Affairs. The staff at OCE should be qualified university professors conversant with the theory and practice of education. They should be giving the courses.

I would like to quote to you, shortly, from James Conant on his observations in this regard.

I believe that the role of the professors of education in the undergraduate training of teachers is, at its best, that of an intermediary to bridge the ravine that separates theory and practice. If this is true then the professors of educational philosophy, educational history, educational sociology and educational psychology should be professors of philosophy, history, sociology and psychology who have a commitment to the public schools and their improvement.

We should have professors teaching prospective secondary school teachers.

I would go further. A new faculty or institute of education in the province of Ontario should have the power to invite eminent outsiders to give specialized courses in various aspects of university education. I would say James Conant, Paul Goodman, Eric Fromm, Robert Hutchins—les eminences grises in other fields of education—should be brought in and asked to give specialized courses.

The institute could draw on the newly formed institute of criminology, on the institute of child psychology. You would, in fact, develop at the Ontario College of Education precisely what it now lacks, namely, a community of learning. That is the logical tone for it to have.

I would go even further in discussing the new faculty of education that one could envisage. I would say that its system of admissions should be such as to accept people with mature adult experience in various fields: businessmen, authors, scientists, journalists and what have you. Even in the absence of precise academic entrance qualifications they should be able to come in to take extra courses leading to secondary school certification, to help overcome the shortage and to help give that institution the dignity and the breadth in the academic world which is presently denied it. The second proposal is that the entire course structure of the Ontario College of Education should be dramatically overhauled. We should de-emphasize methodology, leaving it only to the bare-bone basic subjects and there apply it intensively with emphasis on the goals of methodology; why we teach the new mathematics, not merely how we teach the new mathematics. Then put a much greater emphasis in the time that is thus released on the general framework of learning—psychology, sociology, history, philosophy, even economics, and anthropology. Intensive seminars in the behavioural sciences should be given by university professors attached to the faculty of education by virtue of their specialized knowledge.

Finally, a much greater proportion of time on practice teaching, the workshop of educational training. Not a mere nine weeks in the winter course or a mere six weeks of observation in a summer course; but teacher training that allows the teachers analytical critiques and evaluation of their experience; criticisms of the people whom they observe, which criticisms would then be discussed in tutorial.

Hon. Mr. Davis: How many weeks?

Mr. S. Lewis: How many weeks? I have looked at it on the basis of hours. If the hon. Minister allows me, I have not suggested a precise number but I could do so given a little time to work out the course allotment—roughly as Conant has done. I think that the imbalance that presently prevails should be righted, and that it should be righted in favour of courses like the philosophy of education and the psychology of education and similar fields, plus seminars in the behavioural sciences, and much increased practice teaching.

Third, I would like to suggest that the new institute should become a community of learning where there is unrestrained experimentation, and the research becomes an integral part of the curriculum. Thus would you have students attracted by the excitement of the atmosphere. I want to suggest, Mr. Minister, that we should have all materials of research available to students as part of their course instruction—all of the research that is presently going on.

I want to suggest that the teachers themselves should prepare intensive research papers in the course of their learning, and thus participate in the formulation of the learning process. This is a regular university procedure. This is the way you develop a maturity of mind and a sensitivity to social issues.

Finally, for the last part of this section I want to suggest there should be one, two or three specific experimental schools in Ontario, or indeed several specific experimental classes throughout schools in Ontario, for which a certain percentage of practice teaching time would be designated. The students at OCE would have the opportunity to try every single new technique in all fields, ranging from the emotionally disturbed to the slow learner, to all the areas with which the hon. Minister is far better acquainted than I. Such knowledge would then be a matter of experience rather than of chance. Such an experimenting laboratory for teachers is in fact widespread in parts of Europe and the United Kingdom.

The fourth and final suggestion I want to make, Mr. Chairman, is that the Ontario College of Education should become a university faculty which launches a continuous learning programme for its graduate teachers. I think it is absurd in this society that learning tends to end with one formal year or two summers at OCE, or these M.Ed. courses that you can pick up over a summer—indeed which even I could pick up over a summer. Maybe the hon. Minister in his reply will induce me to do so.

But I suggest to you that there should be some kind of a curriculum devised for year-long sabbatical leave, for intensive specialization over summers, or even specially led learning and experiment groups within the staffs of individual schools. A continued learning programme within OCE is precisely the place from which such work must derive.

There are all kinds of other modifications that are obvious, including the changing of the building, but which I shall not go into.

I think it would be a challenging and exciting development to make OCE a community of learning as a university faculty rather than isolate it as it is now with all the general dissatisfaction and attendant anxiety with which students view it. It may be that individual criticisms and ideas are not palatable.

But however much the hon. Minister is unpersuaded, this, I think, cannot be denied; that the fundamental malaise at OCE persists even now, less serious than it was in the past—but it persists. The fundamental student dissatisfaction also persists, as does the fundamental concern and anxiety within parts of the profession. And it ill behooves the hon. Minister of Education to maintain the status quo with only marginal amendments.

Robert Hutchins, formerly chancellor of the University of Chicago, has a series of comments he calls "On Education," and I would like to read the first paragraph into the record:

Ideal education is the one that develops intellectual power. I arrive at this conclusion by a process of elimination. Educational institutions are the only institutions that can develop intellectual power. The ideal education is not an ad hoc education, not an education directed to immediate needs. It is not a specialized education or a pre-professional education. It is not a utilitarian education. It is an education calculated to develop the mind.

I suggest to you that the atmosphere of the Ontario College of Education is not consistent with that fine definition of educational objectives, and I hope that some of the suggestions outlined, however moderately, find favour with the hon. Minister.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I want to commend, of course, the hon. member for his statement on his views of secondary school teacher education. I was aware of his visit of course to OCE—

Mr. MacDonald: You have a good spy system.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Oh, I was not only aware, I knew he was arriving.

Mr. MacDonald: Better than I thought.

Hon. Mr. Davis: For the first time this afternoon I feel my age a little bit because I can recall at least two articles similar to the one the hon. member read from the Varsity newspaper. The wording is not identical but it is not dissimilar. They were written in 1949, 1950 and actually there was one in 1951.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): And nothing has been done in all those years.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I can recall rooming with a gentleman who spent a year at OCE. We commiserated with each other pretty well every evening. I was articled at the time and not getting the intellectual experience at Osgoode Hall that I had anticipated, having spent the day searching titles for the senior with whom I was articled. Of course, my roommate had spent the day learning methodology and being treated, he felt, like something of a secondary school student. The statements and the views expressed by the hon. member really take me back just a few years.

I fully appreciate, Mr. Chairman, the concern the hon. member feels about teacher education and certainly some of the ideas that he suggests are worthy of consideration. However, I think in fairness to the institution of OCE and to the number of the people in the profession who have graduated from that institution, it would be inappropriate to say that teacher education in this province is on the verge of tottering. I am not sure that I am using the exact phraseology of the hon. member or not.

Mr. MacDonald: It has tottered.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I think, Mr. Chairman, this is an area that gives everyone concern. I quite frankly accept the fact that the physical facilities at OCE are not of the best. Yet I know of many institutions of higher learning where the physical facilities are not even on a par with OCE, and where a great deal of academic good is accomplished. I have not personally attended either Oxford or Cambridge but my friends who have been there tell me that the surroundings are not any improvement over what you might find at OCE. I am not holding out UTS as an example of the type of school where practice teaching should be done. The great bulk of the practice teaching is in fact now done outside UTS. Nonetheless the results from that school, I think, indicate that there are a number of students who are studying in the same atmosphere or in the same physical facilities who do well when it comes to the Grades 12 or 13 examinations.

I was very interested in the last quotation from the past president—at least I think he is a past president of the University of Chicago—concerning his views on education. Of course, he always confined his views strictly to the academic area; if memory serves me correctly he was indirectly responsible for the elimination of all athletic endeavours at that university for which he is held in very high regard in some areas, and very definitely not in others in that community. And I can also tell the hon. member that I have looked at the problem of OCE, and I have visited other teacher training institutions and jurisdictions outside this country. The problem is not necessarily similar and yet in many respects it is not dissimilar in many other jurisdictions. I have visited certain institutions in the state of California and Florida where they have perhaps a very progressive policy when it comes to certain aspects of education, and you can hear the same criticisms, the same complaints about the teacher education programme in some of those institutions.

My good wife happens to be a graduate of Michigan and some of the teacher training education centres in the United States, having taught in the state of California. I told her of the possibility of these views here this afternoon and she observed to me, "This sounds very much like the problems that they face in many teacher training institutions in our own jurisdiction." So I think, Mr. Chairman, that we must look at this very objectively. In teacher training there has to be a certain amount of instruction, I would hope, in methodology. I am not sure that you can look for a complete academic experience at any institution where the practical nature of the course must be taught. The hon. member for Brant may have some observations, in that I understand he experienced this same situation when he was attending OCE, but I can indicate to the hon. members that I am personally not content with what is going on at the Ontario College of Education, and yet at the same time, I accept some of the limitations that must be there in any type of institution that is training teachers.

But with the new Western College of Education in London, I think I should make these observations. They will not fill, of course, the requirements or the suggestion expressed by the hon. member, but he will be interested to know that a legal agreement for the joint operation of the college by the department and the university has been signed by the Minister and the president of the university. Incidentally we are considering the same type of agreement with the University of Toronto. In accordance with certain recommendations, Dr. Turner has become the dean designate; he became this on July 2 of 1963, and his appointment as full-time dean will become effective July 1 this year.

We have followed the recommendation that the new colleges should be attached to a university, which of course this will be. They should offer teacher training in a post-graduate year in order to maintain high standards and should provide opportunities for post-graduate study in conjunction with the graduate school and the university. This is also being arranged.

There should be ample facilities for practical work in the secondary schools of the vicinity and all the practice teaching will be done outside the existing facility at the new OCE in London. The applicants should not be restricted on the basis of geographic area—this was not really raised by the hon. member, but there will be no restriction on the geographic area, although we expect logically that the larger number will come from the western part of the province.

A combination of lectures, seminars and tutorials will be used for the first time in the methods of instruction. A total of 40 seminar rooms have been provided in the architectural plans. These are presently completed. And the seminar method, particularly suited to the instruction and training of graduate students in a college of education, will allow for the mature discussion of ideas and questions between members and the instructor.

An exchange of personnel between the university and the college is being arranged in addition, of course, to the placement of practising teachers for tutorial work. This arrangement will draw the university and college much closer together and will also ensure close liaison between student teachers, practising teachers and the college of education instructors.

And the hon. member will be interested in this, I am sure: Special lectures will be given by departmental officials, and these will include members from the departments of the university and by secondary school principals. We are asking them to participate in lectures, and superintendents or directors of secondary schools will also take part in the new college programme.

Offices of the inspection staff of the western division of the secondary education branch of the department have been included in the building in order to give the opportunity for a closer liaison between teacher education and secondary school inspection. We think this has obvious advantages.

The new college of education building will be equipped with many modern facilities. The cost is of some significance, $3,600,000, which will include the equipment and furnishings. Tenders have already been called, and completion is expected in July of 1965. We have provided for a normal capacity of 600 students, but the plans are adaptable to accommodate 800 students at slightly increased cost.

Also, we will offer professional training courses to prospective teachers of academic, commercial and technical subjects in all branches of the reorganized programme for the secondary schools.

Accommodation is planned to resemble a secondary school building, including the classrooms, library, science laboratories, rooms for special subjects and modern methods of teaching. Provision will be made for every prospective teacher to gain experience, not only in the urban composite schools but also in the rural composite schools. Staff appointments will be made by agreement between the university and the Minister on the selection of the dean, according to the procedure outlined in the agreement.

In the theoretical subjects—the hon. member will be interested in these—philosophy, psychology, administration appointments will be made to scholarly applicants with an interest in the application of their subjects to educational practice. Appointments to staff in the methods field will be made on the basis of academic command of subjects and outstanding competence in teaching in a secondary school.

The implementation of recommendations here at the OCE, of course, are now under consideration. We are considering having visiting lecturers from the university, the cross-appointment between the university and the college and an increase in the number of practice teaching schools. And we intend to provide that every student teacher will have the opportunity to gain experience in the composite schools outside the city of Toronto.

I realize, Mr. Chairman, that this in itself will not completely solve the problems raised by the hon. member and they are problems that will continue to be studied in the department. I would just like to mention one or two things that we are doing in teacher training at the elementary level that I think will be of some interest to indicate the thinking of the Minister and the department. We have been recently negotiating to relocate the site of the St. Catharines Teachers' College. Rather than having it in the other area of the city, we are negotiating with Brock University to see about the possibility of establishing the new teachers' college on the site on the campus. We intend to establish the Sudbury Teachers' College on the site of Laurentian University. And we have had very unofficial discussions to do with the Peterborough Teachers' College as well.

So this whole area, Mr. Chairman, of secondary and elementary school teacher training is one that of course deserves very serious study and consideration and I think it is obvious from the remarks that I have made dealing specifically with the new OCE at Western, that while we do not perhaps go to the extent that the hon. member has suggested, certainly these moves will be welcomed by the people in the profession and I hope will attract many people to the teaching profession, who prior to this time, perhaps, had some hesitation.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, my views on this matter were stated earlier, but I would like to ask the hon. Minister if my understanding of the figures are correct when I say that approximately 700 students go to OCE in the winter course and over 3,000 take the summer course?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Including the library school, Mr. Chairman, it would be 832 students that are there now.

Mr. Nixon: How many are expected to be there this summer?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well, we cannot tell yet for this summer, but with OCE and the other summer schools, I would think it could be something over 4,000 to 5,000. In the summer session of 1962, the enrolment was 4,781, in 1963 it was 6,000, so I would think that it could be, just guessing at this, somewhere in the neighbourhood of 6,000 to 7,000 students for this coming year.

Mr. Nixon: Now, many of those, of course, are taking courses that would up-grade their certificates?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Yes, this is correct.

Mr. Nixon: And special work along this line? But I think if you are going to compare the number that are actually working for a basic teacher's certificate, the ratio would be four or five to one. That is, comparing those who take their basic teacher's certificate at the summer school, with those who go to the winter session. Surely this must indicate to the hon. Minister, that some far-reaching re-thinking of this whole plan is needed. I must say I agree with the hon. member for Scarborough West's assessment of the problem and I am very interested in his suggestions to solve the problem. But I feel his suggested method for breathing life into a system which is essentially dead, basically rests on drawing it away from the direct control of the department. But aside from that, the suggestion of allowing graduate students, or students holding university degrees, to take their teacher training in the schools themselves, with the training involving philosophy, psychology at the university level and perhaps at the undergraduate level, is one that you should examine very carefully.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I was not sure yesterday or the day before, whether the hon. member was going to suggest that perhaps the winter course programme at OCE was not really necessary in view of the success the summer course students were having.

Mr. MacDonald: It is just avoided by everybody who can.

Hon. Mr. Davis: The point is this, Mr. Chairman: You have many people coming back now, wishing to get into the profession, who have left university for a number of years, and the summer course is one way of getting them into the profession. But it also poses a very distinct problem for the type of institution, perhaps, that the hon. member for Scarborough West suggested, because as I understand it, what he is suggesting is more of a continuing sort of educational type of programme, not too dissimilar to some of the institutions south of the border, which makes it very difficult for a person, say, with even an M.A. degree, who has specialized at the university. What institution does he go to, for what period of time? Does this mean he should go back and take a two- or three-year course, or can he not receive some credit for his experience, which must be worth something in business or industry? We have many engineers today who are going back into vocational or technical streams, whose experience, I think, is invaluable. Is it wise to have a system that is so rigid that they have to take another two or three years of training?

These are the areas that are complicating the problem at the moment and this is why the summer course has certainly some validity. It is not just a case of their not wanting to go back, it is a question of economics for many of them as well.

Mr. Nixon: If I might interrupt for a moment. The summer course is not—in the hon. Minister's view—just a stopgap means of providing teachers that will be eliminated? Is it bound to be a continuing and valuable part of teacher training?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well, Mr. Chairman, I would go this far, because I do not think this situation has become crystalized, I would go this far and say that for the person who has been out in business or industry or some profession and has been acquiring certain knowledge and experience, I think it is advisable at least to consider some type of programme or course, whereby he can spend a period of time, but not necessarily the full period of time, becoming qualified on an interim or temporary basis, to instruct, certainly on the vocational side of our secondary school programme. I think we would be very unwise to eliminate this from our thinking altogether. I am not saying it is necessarily permanent and yet at the same time I would not want to suggest to you that this avenue should not be open. I think perhaps it should be.

Mr. Chairman: The member for York South.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, referring back for a moment to this preoccupation, to the point of an obsession, with methodology that the hon. member for Scarborough West referred to in the whole approach of OCE. This accurately reflects, as far as I have been able to find out, the department's approach, because I am going to remind the hon. Minister once again of something that I took up with him and other members of the department a year or so ago. The more I think about it, the more I become baffled and the more I can understand the sense of indignation, in fact, outrage, at the regulation being imposed upon teachers in our technological institutes. The proposition that a teacher in a technological institute, a lecturer in a technological institute, has to go for—I believe it is three summers—to OCE, to study methodology which he is not going to use.

Indeed, I can tell the hon. Minister of one class, where a group of them came into the class in the summertime at OCE, and the instructor came before them and started, at almost grade level, instructions as to the punctuation you put in a sentence. The class was absolutely astounded, and very quietly informed him there were three MAs in English in that class. The instructor, to his credit, was embarrassed by this and they did some revamping of the course. Now, surely, Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister, even if he has to exercise arbitrary power within the department, can get rid of this kind of thing. Because you are losing good teachers.

Just let me give one more point, if I may, Mr. Chairman. I know a chap, he happened to be a personal friend of mine years ago, who left business because he wanted to go into Ryerson, because he wanted to teach. He took a teaching job as a civil servant in the province of Ontario. Indeed, I believe he had something to do with the preparation of the book in one of the business administration classes and courses that were developed at Ryerson. He just became fed up to the teeth with this kind of thing. And he is not the kind of person who gets indignant and outraged very readily. But he wanted to do advanced study in the course he was teaching. He wanted to get more information on his course, but he was compelled to go back for three summers, Mr. Chairman, and waste them at OCE.

You know what happened, he just left. He went to an institution of higher learning that was beyond secondary level and was not going to treat him like a grade school pupil, let alone teacher. He has left and you will never get him back again.

Now it is this kind of thing, and I cite this not just as an instance per se, but as an indication of the kind of approach. If the hon. Minister is very anxious to comment on that, I have one other pedestrian point in relation to it afterwards.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well, I recall, I think the hon. member used the same example last year and I recall it now and I did some checking and you will be interested to know that actually there will be a staff member from Ryerson in the structural programme in the summer course this year and that the staff people at Ryerson have assisted now in the designing of the summer course, the programme for the Ryerson instructors. This might be of interest to you.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, the question, the pedestrian point I wanted to raise with the hon. Minister is that I had a letter—this may fall within this estimate, maybe it is outside; perhaps the hon. Minister would permit me to put it to him—from a person who is teaching in some of our institutions of higher learning. He is going to become a civil servant. Let me just quote from the letter:

I have just discovered at that time that the regulations required that civil servants must be Canadian citizens or British subjects to be eligible for permanent appointment. Apart from the obvious discriminatory aspect of this, it hits us directly since we must rely on other countries to provide us with qualified teachers.

In other words, in many of these institutions where you are having difficulty getting qualified teachers now, when you do get them, you find that you have this regulation that they cannot become a permanent appointee because they are not a British subject, or a Canadian citizen. Why this?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I think this also applies in the United States. I am not sure that I can give the hon. member any reason from our department standpoint. This is an area, I guess, for the civil service and yet, perhaps, referring to the way we might solve this, it could be with the proposal we have now. As far as vocational teachers are concerned, in our new vocational centres we are hiring them on the basis of being outside the civil service, so this would not apply. But this raises a very interesting point. I shall try to get a more definite answer for the hon. member. It is something that certainly has not affected the department to date. But it is one that might unless we were to bring them in under the other provision that we are attempting to introduce. I shall endeavour to find out.

Mr. S. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Nipissing has allowed me just to make two or three minor observations on this field before we move on.

I would like to say to the hon. Minister that three things are on my mind. First, because problems are the same in other jurisdictions, I am sure he agrees that it does not invalidate the need for a solution in this one. In fact, because problems are the same in various generations—I smile when I say that—it does not invalidate the principle.

Now, two more substantive observations: First, I appreciate what is being done with the new college of education associated with the University of Western Ontario. I appreciate that some of the ideas may apply to Toronto. But two of the fundamental suggestions I put to the hon. Minister, I suggest, are not being regarded. The one—and I want to go back to the hon. member for York South because he re-emphasized it—is that this preoccupation with methods is driving people away from the teaching field.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has made his point. There is nothing in what he said about the new college of education in London that indicates there will be a preoccupation with methods or methodology.

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. Minister concedes the point?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I am not conceding any point. I am just saying there is nothing in what I said that indicates there will be a preoccupation with methods at Western.

Mr. MacDonald: That Osgoode training stands by the hon. Minister well.

Mr. S. Lewis: There is nothing in what the hon. Minister said that indicates there will not be a preoccupation.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Oh, I think there is. I think there is, Mr. Chairman, if one wants to look closely at what I suggested: That one of the reasons for increased costs will be the plan for tutorial instruction at the new OCE and Western. This, hon. members will recall, is one of the basic principles in the secondary school teacher training report.

Mr. MacDonald: Do not try to defend the indefensible while—

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well, no.

Mr. S. Lewis: I will withdraw that with the quiet and closing observation that the reason I put it rather strongly, Mr. Chairman, was that most educationists in the field are beginning, like a man such as Conant, to question the whole concept. He says in the part of his theory and practice of teachers chapter:

I conclude therefore that such general method courses are unnecessary and duplicate materials already studied.

The other thing I wanted to say, Mr. Chairman: I would like to have explained to me why it is that in fields of philosophy, psychology, and so on, those who will be involved in the teaching should have good academic qualification and outstanding competence in teaching in secondary schools. Those are the hon. Minister's words.

What kind of emphasis is there with an educational system that provides the teaching of these areas from people in secondary school education? Surely in the areas of educational philosophy, and so on, the teachers should be provided from the university area. This, I think, is one of the things that worried us.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Obviously these instructors will have had university degrees and experience. I think it is obvious, too—and this is where the hon. member and I may have some disagreement—that there may be some slight difference in the educational philosophy that you want to impart, or the attitude you may have with the Grade 9 student than what you might have with, say, a second- or third-year university student, because you are dealing with different people. And I think it is quite important that you accept or realize this. A person with secondary school experience, a competent person who specializes in the field of psychology or philosophy, could quite conceivably do a much better task working with these prospective teachers than could a person who is academically orientated at the university level, with this being his sole experience. Now, I just offer this as a suggestion.

Mr. S. Lewis: Okay, I accept it in the spirit in which it is offered. But it does not tend to conform to most of the attitudes that I have read—no one denies there has to be some practical aspect, but that is gained through the practice teaching. To suggest that certain fields, so obviously within the ken of a university milieu and a community of learning, should be delivered to the students at a lower level makes no sense to me.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well, is the hon. member suggesting—I do not want to labour this point—that a person who is a graduate from the institution of higher learning with his doctorate, say, in psychology or philosophy, and because he spent two or three years in the secondary school field, is not competent to do this type of task because he is no longer a professor lecturing at the university? I do not think this makes too much sense, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. S. Lewis: I agree. Is the hon. Minister saying that throughout the experience of OCE the people who have done the philosophy of education courses—

Hon. Mr. Davis: We are talking about the proposals for the OCE at the University of Western Ontario—

Mr. S. Lewis: All right. What about the one in Toronto? Is the hon. Minister saying, then that the people who are in charge of the psychology-philosophy and history of education courses at the new OCE will be doctorate people?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I did not say that.

Mr. S. Lewis: Oh? The hon. Minister did not say that?

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, I said they would be as competent as we can find.

Mr. S. Lewis: I imagine that our—

Hon. Mr. Davis: The hon. member may have his doctorate by then and wish to lecture there.

An hon. member: If he does, will the hon. Minister give him a job?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Yes.

Mr. S. Lewis: I hope to be around a little longer than—

Hon. Mr. Davis: But not in political philosophy.

Mr. S. Lewis: I appreciate that.

One other question, Mr. Chairman. I would like to ask, finally, why this distinction in the hon. Minister's mind, or the need in his mind to have the ambivalence of control from the department and the university? Why does he not see justification for bringing an institute or faculty of education within a university environment?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well, Mr. Chairman, this is an area where we could spend a great deal of time in theory and so on. I think the only thing I can say to the hon. member is that with this new agreement with the University of Western Ontario, and one that we are considering with the University of Toronto, it is obvious that we are establishing a closer relationship than we have had in the past with the universities.

I think that the hon. member feels we should immediately move into this area. There are problems involved; the question of teacher certification for example. Is the hon. member suggesting that this be taken away from the control of The Department of Education? I think this becomes a very basic situation and one which, quite frankly, I doubt whether we will settle here this afternoon, or in several weeks.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, I also, as the hon. member for York South, take a pedestrian approach to this. The president of the Ontario Federation of Teachers, or the former president, is quoted as saying: "Ontario is lagging behind other provinces in the improvement of elementary teacher training." He brings out the point that the minimum should be three years university training and he suggests The Department of Education establish a committee to investigate possible improvements. I presume that will be one of the jobs of the committee that the hon. Minister has now?

Hon. Mr. Davis: This is right. The committee the hon. member is referring to.

Mr. Troy: Fine. And then I note, too, at the Canadian Conference of Education—which, of course, also includes educators and professional men from other walks of life and trustees from all across the country—it was certainly their recommendation, or at least it was agreed, that teaching was the work of a professional. It is a professional task and therefore should have at least a minimum of a university degree, both in the elementary and secondary schools.

Now, with reference to a subject that is peculiar to my own area. It involves the North Bay Teachers' College, one of those relics, at least in construction, of the past. Not in construction by its teachers, but in construction. I wonder when, Mr. Chairman, may we have an addition at least to that institution so that the hon. Minister's programme of physical education, the fitness programme, could be carried out properly in that school. That is one thing they need and there is a desperate need for accommodation. One of the teachers on the staff who has been in charge of that programme through the years, is doing an exceptionally fine job, but the difficulties are quite severe.

I might also ask whether in September, 1963, while the students at the North Bay Teachers' College were enrolling, a report from Sudbury disclosed that the public school board was entirely dissatisfied with the physical facilities of the college? The chairman of the board said they would move a strong representation to the provincial government for a new building. The principal of the college said naturally his staff, and certainly the students that go there, do appreciate the interest shown by the Sudbury board and that everybody would be in favour of facilities.

Then later, I believe when the hon. Minister was in the city during a certain occasion last summer, I believe the possibility of moving that college from North Bay to Sudbury was mentioned. He, at that time I recall and I think correctly, said that the institution would remain in the city of North Bay, that it would be the institution for the training of English teachers, and the college in Sudbury would be bilingual.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I made this statement, Mr. Chairman. The position today is the same as it was then. We have no intention of moving it from North Bay.

Mr. Troy: Well, that is fine. Has the hon. Minister any intention now, or in the future, of adding either a new building or at least to add that facility?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, we have the intention in the future of adding to the existing building some facility to improve the physical education, and some classroom facility accommodation to the teachers' college at North Bay.

Mr. Troy: Yes, sir, but that is the same thing I—

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well, the hon. member asked me in the future.

Mr. Troy: Yes, I know, but the hon. Minister realizes that he has a programme in his department of physical education. He is emphasizing fitness and amateur sports, and this has gone on for years. All they can do is go to the picture show and see "Tom Jones" or one of those.

An hon. member: What do they do there?

Mr. Troy: I will leave it to you, you are just young.

An hon. member: You are past that age, eh, Leo?

Mr. Troy: Yes.

I still urge the hon. Minister that he look at it very, very carefully.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the young hon. member for Scarborough West. My memories of OCE, Mr. Chairman, go back many, many years. I know there were some frustrations but fortunately at that time—I was a member of a class in which most of the men were all veterans who had just returned from overseas—we had ways of getting rid of our frustrations very quickly. I assure you I have memories of some of the professors there that I will carry with me into my declining years.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, has the hon. Minister announced the personnel of the committee?

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, I have not, Mr. Chairman. I expect I will be announcing this within a matter of a very few days. The groups that are appointing representatives to this committee are now beginning to turn in their suggestions. The appointees from the department—the ones that we are directly responsible for—we shall have in a matter of days.

Vote 505 agreed to.

Vote 506 agreed to.

On vote 507:

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, this vote, of course, covers quite a variety of services. And there is one that I would like to make a brief comment on at the moment, and that is the correspondence courses which the department has been providing for a good many years and which according to the figures I have seen are growing in popularity. I have put forward the proposition on previous occasions in this House, and I would like to put it before this new Minister, that the department should do more to make the public aware that these courses are available. I realize that the public is sufficiently aware that the department has trouble keeping up with the growth of demand. Even so, the courses offered are, in my opinion, so much superior to those offered by private institutions, and the courses the department offers are free in most cases whereas those offered by the private institutions cost considerable money, so that I think the public should know that these courses are available.

Everything possible should be done to encourage people who want to repair gaps in their education to know that they can do it in this inexpensive way under the guidance of what I would judge are highly qualified instructors. I think the department should do some advertising of its correspondence courses. I periodically read advertisements in the paper quoting some harassed young man, shall we say, saying, "I got my senior matric in six weeks." Well, I do not know, he may have got his senior matric in six weeks but it is very doubtful if he got an education. He got some sort of a cram course. I think the department's correspondence courses offer the opportunity of an education.

I would like to commend the department on these courses. They started in a small way, I think for the benefit of people in remote areas. They are now becoming a useful instrument in dealing with the whole problem of upgrading skills and education which the advance of our society makes necessary. I think the government should go out on a real campaign to encourage more people to take these courses, to make them aware that they exist, to create in people an awareness that they may need them. Of course, that means that they will have to increase substantially the facilities available and I know they have been increasing rapidly over the years.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I think this is a very good suggestion. We have started in a limited way to make this more available, or certainly to publicize it to the public. We want at the same time to keep a very high quality in the course, which I think we have succeeded in doing to date. We have since April, a year ago now almost to the date, 7,700 students, and it is interesting to note that 69 per cent of those who wrote their Grade 13 through correspondence courses last year succeeded in passing. I can assure the hon. member that it is our intention to make the fact that these courses are available more widely known to the people, because I think this is a very excellent way of upgrading some people who left school either too early or for some other reason. I accept this suggestion from the hon. member for Woodbine. He will not object in the estimates next year if we have a certain amount in for publicity?

Mr. Bryden: No, not a bit, as long as Dalton Camp does not get any of it.

Mr. Nixon: In this connection I wonder if the hon. Minister or anyone in his department takes any responsibility for investigating the courses that are offered and promoted through ads referred to by my hon. friend with headings such as, "Getting my matric was easy," and comparing them with the matriculation of The Department of Education. I just wonder if he has taken a look at these courses.

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, we do not police these, Mr. Chairman. It may be becoming a bit of a problem and one that we might consider, because I personally know one or two people who were initially misled by these. When they arrived at the institution they realized that this was not quite what it should be, but there is nothing in our Acts or regulations that gives us any power to investigate this. We do over trade schools, but these other institutions are perhaps an area that we should take a look at.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, as you may know, the Ontario School for the Blind, which is situated in Brant county, has students from every part of Canada and has earned a very worthwhile and valued reputation. The government is presently extending the facilities there as far as the dormitories are concerned and we are very pleased that this is so.

But I would like to bring to the attention of the hon. Minister of Education that the salary scales for the staff of the Ontario School for the Blind are very seriously out of date. I understand that reclassification was to have taken place there many months ago. The salaries were improved for the upper echelon on the staff, and indications were given to the remaining members of the staff that their salaries would be raised, too, along the lines of the new classification with their pay being retroactive to a date that was given to them at that time. I understand that when their salaries are changed, there will be retroactive pay coming to them for 18 months.

I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Education if he is aware of the fact that these schedules are getting seriously out of date and that this seems to be a criticism that is directed to many departments of the government, and as a matter of fact, the whole civil service. The service is losing confidence in its employers, and certainly we in the Legislature are very conscious of this and concerned.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I am not in a position to tell the hon. member at the moment about the question of this being retroactive. I can get this information for him. We are of the impression that the basic salaries are adequate to attract staff. I think where the problem is is with the maxima. It is possible—and I put this in the area of a possibility—that the thought we have come up with for staffing the vocational centres by offering a yearly contract similar to that offered by a school board might. This might be extended into our other teaching-type institutions. Now whether this will come about, I do not know but this is something that is under study.

Mr. Nixon: There is a definite feeling among some members of the staff that they would not stay there except for the indication that they are going to get these raises, and that everything is in the works and has been for many months and they are getting a bit tired waiting.

Hon. Mr. Davis: We will look into this, Mr. Chairman, I am not familiar with this.

Mr. Nixon: I would appreciate it, if you would.

Hon. Mr. Davis: And I shall let the hon. member know.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, I would also like to bring to the attention of the House and again to the hon. Minister, a situation that I know that he is aware of. Yet since it has become public and in the newspapers, I feel it should be raised again in this House. It has to do with the situation at the Ontario

School for the Deaf in Belleville, and particularly the complaint of Mr. and Mrs. Gordon Fisher, who live in St. Catharines. According to this newspaper report they have withdrawn from the school at Belleville two of their children, Bruce, 19, and David, 9, and they say that these two boys developed serious illnesses after being released from the school's infirmary. Until they are satisfied that services have improved they say they will keep Bruce and another of their children, Marilyn, out of the school. The Fishers claim, and I am now reading from the newspaper report:

—that David was treated at the school for an upset stomach in late 1960; he came home at Christmas and it was found that he had developed Bright's disease and the youngster spent six weeks in St. Catharines General Hospital.

Now the story is considerably longer than that and I will not read it all to the House. Really the main reason why I felt that it should be raised in the House was that after it had become public knowledge and printed in the newspapers, a constituent of my own phoned and said that their family had experienced a similar difficulty when the boy concerned, who was, and I believe still is, a student at the School for the Deaf at Belleville, had been hospitalized there—that is put into the hospital at the Belleville school itself. The reports they received at home were that he was coming along well, and evidently enjoying television and this sort of thing. But when he did arrive home following this hospitalization they were so concerned about his condition that they took him to their own doctor and he was immediately hospitalized with a serious ulcer condition.

Now this particular boy—and I am not free to divulge his name but I would be glad to give it to the hon. Minister privately—is still in the hospital and the parents concerned were of the opinion that the school is well run down there, and they are aware of the fact that a general practitioner is available, but these young children, many of them who cannot speak as well as being hard of hearing, should perhaps have available the service of a pediatrician; one who might more readily recognize the symptoms that evidently have been missed in at least these two cases.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to go into the case that the hon. member raises. I have a letter here from an individual who read of this case or heard of it on the television, I guess, and who wrote to me that I would be quite free to use his name and commending the superintendent and the staff at the school, saying what a very excellent job they are doing and how careful they had been in regard to the health and welfare of his son when he was at the school. The part that I find most difficult to accept in the case that the hon. member raises is the fact that the parents have taken out these two children from the school. I can see no purpose or reason in this because there is no reason for the future of the children to be influenced. I think the hon. member is aware of the parents' attitude and their feeling towards the school. I am not sure really what they expect the department or the government to do.

I met with them, as the hon. member knows, myself. We had this matter investigated; and while I will certainly take under consideration the suggestion of the hon. member, the people who looked into this matter felt that there was a very adequate form of medical service available at this school and this is certainly substantiated by the letter that I have with me this afternoon. It is something, Mr. Chairman, that I question that we should go into in any detail as far as the Fisher case is concerned. I do not know what purpose would be served other than to say that the superintendent and, of course, the department are very concerned that we do maintain a very high medical standard there. We are interested in the welfare of these students. The school is providing, as the hon. member knows, a very excellent service and it is regrettable that this matter should be raised, I think.

I am not suggesting the hon. member should not do so, but it is unfortunate that these children in the Fisher family perhaps are suffering in their education because of this.

Mr. Nixon: If I might just continue, Mr. Chairman, I would say that it is regrettable particularly that these young people are not having the advantage of the continuation of their excellent education. I would repeat that the only reason I did raise it was that a second case came to my attention, and I must also repeat that in the second case there was no complaint with the administration of the school whatsoever. The suggestion was there simply that the services of a pediatrician might well be expected in these circumstances.

Mr. R. Gisborn (Wentworth East): Mr. Chairman, through you, I would ask the hon. Minister to recall that a few weeks ago during this session I handed to him a piece of correspondence, signed by the secretary of the Hamilton Association for the Deaf and Hard of Hearing. I believe the correspondence asked for consideration in financial assistance towards a building project for pre-school training. I feel that probably the fact that I did not get an answer was maybe an oversight. I wonder if the hon. Minister would make some comment in regard to the request?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, this request is still being considered and quite frankly it is one of those areas where we, if we were to undertake it, would be under some miscellaneous type of grant; we cannot do this as a matter of any policy because these are being done, as you know, through the local boards. Actually I attempted to see the hon. member about this some two weeks ago in hopes of arranging perhaps for these people to come over here, and as I recall the hon. member had been away two or three days.

I was anxious to meet with this group to see if we could find some other way perhaps of resolving their financial problem, and if the hon. member wishes to arrange this I will be happy to meet with them.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, before we leave vote 507, there is another matter I would like to raise and I think it probably comes under this vote, and that is the question of emotionally disturbed children. At least I can see no other vote where it would appropriately belong.

Not long ago the Ontario Association for Emotionally Disturbed Children presented a brief to the hon. Minister, I believe, and sent copies to other hon. members of the Legislature. It raised a number of matters that appear to me to be quite important, and I would like to find out, if I can, what the views of the hon. Minister and the department are on some of the questions raised.

In essence, the brief indicated that, as I see it, the majority of emotionally disturbed children are not discovered or, at any rate, are not discovered soon enough. Their brief has a quotation—I thought it was this brief had a quotation on it—I guess it was not this one. It was some other document I read. At any rate, it was to the effect that if you scratch an acorn, it will show itself in the oak and if you scratch a child it will reveal itself ultimately in the warped personality of an adult.

The concern of this brief quite properly is that the evidence of emotional distress or developing emotional stress should be noted as early as possible and that the children concerned should be given the proper kind of training and treatment to head off the situation before it reveals itself in an adult who may become an alcoholic or may have to go to a mental hospital or who may end up in jail.

The brief also get across the point that when disturbed children are discovered it is frequently possible to deal with them right within the regular school system so that we would not necessarily be involved in huge costs of building special types of facilities.

There will, perhaps, be an increase in the cost of regular school facilities but it would not be the kind of additional cost that would be required from building special institutions. Therefore, there is all the more reason for trying to discover these problems early, and then, when they are discovered, doing something about them, particularly under the regular school system.

There is one paragraph of the brief on page seven that I would like to read into the record, Mr. Chairman. I quote:

The above information emphasizes the following points in the association's opinion:

(1) the small proportion of emotionally disturbed children who are discovered by the customary method of referral;

(2) the fact that, generally, referrals are made only when the child's condition has become critical or his behaviour something of marked anxiety; in other words, he must have done something alarming before he is drawn to the attention of the authorities concerned; and

(3) of the small group discovered, a marked number are not treated anyway.

Mr. Chairman: It being six of the clock, I do now leave the chair and will resume at eight of the clock.

It being six o'clock, p.m., the House took recess.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION

On vote 507:

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Chairman, at the supper recess I was in the process of referring to a brief that the hon. Minister of Education (Mr. Davis) had received from the Ontario Association for Emotionally Disturbed Children. I had read some extracts from that brief, indicating that only a small number of cases of emotionally disturbed children are discovered early enough, and that even when they are discovered, frequently nothing is done about them.

Now, I would like to refer to one or two other portions of this brief, Mr. Chairman. On page nine, the brief quotes from two authorities in California as follows:

When at comparative ease, these children often display their true mental capacities. Many are quite brilliant, and often have even unusual abilities in certain fields . . . to be sure, it may be impossible at times to teach, or get through to the child, but at other times if he wants information or wishes to learn something, he learns it rapidly.

Then a little later, the brief quotes from a statement from the California State Department of Education:

Children with emotional handicaps who are identified early in their school life can be helped most economically and effectively by a variety of educational procedures, including (a) special classes; (b) providing the children's regular class teachers, special teachers, and counsellors with consultation services by a psychiatrist, psychologist, or social worker; (c) providing opportunities for children who cannot attend school to receive adequate educational services at home or in the hospital.

Then after a further review of the problem, Mr. Chairman, which I think I have fairly well summarized already, the association makes certain specific recommendations to the hon. Minister, five in all, and perhaps he would be willing to indicate to the House what his views are on each of these recommendations and what the possibilities are that action will be taken. For the information of hon. members I will read each one of them in turn.

1. That The Education Act be changed to make provision for special education by the board of education compulsory, instead of optional as it now is.

Would the hon. Minister care to indicate what his position is on that recommendation?

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education): Mr. Chairman, I should tell the hon. member that we met with this group, as he knows, and discussed this with them in some detail. Subsequent to this, one of their weekly or monthly news letters came out—perhaps the hon. member has not received this—indicating that they were at least partially satisfied or pleased with the discussion and the progress that was being made.

In dealing with the first item, they also referred to the same quotation that came from the state of California and we had a rather pleasant discussion, at which time I think they acknowledged that, while in theory these sentiments were being expressed, in practice there was not a great deal being accomplished in that jurisdiction in this particular area.

But as far as The Education Act being changed to make it compulsory is concerned, Mr. Chairman, this is not advisable at the present time because—and the group themselves would, I think, admit this—there is not a sufficient supply at the present time of properly qualified teachers. As the hon. member knows, there is already provision for operating classes for these children, under the local boards and there is financial assistance from the department for approved classes. But there is not a sufficient supply of teachers and until this is the case, then I think it is obvious that we cannot make this compulsory under The Education Act.

I should also point out that there are certain financial implications here, in that—at least this is what they suggest to us—a good teacher probably could only handle between eight and ten students, rather than perhaps the 25 that would be handled in the normal class, so that it does impose further financial obligations on the board. This is the reason why this first recommendation would not be practicable at this present time.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, that perhaps leads to the second recommendation, namely:

2. That The Department of Education assume leadership in helping local boards of education to provide educational opportunity for emotionally disturbed children.

Perhaps I should go through all five of them.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Actually they are related.

Mr. Bryden: Yes.

3. That such children be educated, as far as it is possible, in the same school as the apparently normal child, instead of, or in preference to, there being set up separate institutions for them;

4. That The Department of Education foster the setting up of machinery necessary for reliably discovering (a) the number of emotionally disturbed children in the province, and (b) the educable percentage of such children; and

5. That in special remote areas, or other areas where the local school board cannot provide for emotionally disturbed children, The Department of Education assume greater responsibility for the education of such children.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well, Mr. Chairman, I think we are all sympathetic to this problem. There are some obviously practical difficulties. As far as the third recommendation is concerned, I think we would all accept the fact that these classes, if at all possible, should be conducted within the regular school programme and that the children should not be separated the way they are. With the trainable retarded I think this is a different situation. In fact in discussing this with other people and the officials of the department, actually there are some of these children who might benefit from, say, short periods in this type of class and who should be spending the balance of the time in a regular classroom atmosphere.

As far as providing leadership in the development of staff, the hon. member will be pleased to learn that we are going to have a course in the summer of 1965. It is not possible to have it for this summer. We shall have a course in the summer of 1965 for the training of teachers for these types of classes.

Now, the other recommendation, that the department seek out these people in the more remote areas. Of course this is desirable but I think the hon. member realizes the practical difficulties of doing it, the problems of finding out just who these children are. It would take a rather extensive staff to do this properly and I think to be quite frank about it, this particular part of their proposal or suggestion, is still some time in the future. But as for the balance of it, I think we are moving in the right direction. The main problem is the provision of staff and this we are going perhaps to accelerate, if this is the proper terminology, by the introduction of the summer course in 1965.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, what about the other rather large problem that the association referred to, that is the problem of discovering or identifying these children? Great stress was laid and I think with much sense, that the important thing is to discover them as early as possible, so that they can receive such special treatment as may be available before their disturbance proceeds too far.

Now the brief pointed out that there really is nobody—nobody really knows how many emotionally disturbed children or potentially disturbed children there are in the province or in the country and that a great many of these cases proceed to quite an advanced stage before they are discovered. Are there any facilities—

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, we are in the process of doing a study on this now. It is a very difficult thing and some of the boards, I am not sure I am correct in this, but I believe Etobicoke is doing this and they have people available to assist us and I think Scarborough has as well. I may be wrong in the latter board, but we are conducting a survey now to see if we can determine the percentage of pupils affected so that we may know what we are dealing with. This survey is being conducted by the department.

Mr. G. H. Peck (Scarborough Centre): Mr. Chairman, I noticed with some interest that there has been a small increase in the budget this year for guidance, something over $8,000 in a budget of $102,400. I have some serious doubts as to whether we are giving this subject either the funds or the importance in the department that it deserves. This facet of education is a comparatively new one. It is one that I did not run into when I went to school, but it is one which has become increasingly more important with the advent of the Robarts plan and will become even more important in the future.

This screening plan that we have now is in the process of revolutionizing our secondary school system and has shown a great deal of promise in the short time since its inception. But this plan is a very complex one to most adults, and it must be even more confusing to students preparing to leave the primary schools, or the students already in the primary schools who find that they are in an unsuitable course and wish to change to another one more in keeping with their particular ability.

I would like to quote a few words from the hon. Minister's remarks. He said:

The holding power of our schools must be increased through the offering of a sufficient variety of courses to appeal to the different interests, abilities and aptitudes of the student population, and second, to ensure efficient utilization of our human resources, everything possible will have to be done to provide every student with as much education and training as he is capable of effectively absorbing.

Then he goes on to say:

The reorganization of the secondary school programme is in the three branches (1) arts and science, (2) business and commerce, and (3) science, technology and trade. In each of these there is a five-year programme completed in Grade 13 and leading to institutions of higher learning, and a four-year programme which gives a good general education but which does not lead to university. There is also provision for one-year and two-year occupational courses for students who have limited academic abilities and interests and who are preparing for almost immediate employment. These diversified occupational programmes, I may say at this point, are meeting the learning pace of about 10,000 boys and girls this year. Last year the number was around 5,000 and it is predicted that in a few years it will be over 20,000. If we add to this the growing enrolment of special vocational schools, we find that the number in these occupational programmes will be well over 30,000.

I would also like to quote from The Nature of Guidance an article on "Education for All American Youth." It says here that:

Guidance is no mechanical process whereby counsellors and teachers sort out our boys and girls as a grading machine sorts apples, this one to stay on the farm, that one to work in an airplane factory, this one to be a teacher, that one to run a local garage.

Guidance is rather the high art of helping boys and girls to plan their own actions wisely in the full light of all the facts that can be mustered about themselves and about the world in which they will work and live.

Guidance is not limited to vocational matters. It includes the whole gamut of life's problems. Guidance, moreover, is not confined to the secondary schools. Good education from the earliest grades onward includes guidance from understanding teachers, principals and counsellors.

I think we will see from these quotes, Mr. Chairman, that it is quite obvious that the success of this plan hinges on the guidance these students receive from the guidance teachers who channel them into the most suitable stream.

Here we have the weak link, the Achilles' heel of the plan, for we are simply not obtaining enough of the right people in our guidance system. There are many applicants but too many of them are people who are not properly qualified and too few are those who could really do a job in guidance.

I suggested that perhaps there should be more money in the budget for guidance and while that might be helpful to some degree, what is really needed is a programme encouraging qualified people to enter this field. Guidance is still not a major subject, Mr. Chairman, at the Ontario College of Education, and I submit it should be in order to give the subject the importance it deserves.

An ambitious teacher has now many more advantages for advancement in almost any other subject. History, physics, mathematics and physical education all rate higher, and down near the bottom of the scale we find guidance. The department does not seem to encourage this field to the degree that it should. Good guidance teachers feel they are being discriminated against. Very few of them, if any, are accepted by the department for the principal's course and so it is to be expected that a good many prospects seek other fields in education, knowing that they can go on to higher-paid administrative positions.

I would like to suggest to the hon. Minister of Education that the department should take a long look at this subject of guidance. As can be seen from his remarks, there are going to be more and more students channelling into these various courses and if we do not have the proper guidance teachers to guide them along their way and show them which course they should take, we are going to have a great many failures.

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Mr. Chairman, I agree wholeheartedly with some of the remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat. Yesterday I discussed this subject, guidance, in a general statement. I hope that the guidance itself will be extended into the elementary schools because it is my opinion that that is the area where the need is greatest.

I can remember that some of my friends went into the guidance branch of their schools and I asked them how they were getting on. They said it was really wonderful in guidance. You could be dashing around corridors with a few papers or a folder in your hand and did not have to report to anybody. They could be quite busy just carrying around papers. But seriously though, it is a very important branch of the educational system as the chief director very well knows and I am certain that the hon. Minister does.

I agree with the hon. member for—excuse me, I have to get some guidance myself—I agree with the hon. member for Scarborough Centre wholeheartedly that more money should be channelled into that particular branch. It is most important.

I was at the Canadian Conference of Education and that was a point that was stressed in all the branches, I think, that met at that conference—the necessity for proper guidance. As I said before, not only must the boy or the girl be guided or given direction to what courses they are going to take but the most important thing is that the parents also be brought into the picture. I say if there is any branch that needs further support it is that particular branch of the field.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I have just one or two observations. I think I have already stated in my remarks on two or three occasions that we recognize the importance of guidance and that more has to be done.

I would like to point out to the hon. member for Nipissing that 40 per cent of those taking the summer courses last year were in the elementary field. This is an encouraging sign. I should point out to the hon. member for Scarborough Centre that one reason we have problems with procuring appropriate people for guidance is in fact that we do lose a number of them to the vice-principal's and to the principal's courses. He would be surprised that this percentage from guidance is probably as high relatively as from any field in the profession.

I should also perhaps point out that this is the area, too, where I think the local board can do much to help improve the guidance services. Certainly salary is one way and taking a genuine interest in the guidance programme within the schools under its control. I think this is one area in particular where boards can, perhaps, exert a little greater influence than they have in some areas. But I would acknowledge, Mr. Chairman, that there is still much ground to be covered in relation to guidance. It is becoming increasingly important but, as the hon. member for Nipissing so properly observed, the ultimate decision for the future career of the child must rest with the parents themselves.

Mr. Troy: May I repeat what I heard so often in Montreal, particularly from those who represent the labour council, that the guidance teachers should have some knowledge of the world of work. Of course, work can mean many things to many people. I think that most of the people there knew something about the work world, maybe not in the particular connotation that the others had, but that was the point they stressed. I presume they meant they should know something about the opportunities in industry.

Mr. Peck: Mr. Chairman, I am glad to be reassured by the hon. Minister of Education that there is a high percentage of these people going into the principal's course and becoming vice-principals and principals. I think this is a very encouraging sign and that these people, when they are principals, will recognize the value of guidance. But I made the remark that very few of them were taking the principal's course.

Although I have no figures to go from, and do not know the guidance people from all over the country, I do happen to have a few friends who are in that field. It seems to be a bone of contention with them that they have put in applications for the principal's course and they did not know of any of their particular acquaintances that had been received into the course. They felt that perhaps their particular branch was being discriminated against.

Vote 507 agreed to.

On vote 508:

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I take it that departmental examinations come under vote 508. Am I correct in that?

I may say, Mr. Chairman, that I am somewhat concerned about what I have heard about Grade 13 examinations, or senior matriculation examinations as they used to be called. There is a group of high school students from my constituency sitting in the gallery and I have no doubt I could make myself very popular by saying I am in favour of abolishing examinations altogether. I am not sure that I want to go that far, but I have grave doubts about the efficacy of the Grade 13 examination as it now exists and as I understand it. I raised the matter in the public accounts committee with the departmental officials concerned. What I heard there has induced me to raise the matter now with the hon. Minister himself.

The specific example I took related to history exams. I have been told by history teachers who have been engaged in the marking of history exams at the Grade 13 level that the procedure is simply that the examiner ticks off points the student makes in his answer to a question. If he gets 15 points—if that is the predetermined number he should have and those 15 points happen all to be in the textbook he has been studying he will get full marks for the answer.

But if he happens to have a more inquiring type of mind and has read beyond the textbook; and knows more than is in the textbook to the point where he may have a somewhat different approach than the textbook has taken, and therefore may attach less significance to some of the textbook points than some of his more conforming associates do, he will be penalized. The person who really wants to study and understand is crazy if he carries that propensity into the examination room.

The important thing in the examination room is to know the things that have been decreed from above and make sure he spews those out on the examination paper. This, I say, I have been assured is the case by teachers who have been engaged in the examination process. When I referred to the matter briefly in the public accounts committee, nothing was said there to lead me to believe I was wrong. I would like to know if that is correct. And if it is, does the hon. Minister consider it is a good system?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I was not at the public accounts committee. As I understood the ground rules of the public accounts committee, they were to seek out the financing and the accounting problems of The Department of Education. But I gathered from some reports that some of the discussions went further afield than the actual financial problems.

Mr. Bryden: Only occasionally.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Yes, only occasionally. Just at every meeting. But as far as this question is concerned, I can assure the hon. member that when the marking scheme was established and when these papers are marked, the student is, in fact, given credit for outside reading. There is no question about this whatsoever.

Mr. Bryden: Well, in such a monumental project as the conduct of the Grade 13 examinations, with pupils from all across the province, how does one ensure some sort of uniformity of marking procedures? If a student uses his originality, it will to a certain degree be a matter of opinion by the marker as to whether he has shown true originality, or simply is talking around the subject.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I gather from the question there are marking plans that are prepared for the markers. But I gather from the initial question, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member was proposing the hypothesis that the student might answer the question correctly from the regular course, and then add his own embellishments to it; and since there are only so many marks for a question it is obvious that if he achieves 15 out of 15 in the regular or routine part of it that he cannot be given a bonus. At the same time, if he indicates that he has achieved a marked degree of success in the particular question, but perhaps not the full amount, and he goes beyond this and shows he has done some outside reading, there is some validity to what the hon. member is suggesting, that the student be given credit for that.

Mr. Bryden: I understood that if he did not have points, say it was 15 points that the god who wrote that book laid down, he would not get 15 marks.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I would assume, Mr. Chairman, if he was asked when was the War of 1812 fought, and he said 1810 because he read it somewhere else, that obviously he is not going to get full marks. If he is asked a question, he has to give the appropriate answer. But if he goes beyond this and indicates some other thinking, and some outside reading, then he is given some credit. But I think it is only proper to assume he should be expected to give the correct answer first if it is at all possible.

Mr. Bryden: Well, what is the correct answer? And why?

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): 1812!

Mr. Bryden: I would hope, Mr. Chairman, that the Grade 13 examinations are not as simple-minded as the hon. Minister's example. I would hope that if the War of 1812 is a matter of inquiry on a Grade 13 examination, the student would not be asked when it occurred. He might be asked something relating to the causes, if we want to call them that, leading up to the War of 1812.

What were the issues involved in the War of 1812? This is very much a matter of opinion. Many authorities will give you many different interpretations. I have no doubt the author of the textbook has to give one interpretation, pretty well, and that is his interpretation. He is entitled to make it. But the thing I am concerned about is that we should create in the student the notion that that is the revealed truth, that the interpretation given in that textbook is the sum and substance of what you have to know about it.

That, sir, I am assured, is what happens, and I admit that when there are thousands of papers to mark some sort of uniform standards have to be maintained. It is a difficult thing to avoid. But it certainly is discouraging to true education, to a true spirit of inquiry.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I think I have already told the hon. member this is not the case. I think it is obvious if he were asked a question and he were to state that according to the teacher or the authorized text, or the text that has been studied, these would be the causes of such and such a situation. But if in his further reading he came to the opinion that maybe something else transpired, well then I think he would have very adequately covered both sides of the problem and certainly would be given full credit. But I think it is quite obvious that he also has to give some indication that he knew what he was talking about as far as the prescribed course is concerned. There is a degree of flexibility and these students are given credit.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I read recently in the midst of all the discussions about machines taking over the functions of the departments of education; even to the extent, I understand, that in Florida a machine collates the results and determines whether or not a student has passed. If he has passed it sends a letter of congratulations to him which is signed "The Machine." I think that is an example the hon. Minister himself is reputed to have given.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I did not go quite that far, Mr. Chairman. I do not recall the letter of congratulations.

Mr. Bryden: Well, I read that about letters of congratulations. Perhaps we could solve a lot of problems if the computer answered the questions, too. But in the midst of all the discussion that has appeared in the press recently I noted a comment by somebody to the effect that about 30 per cent of the Grade 13 examination questions now are in the form of what are usually described as objective questions. The person who made this comment made it in the context of suggesting that a good deal of the marking could be done by a machine. Is that a fact? Do objective questions form that large a proportion of the examinations at the Grade 13 level?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, it is difficult to determine the exact percentage on an examination. But it would be something less than 30 per cent. These are not marked by machines—certainly not as yet. There are objective-type questions and their extent could vary from one paper to another, say 25, maybe close to 30 per cent, but it is less than 30 per cent of the paper.

Mr. Bryden: Well, Mr. Chairman, I would like to put in a protest at the use of the objective question. I would suggest to the hon. Minister that if he is going to use them he might as well have them machine-marked. There is only one right answer, unfortunately, although any thinking person with a knowledge of the subject looking at some of these objective questions would give you quite an argument as to what is the right answer. But under the system there is only one answer and if a student does not get that one right answer then he scores zero on that particular question.

I would suggest to the hon. Minister that the objective question in most instances puts a premium merely on undigested assimilation of information without any understanding of the information that is assimilated, or without the necessity of any understanding. The pupil may understand it but he can answer the objective question perfectly satisfactorily without understanding it at all, and I am going to suggest to the hon. Minister that that type of questioning is not appropriate in a Grade 13 examination which essentially is a university entrance examination and is not the kind of question that indicates whether or not a student is actually prepared to go on to university.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Of course, Mr. Chairman, I think this all depends on the course. If it is, say, in the mathematics field I think it is quite obvious that objective-type questions would be quite in order, maybe even in science. It is obvious also that you would not have too many, if any, objective-type questions in the English or English literature or the language examinations. I recall that somebody—and it may not have been a representative of the hon. member's party—was discussing in the estimates last year the advisability or the feasibility of the college entrance board situation being developed here in this province, and I want to assure the hon. member that the college entrance board uses a large percentage of objective-type questions. This is one of the problems they have. We feel quite strongly that the essay-type question has great merit and we intend to retain it as long as we retain Grade 13 or a reasonable facsimile thereof. But at the same time in certain areas the objective-type question can be used. It shortens this part of the paper for the student, gives him a greater opportunity and a longer time to express himself in other areas, and we do not feel that the objective-type of question that we have made available to the student so far is in any way damaging the writing of the papers as they presently are constituted.

Mr. Bryden: Finally on this matter, Mr. Chairman, I am going to put to the hon. Minister what may be a somewhat more radical proposition than I have as yet. I will reveal my age by stating that when I went to high school we had to write departmental examinations at the junior matriculation level as well as at the senior matriculation level. That first ordeal has long since gone by the boards—I do not know how long ago but a good many years ago—without any serious danger to the educational system.

I would like to ask the hon. Minister, perhaps tentatively, if it might not be possible to dispense with most of the Grade 13 examinations—at the departmental level that is, the uniform examinations all across the country—at a certain time in June when the students come in and try to put on paper in 2.5 hours as much as they can to convince some examiner that they have completed their course of study satisfactorily and are fit for admission to university or for such other further activities as success in Grade 13 might merit.

Conducting examinations on this mammoth scale makes it difficult to give a full opportunity for originality and initiative to express itself and to be properly rated, and at the same time to maintain uniform standards.

I would like to ask why it should not be possible to permit Grade 13 students to proceed on the basis of recommendations from their schools in the same way as Grade 11 and 12 students. For those students who are interested in getting scholarships, let us have scholarship examinations. That would then reduce the number of candidates to manageable proportions and it would, in my opinion, permit a much more sophisticated type of examination which would be a challenge to the student and a worthwhile test of his ability. I know the universities, especially with the large numbers of students clamouring at their doors, are anxious to make sure that no one gets through the doors, who is not likely to make a success of university. In actual fact, however, a large percentage of those who do get through the screen of departmental examinations fail in university and they are usually failed out in the first year or two.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Not a large percentage.

Mr. Bryden: A fairly substantial percentage certainly are failed out in the honour courses and shoved into the pass courses.

Hon. Mr. Davis: They stay in the university, a great number of them.

Mr. Bryden: Well, I am glad if that is true.

Hon. Mr. Davis: In many instances it is not because of a lack of academic ability either, when they do depart.

Mr. Bryden: Well, from my own experience, which admittedly is a long time ago, I would say it is because the high school system does not prepare them for university and that the first year in university is probably the most difficult period in any young person's life since he has to make such a sudden transition.

Hon. Mr. Davis: It is a social adjustment, too, for them.

Mr. Bryden: Well, there is a real academic adjustment. The student comes from this quite sheltered academic environment of the high school into an environment where he is almost entirely on his own and he can sink or swim on his own, and apparently there is nobody who cares very much whether he sinks or swims. However, that is beside the point. I am suggesting that there would not be a significantly larger number of misfits getting into university if students went in on the recommendations of their schools, and that the examination, as I suggested, was reserved purely for the minority of students of top quality who are seeking scholarships or other special forms of recognition.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well, Mr. Chairman, this specific proposal has already been discussed and until recently many of the university people were not enthused about it.

I notice that Dr. Bissell perhaps is having second thoughts on the matter, at least having other thoughts on the matter. Such proposals are being discussed now, as the hon. member knows, by the Grade 13 committee. Actually one of the reasons the Grade 13 departmentals have been maintained in their present form has been the fact that the universities have used them almost exclusively for their entrance requirements. The gentlemen who look after the computers indicate that they could perhaps forecast even from the Grade 12 results of those students who might conceivably be promoted at the Grade 13 level.

But the question of scholarships and, to a degree, bursaries, is important in determining some type of passing mark, but I can assure the House that this matter is being studied at the present time and this is one of the proposals that, if it has not been, it certainly will be proposed to the committee.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Mr. Chairman, I was quite shocked to see in the statistical section of the report of the department that 46.28 per cent of the papers written in 1963 at the Grade 13 level were graded under 60 per cent. And I was quite interested to see that the range of percentage failure from subject to subject at the Grade 13 level was from 7.84 per cent failures in German composition to a high of 32.45 in accountancy practice, and—if you want to get away from that to something better known—to 24.47 in geography.

I wonder if the hon. Minister has any views when he considers the importance of the mark obtained in these various papers as to whether or not more uniformity from subject to subject in the final statistical result might be achieved?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well, to a degree, Mr. Chairman, this depends on the number of papers written. There are not as many papers written, I think the hon. member will notice, in, say, the geography course. So that actually what would amount to a fewer number of either passes or failures would affect the percentage more substantially than it would, say, in English or history or some of the larger papers.

Mr. Nixon: There would not be many in the German composition?

Hon. Mr. Davis: There are not as a rule too many in the German composition. It is difficult to forecast, of course, from one year to the next what the percentage will be, but there is a greater fluctuation in those subject areas where fewer papers are written. I have not the 1961 and 1962 reports here, but you will not find quite the same fluctuation in the English courses or in the history courses.

Mr. Nixon: Do those in charge of the examinations have the power of some overall adjustment if the results tend to be considerably out of line?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Yes, Mr. Chairman. It is a very complicated procedure but there is a special revising committee. I think it is obvious that if a paper were set, and written by, say, 200 students, and 199 of them failed, that there would be a substantial revision. This has not occurred in these figures, but there is a revising committee, and the marks are revised.

Vote 508 agreed to.

On vote 509:

Mr. H. S. Racine (Ottawa East): Mr. Chairman, on vote 509, item 5, I notice an amount of $10,000 for the advisory committee on university affairs. On that subject I would like to make a suggestion to the hon. Minister through you, Mr. Chairman. I think the hon. Minister advised us the other day that several more appointments would be made to that committee and I think it might be appropriate if he would consider the appointment of a French-speaking member. He might already have thought of that, but I would make that as a suggestion. The point of view of that member might be a little bit different from that of the other members and I think might bring something to the committee.

In connection with that, I would like to say a few words about a subject I think should be brought to the attention of the advisory committee on university affairs. I would like—

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I do not like to interrupt the hon. member, but I gather perhaps he may be making reference to the University of Ottawa?

Mr. Racine: Yes, I would have some remarks to make—

Hon. Mr. Davis: I was just wondering if this would not be more appropriately dealt with under vote 518, with the specific amount that has been granted to the University of Ottawa. It is dealt with there specifically.

Mr. Racine: Mr. Chairman, I think perhaps I could make my remarks on that item. Thank you.

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Leader of the Opposition): Why has item five been put in that vote, then?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, the superintendent of the curriculum and textbook branch has acted as the secretary to the advisory committee on university affairs. Just for this reason it was put in this particular vote, I believe, in the last two or three years. This will be the last year because it will in future come under The Department of University Affairs.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the hon. Minister about a brief. I have not the brief—unfortunately I cannot find it—but I believe it was sent to the hon. Minister. I do not mean my brief, but he was sent a copy of the same brief. Let us be clear about this. The brief was from the Canadian Booksellers' Association. Did the hon. Minister have a copy of that brief?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I wonder if the hon. member would explain what was in it?

Mr. Troy: I guess the gist of the brief was that nowadays schools are getting tuck shops and selling all sorts of things, including, I presume, books and periodicals and things of that nature. The booksellers are complaining that the schools are going into a field which should be left to those who have been in the sale of stationery and books for almost a century. That was the gist. I am sorry I cannot find it, otherwise I would read it all. Probably most of the hon. members are quite happy I cannot find it.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I have just a very vague recollection of it myself but I think this is a matter that the hon. member would appreciate is for the local boards. This is certainly the case in the elementary school area where, the hon. member appreciates, most of the purchasing is presently done by the boards. Of course, this will extend into the Grades 9 and 10 levels.

As far as the department is concerned, we do not encourage this. I have had letters, I think as far as musical instruments are concerned, from some groups suggesting that the department should prevent the local boards from doing any bulk purchasing. But I think, Mr. Chairman, this is an area that should be left to the discretion of the local boards to settle with the local taxpayers and the merchants in the area.

Mr. Troy: But does the hon. Minister send a note to the boards saying he has that brief, bringing out these points, or does the hon. Minister touch on it at all?

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, I make a point, Mr. Chairman, of leaving this matter entirely up to the boards.

Mr. Troy: As the former member for Victoria used to say: "local autonomy."

Vote 509 agreed to.

Vote 510 agreed to.

On vote 511:

Mr. Troy: I am sorry that the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. Newman) is not here. I do not know how many of those 50 questions he asked, but however I do want, on behalf of an organization in which I have a small part, to thank The Department of Education and the hon. Minister himself for the support they are giving to not only our organization, but those other organizations in this country that are quite concerned with fitness and amateur sport. This is not the type of organization that we find on the pages of our metropolitan newspapers, which mostly concern themselves with the professional sports and say very little about the amateurs.

The department has helped my own organization, the Canadian Legion, which as everybody knows, now has taken as a major project the promotion of track and field across the country. We have brought to this country one of the outstanding coaches in the world in the person of Mr. Geoffrey Dyson. In addition to national clinics that we hold at Guelph every year, we also have a provincial responsibility of promotion of track and field in our own provinces.

Fortunately, our aim for some time has been, and will be for some time, the development of an upgrading of our coaches in track and field and the holding of regional clinics. The Department of Education has graciously assisted not only our organization, but a great number of organizations in this province in their leadership clinics which is most important. As you know, in any field it is most important that you first of all have the leaders; so I wanted to speak on behalf of the organization which I represent in this field, and because I am the Ontario chairman of this committee, to pay my respects to the hon. Minister and particularly to the very fine director of the physical education branch, Mr. Jack Ross, and the others in the community programmes branch, too, which are also doing a wonderful job in the field of recreation. I hope that the requests of groups across this province, not only by my own organization but by all the other groups that are interested in amateur sport—there still is a bedrock across this province of people who are quite concerned for the game for the game's sake and not for the "filthy lucre." But, of course, most people will accept it if they get the opportunity.

Nevertheless, sir, again I say thanks very much and I hope you will continue to support this programme and I hope your final arrangements will be made with the federal government so that you can even go beyond and expand.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I should not really, because I realize we want to get on with the votes but I should mention that under this particular area, and not in conjunction with the federal government, the government has decided, as many of the hon. members know, to award what we will refer to as an achievement award in the area of physical fitness and amateur sport. As a result of this decision, we appointed some time ago a committee to look into this for us. I do not recall the personnel of the committee in its entirety, but Mr. George Duthie, Mr. Douglas Maxwell and Mr. Norman Marshall are at least three of the members of this committee. And, Mr. Chairman, I should point out to the hon. member that we intend to present the first 45 achievement awards on Tuesday. I understand that the leaders of the parties opposite have very kindly consented to delay the opening of the House on that occasion for a few moments to make this presentation. The real reason I mention it is that one of the first recipients of one of the achievement awards will be the hon. member for Nipissing.

Several hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): A free ride on the ONR!

Vote 511 agreed to.

On vote 512:

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Vote 512, Mr. Chairman; I want to make a few remarks. Vote 512 deals with the encouragement and the building of libraries and training of librarians and so on. Vote 516 deals with the grants so perhaps what I have to say can be said here under vote 512.

Certainly, I think there is no argument in this House and in this country about the importance of books and libraries in our civilization; this is part of our heritage, and I understand that ever since the present hon. Minister has been appointed and has been giving some encouragement to the reading of books, even the hon. Minister of Mines (Mr. Wardrope) has been seen upon occasion to open a book and delve into it, although this is a rumour which I cannot confirm.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): Would the hon. member repeat what he said? I did not hear it. Let us hear it again.

Mr. Young: I would be delighted, Mr. Chairman, to repeat it. I said that since the hon. Minister of Education has taken on this portfolio and has evidenced some interest in this business of libraries, and has been encouraging the reading of books, I have heard that even the hon. Minister of Mines has been seen upon occasion to open a book and look at it.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Well, Mr. Chairman, I might say this that my education was gotten mostly the hard way. I learned to work, but some people who read books never work. I might say that for the hon. member.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): You reveal that every time you get up.

Mr. Young: Yes, some of the people who got their education both ways, both the hard way and through books, at least learn and eventually come to some state of wisdom. I am sure the hon. Minister of Mines has also arrived at that situation, or will eventually, we hope.

Now, Mr. Chairman, on this business of libraries I think that we have to face the fact that in Ontario, as well as across Canada, we have not been giving it the attention that we ought to give it. We have on record a matter of $100 a year per capita being spent on education as a whole and yet we are spending only about $2.15 per capita on libraries.

I am not saying that we should spend as much on libraries as upon general education because the library is simply one part of the total educational process. But certainly in a wealthy province like Ontario and a very wealthy nation like Canada, we should be able to find more than $2.15 which includes all costs—buildings, salaries, books, everything. I think we have to look at ourselves and ask whether this is adequate, particularly in view of the fact that today, with the coming of automation, more and more leisure time is going to be available to our people. Leisure is going to be part of our heritage and we hope that leisure will not be in the form of unemployment for part of our population, but that it will be in the form of paid leisure, ordered leisure, for all our people. And as that leisure increases, then the use of books should fill a part of that leisure at least. And so as automation increases, the availability of books ought to increase as well.

Now, during the past, we have had some surveys in connection with this and it is pointed out to us that the qualified librarian needs as much education and training as a high school teacher. But the income for the librarian has lagged far behind, in many cases many thousands of dollars behind the salary demanded and received by the high school teacher. There is a tremendous gap to be made up here.

And our library system, our building of libraries and the stocking of those libraries with books, has not kept pace in the post-war era with the growth of our population. We have not enough buildings, we certainly have not enough librarians trained, we have not enough library schools to train librarians and, worst of all, we have no plan in Ontario nor in other provinces for the development of a comprehensive library system. I welcome the indication here that the hon. Minister is going to make certain grants to encourage surveys in this field. But those grants, it seems to me, are phased over too long a time and I would hope that the hon. Minister, if real initiative and real drive is shown in this field, might speed these grants up so that this study can be accomplished more quickly, so that once it is finished we can get on with the fundamental job of building.

We are told by Louise Schryver, librarian in Chatham, in a letter to the Toronto Globe and Mail recently, that the library situation "is a national disgrace, and it is going to continue as that for some time." And she points out a survey which was made by one Eric Spicer. I have a copy of that survey here. I am simply going to quote two or three figures from that work. He says this:

The 1963 production—and he is giving Canadian figures:

—of 171 BLS graduates from accredited schools and 55 from non-accredited schools, is just not good enough. And this continued division of our profession is unhealthy. We need some 500 new librarians each year and they should be carefully selected and all of them should be well trained.

And he says that:

—the shortage of librarians is not only immediate but it is increasing year by year. Whereas the 1957 survey showed only that the shortage was immediate and likely to continue, we can now state with assurance the situation is far worse today—in 1963 that was:

—than it was in 1957. And by 1967, it certainly will be a national disgrace unless some positive steps are taken to recruit new persons into the profession, to retain those already working and to reclaim those who are no longer active but are still capable of making a significant contribution. If we are to have the library service we should have by 1967, if we are not to see an acceleration of a shortage, we must fill 573 existing vacancies, Canadian figures, and in addition 1,696 impending vacancies.

And Mrs. Schryver goes on to say this:

Since Mr. Spicer's survey, in Ottawa there are 60 vacancies and one university in Ontario this spring is recruiting for 50 qualified librarians. This is a total of more positions than the number of students graduating from the one accredited library school in Ontario this year. It takes no cognizance of the other universities in Ontario, new universities just starting libraries and requiring staff for them, or the 470 secondary schools in the province, for which there are only 235 school librarians qualified in any way. Nor does it consider the professional requirements of the 13 or so regional library complexes projected for 1967, for the provincial library services, many of these as centennial projects. There were only 114 teachers enrolled in 1963 in a library course given by The Department of Education and only one accredited library school exists in Ontario, at the University of Toronto. There is accommodation for fewer than 100 students a year in that school.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the hon. member because I am interested in libraries? I believe, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Downsview and I discussed this at some length last year, if my memory serves me correctly. I do not want to have the issue confused. The course this hon. member refers to is run by The Department of Education for those who wish to become, sir, elementary or secondary school librarians. I think perhaps they should be distinguished from those who might seek employment in the municipal system or at the universities. They are two separate groups of individuals, really, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, that is true, and this figure I gave is for those who are thinking of going into the educational system, the others being qualified for the public libraries in our towns and cities. But the fact is that even though this number of people is taking the summer courses and the other courses, we are going to face a very desperate shortage before too long. As a matter of fact, the shortage is here now.

Worse than that is the fact that many librarians today facing low incomes and overwork are being drained away to other kinds of work and to other countries, and so we are facing that kind of brain drain in the library service. I think it is a very, very serious matter.

We know that about one sixth of the expense of our general libraries comes from provincial grants and it seems to me that this must be increased. Too often the municipal council, perhaps thinking in terms of libraries as being expendable, thinks that here is a part of the budget that can be cut out or cut down. The library board is there but it is not quite as urgent as some other applicants for funds. So very often it is easy to cut down on the budget to the library. It seems to me that if we are ever going to overcome this, we have to not only press from the provincial level for municipal councils to accept their responsibility here, but also to increase at the provincial level grants that should be made.

I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. Minister should do certain things and I am sure he is perfectly aware of this, but I will remind him of it. I would hope that he will speed up the survey that is now being undertaken so that we cannot say two or three years from now, "Well, we are looking at the situation. The survey is being done. We are doing all we can." I think that survey must be speeded up radically. I think certainly there should be more library schools established and I would hope that steps are now being taken to establish library schools perhaps in other places than the University of Toronto so that people can readily arrive at these schools and do the job.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Does the hon. member not think that this might perhaps be inferred as an infringement of the autonomy of the universities to suggest that some universities establish library schools?

Mr. Young: I do not think it is any infringement. Any university, I think, in the province of Ontario would welcome the announcement from the hon. Minister that he is personally willing to give certain grants for this purpose and I think the boards would not regard it as any infringement.

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, the university.

Mr. Young: The universities? I am sorry, I did not get what the hon. Minister said.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I am just wondering whether the hon. member would construe the suggestion by the government to the university that it should start a library school, to be an infringement on its academic autonomy. I am just asking this for information.

Mr. Young: No, as far as I am concerned, Mr. Chairman, I do not think that any university board of governors would regard this as an infringement, particularly if it carried with it a substantial grant for this purpose. Any objections that might be made or would be thought about could easily be overcome if the hon. Minister would work out this kind of arrangement with universities. So I think this should happen.

The summer courses perhaps can be speeded up and this is something again to which I hope the hon. Minister is giving serious consideration, so that teachers who might supplement the teaching with work in the school libraries can be given the skills they need to do this work adequately, and do the work that ought to be done in that field.

Of course, the final big thing that should be done is this matter which I have already mentioned of much larger provincial grants. We always come back to this matter of money and the question of where we are going to get it. But I think in a matter as important as libraries and the building up of the library system of this province, money must be found for this purpose and found speedily. We are now dropping steadily behind vis-à-vis our population in this development. I would urge upon the hon. Minister that this matter be given very serious and very immediate consideration.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, just in answer to that, I recall in our discussions last year when the hon. member for Downsview raised this, I pointed out at that time my own personal interest in library development. It stems from the interest of a senior member of our family who happens to be the chairman of the local library board.

I agree with much of what the hon. member has said, except that not only should he make these suggestions here but much of what he has said should be brought to the attention of the local municipal councils, and I am not trying to avoid the responsibility of the government, but in the development of local libraries, local interest is of prime importance. As the hon. member has said, many councils look at libraries as being sort of not in the top priority category and as a result in many instances their budgets are chopped. I suggest that not only should the government be urged to participate perhaps to a greater extent in the provision of grants for libraries, but that the hon. member might use some of his very persuasive eloquence on the members of local councils. There are many municipalities in this province where this is a problem.

As far as the supply of staff is concerned, I am quite familiar with Mr. Spicer's report. I think, as I tried to point out earlier, there are two categories here. This is the question of the supply of librarians within the school system, and while there is a shortage, of course, of qualified librarians, it is not any more serious perhaps in the school system than the shortage of other qualified specialists. Where the main problem occurs with librarians is at the municipal level, and perhaps with the universities. Here there is great demand and it is not just a question of dollars and cents. This is part of it, although inexperienced librarians are starting out, I understand, in the neighbourhood of $5,000 to $5,600, which is comparable to new graduates in perhaps the teaching or even the engineering fields.

I would agree that some further encouragement to one or two of the universities might be appropriate. But at the same time there has to be some other way of interesting young people in the library service. It is not just a question of straight dollars and cents.

I received some communication from Mr. Spicer personally over the past two or three months as to the possible location of library schools. I suggested to the hon. member for Downsview last year that we would try to appropriate more money for libraries this year, and we have done so. It is not as substantial as perhaps some of us would like, but nonetheless there is an increase. This survey that is being conducted by the OLA is once again of some significance because it gives the members of this organization, who really are the ones basically interested in the development of the library service, an opportunity to participate. This came about in a rather unusual fashion. I spoke to the annual meeting of the OLA up in Kitchener, as I recall, some time either last spring or early—

Mr. Singer: How did it get there?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I do not know how it got into Kitchener. Oh, yes, this was the library association. This was another group and a very good group. When speaking to it I knew something of its interest in conducting a form of survey. I think the thought at the time was that perhaps the department might undertake it, so I issued a bit of a challenge to the group. I suggested to the association that if it would undertake this survey, that we would provide the funds. It did not take very many days before a letter arrived saying the association had accepted this challenge and that it would undertake the survey on our behalf. I suggest it will perhaps be a better survey as a result.

Whether it could be expedited any by the provision of greater funds in this coming year is doubtful. We are providing $10,000 this year and $5,000 for the balance of the survey but we anticipate we will have results from the survey after the first year. It will be a continuing situation.

Mr. Young: Might I ask the hon. Minister something regarding the survey? I might also say to him that I have already had the privilege of using whatever persuasive powers I have in my own municipality. I think in North York we are building a very extensive and very commendable library service and it is moving forward very rapidly. I only wish other municipalities would do as well as my own municipality is doing. So I think what he said is true. But it also seems to me that real leadership could come from the provincial level to other municipalities and to give more direction in that field. The hon. Minister says that by the end of this year some significant part of this report will be completed.

Does he have any further comment to make on that?

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, I have nothing further to comment, Mr. Chairman, other than that we expect it will be fairly comprehensive. Also, at our suggestion, they will be studying firstly the organization of library services. They will go on from there to the children's service field and the reference service field. The organizational part is obviously the area that we want to attack first and foremost and this is what they will do in this first year.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I think it is the better part of five Education estimates that I have said words about library services, to the present hon. Minister of Education and to his predecessor (Mr. Robarts). I do not recall, sir, whether or not Mr. Dunlop held that office when I first came into the House. But in any event, my former colleague, Mr. Ray Edwards—who was then the member for Wentworth—and I, spent a considerable amount of time and effort inquiring into and studying the library problems of Ontario and we tried to bring them before this House with as much force and effort as we could exert, sir, to convince the various Ministers of Education that here was a field that was screaming for action. On many occasions we have quoted Louise Schryver who has been the president of the Ontario Library Association. We have quoted many other people in this field. As a matter of fact, as recently as the supplementary estimates I made some reference to Mr. Spicer's report. The hon. Minister indicated some of his thinking then and indicated that at this time when he brought his own estimates forward, in full, he would give some further elaboration.

Again, by way of laying the groundwork to my comments, I was interested to hear the hon. Minister's remarks about municipal libraries. My hon. friend from Yorkview and I, over a period of a substantial number of years, were able to assist in establishing what is now the second largest circulating library system in the province of Ontario. I think my hon. friend followed me on the council, but as he came on, certainly his help was of the utmost value. The council of the township of North York was aware of this problem, and was able to attract from the city of Peterborough a gentleman named William Graff who came to the township of North York as chief librarian and built this system up from absolutely nothing.

We had one of those neighbourhood library systems that is familiar in many parts of the province, run by a group of very devoted citizens of the community, not professional librarians, but people who had some public interest in what was going on. They collected books, they held drives and suggested if you had any old books in your attic, "bring them in and we will put them in the library." There was that sort of library system until, I would suppose, about 1954 or 1955. Then the township of North York embarked on establishing as good a system of public libraries as it could.

We were very successful as I say. We were able to attract Mr. Graff.

In the township of North York today we have a main library on Yonge Street in Willowdale which is an outstanding example not only of architecture but of a building designed as a main library. It received favourable architectural criticism and certainly has been hailed by anyone interested in libraries as an outstanding method of building and handling library problems. In addition to that, there are some three branch libraries open now. There is a bookmobile system. The library in Don Mills is being doubled in size at this moment and, as I say, the library system in the township of North York, starting from nothing in 1953 or 1954, has now become the second largest. I would suggest, with due respect to the hon. members from Toronto, it is at least as good as the city of Toronto's library service.

I do want to pay a word of tribute to Mr. Graff who was so responsible in helping build this system, because unfortunately a year or so ago, he passed away. The library system is a credit, not only to his ability, but to the devotion he paid to his work and to his fine sense of public service.

This sort of thing, Mr. Chairman, I would suggest, is somewhat unique in the annals of the approach of various municipal councils to library services. The township of North York has in the last ten years or more, made available substantial sums to produce a good library system. But this is not happening all over Ontario. This is not happening by any means. There is very little encouragement coming from government, and I think the remarks that Mrs. Schryver has made over the years and that others have made, should be ringing a warning bell in the mind of the hon. Minister and should urge him on to the same sort of effort that is bringing about a solution insofar as the education of retarded children is concerned.

I commend him for that because he is one of the hon. members of the House who did not forget when he assumed ministerial office, the sort of things he said as a private member. When he went into that office, he carried out this particular idea which he had expressed very ably as a private member. He is interested, as he said tonight, in libraries, and he and I have discussed them on other occasions, along with his father who is the head of a library board and has done a very good job in his community.

But I would hope that he would bring the same sort of zeal to the problem of libraries that he has to some of these other problems he has handled. I would think that the time perhaps has come to examine whether or not the public library system and the school library systems could not and should not be co-ordinated. As we have been building all of these new schools, and there have been hundreds of them built in the province of Ontario in the last ten, 15 or 20 years, each new school has a library room and each library room has a teacher put into it who has received some sort of special training. I tried when I was on the municipal council to encourage a type of discussion which perhaps could lead to the co-operative use of these facilities and I ran into a series of brick walls, resistance from the educational authorities and resistance from the library authorities.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that it might be the path of good common sense to use these facilities over and beyond the school hours in every day, over and beyond the five days a week that the schools are open, and over and beyond the nine months that the schools are open. Here are new facilities, hundreds of library rooms in our schools, that are being built and used for limited purposes. It would seem to me that if the hon. Minister was interested in getting into a crash programme to provide for library facilities, he could well turn his attention to these new library rooms that are in these new schools.

In addition to that, the teachers who are taking these extra courses to qualify them as specialists find it much more rewarding perhaps in a financial way to be school teachers, and specialist school teachers and librarians, rather than public librarians. So they are being funnelled off. While they are doing a very fine job insofar as the school libraries are concerned, their usefulness as public librarians is just not available. As Mrs. Schryver has pointed out in the letter to which the hon. member for Yorkview referred, there are not enough librarians presently in the university course who will take care of the needs of one university. She suggests that by 1967 the professional librarian, as such, in the public field might in fact disappear unless the department is prepared to embark on a very extensive crash programme to take hold of this situation and do something about it.

Now this sort of crisis, and I suggest it is a crisis, is something that the government has faced before. Reluctantly it did admit some years ago that there was a shortage of teachers, and reluctantly and slowly it embarked upon a crash programme for training teachers and somehow or other the programme did work and as many things were done, more teachers were produced and the crisis was lessened and perhaps has disappeared completely today.

Some of my hon. colleagues have dealt earlier with the effectiveness of the methods, but in any event sufficient teachers were produced to take care of most of the classrooms but I think the next important matter that has to be faced by this department and faced most realistically is the real shortage, the real crisis in library services. The shortage in money to municipalities, the shortage of trained individuals, the shortage in facilities, and the real shortage in making available to all of these people in Ontario who want library services. In this age of specialization new training, new techniques, new reference books, new sources of knowledge, are most needed and I do not think that any educational system can be considered as beginning to cope with the problems it has to face unless it has a most efficient library service as an integral part.

So, Mr. Chairman, I say again tonight as I have tried to say in the past five years and as my friend Mr. Edwards from Wentworth used to say with me, and as the hon. member for Yorkview has said tonight, this is one part of the Minister's responsibility that demands his immediate attention, demands the immediate attention of the government and demands many more dollars, much more thought and much more technique to be given to it right away. I was a little surprised to hear the hon. Minister say, "Might we not be infringing on the prerogatives of the universities, if we urge them—"

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I want to be very clear on this matter. I asked the hon. member if in his opinion this would be. I did not say whether it was in mine, or even suggest in my opinion it would be. I was asking the hon. member's views. Nothing more, nothing less.

Mr. Singer: Well, I might ask if, in the hon. Minister's opinion, this would be an infringement.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I think, Mr. Chairman, that this comes to the area whether or not, if you ask a university to undertake this situation, what percentage or what amount do you make available, and what do you do with the university that has an existing course? You can see that there are many ramifications that have to be studied before one can pass an opinion on the subject.

Mr. Singer: The hon. Minister is playing very nice footwork with this problem and since there is only one university in the province that has a library school, he has a brand-new field and he has a real challenge facing him and I would suggest that if he approached the boards of any of the other universities, other than the University of Toronto, that they would welcome, with open arms, whatever assistance he could give them in setting up library schools.

I would suggest, sir, that if the hon. Minister approached the board of the University of Toronto, they would welcome him as well with open arms and say, "We need more facilities in our library school. If the Minister will just give us the money, we will get on with the job."

Mr. Chairman, this is the responsibility of this department and of this hon. Minister and if he wants more to be done—

Hon. Mr. Davis: I do not wish to correct the hon. member but I would suggest that suggesting matters to one of the universities is not the responsibility of this department. Now, Mr. Chairman, this might become the problem of the new Department of University Affairs.

Mr. Singer: Well, Mr. Chairman, over the years we functioned without a Department of University Affairs. Is the hon. Minister saying it is only because we are going to have a Department of University Affairs that we are going to pay some attention to what the universities are doing? I do not think that is what he meant, but until The Department of University Affairs comes into existence—and it is not in existence as yet—it is still the responsibility of the hon. Minister and his department to provide library facilities.

Mr. Young: If this hon. Minister is also going to be Minister of University Affairs, he should have a serious conversation with himself about this matter. Maybe he'd get results!

Mr. Singer: I would not even want to hazard a guess as to who the Minister might be, but if by any chance it might happen to be the hon. Minister from Peel (Mr. Davis) as he moves from one hat to another or from one chair to another, he might meet himself on the way by and do something seriously about solving the library problem.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, just before I continue on this vein of the other hon. member's, I understood the hon. Minister to say that the grants were increased this year and I am rather surprised, then, to read, from all places, a city of London headline that says: "Ontario Library Grants Setup Rapped—London Payment to Drop $37,081."

The chairman of the board goes on to say, and this is a very pertinent remark—

Mr. MacDonald: I think that one was made up.

Mr. Troy:

Noting the decrease in grant from the province, M. C. Keem, the new board chairman, said: "It seems like double taxation to me. It seems wrong to not know definitely each year how much grant you are going to get until you get it."

Well, that is a pretty fine statement. I have listened to the hon. member for Yorkview and the hon. member for Downsview talking about books and libraries and so on and they are talking away beyond what I want to talk about. Here in your metropolitan areas your young people and the whole population have opportunities to get to the Royal Ontario Museum, to libraries, to theatres, to centres of culture and so on, while all across this vast province there are areas where they are very deficient in even books.

The hon. member for Brant talked about the lack of knowledge of history, Mr. Chairman. I remember when I was a boy our libraries had books like those by Henty. George A. Henty's books gave us adventure and history at the same time. We had the Boy's Own Annual and Chum.

This was something we all used to get at Christmas time. They were wonderful stories of adventure, none of the trash that the kids bring to school now. But seriously, Mr. Minister, I believe a library service or a depot that was destroyed by fire, a number of the books destroyed—

Hon. Mr. Davis: Yes, that is true, Mr. Chairman, and I am advised that the library after some real effort is now back up again to full strength.

Mr. Troy: What about the books, though?

Hon. Mr. Davis: The books are replaced as well.

Mr. Troy: Yes, that is a crying need. You see, some municipalities in my own riding—and I am sure it is the same possibly in the ridings of the other hon. members from northern Ontario. These smaller municipalities have not got the money. They have not even got a library. They have none of the amenities of life that you have down here in the cities, and so books are most important to them. I am glad to know that this library service—

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: I did not hear what you said, would you repeat it?

An hon. member: He has quite a library—

Mr. Troy: Well, thanks, very much. I do not know what you are talking about but it must be all right. I am glad to know, however, that the library service will be functioning again. I was reading that very fine journal, the Christian Science Monitor, the other day. There was an article about bookmobiles. Is there such a thing as a provincial bookmobile, travelling library, just as we have the travelling dental corps and we have the dental coaches and travelling schools and the railway schools? I am sure such a thing as a mobile library might be a very fine thing in certain areas of this province.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, the head of the provincial library service attended a meeting in Sudbury last month with representatives from the area in the hope of enlarging the libraries in the north central region and the Muskoka-Parry Sound region. Both these regions presently have bookmobiles for library service.

Mr. Troy: Do they go into Nipissing too? Sudbury is in another district. Parry Sound is another district also.

Hon. Mr. Davis: It is anticipated, Mr. Chairman, that this will extend into certain areas of Nipissing. Perhaps not all of them, but they will extend into certain areas of Nipissing within the next few months.

Mr. Troy: As long as they get to the areas where there are no libraries. That is the important thing.

Hon. Mr. Davis: They will not go into North Bay.

Mr. Troy: There is a very fine library in North Bay and a very fine library in the schools. There is another library in Sturgeon Falls. But in the Mattawa, Kiosk, and other small areas there is not. I hope that in its travels it will stop in these certain sections.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I have no intension of repeating what the speakers ahead of me have said. But there are a number of questions with regard to administration and policy that I would like to direct to the hon. Minister.

May I ask the hon. Minister: What personnel have you in the provincial library service?

Hon. Mr. Davis: The provincial library service, Mr. Chairman, includes the director, of course, five librarians, three assistants, three clerical assistants, and one shipper. It is a total of 13.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest that if there is any substance at all—and I am convinced there is—in the magnitude of the problem that has been outlined by the hon. members for Yorkview and Downsview, and that if the government is really serious in laying the plans for providing library services across the whole of this province of Ontario, there is the point where they have to make a beginning.

I do not profess to be an expert in this field, but I have been well coached in the last week or two by somebody who is, and he does not happen to be somebody from the city of Toronto. From his detailed information and knowledge of the library problem in the province of Ontario, he said that when you get out into the hinterland you simply do not have the dynamic drive and the planning and which I submit the provincial library service is the logical place for it to come from.

I think, Mr. Chairman, we have moved into a completely new era in one respect. It is really not new, but the needs are becoming so much more pressing and the public is conscious of them. It is not only the thirst for adult education, which is filling evening classes; it is not only the growing recognition of the need for retraining, which is creating an interest in books on the part of people that have never had it before; but it is this whole flowering, so to speak, of adult education and the tendency to develop reading habits. We are not getting out into these areas to meet this need.

For example, let me ask the hon. Minister another specific question. What system of grants have we to help fill the areas where there are no libraries now? I am thinking partly of suburban, but more important, the outlying areas?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman this, of course, is mainly done through municipalities, but it is also done through county or regional co-operatives. This is what we are endeavouring to do in the larger rural areas where, perhaps, there is not a large centre of population. We have been developing a number of these. In fact, there was legislation introduced at the last session providing for not only this, but the regional reference type of library as well. This is how it is done and these are the areas through which the grants are channelled.

Mr. MacDonald: May I ask the hon. Minister, what does the director of the provincial library services and his limited staff of five for a province the size of Ontario do in terms of getting out and assisting in the development of libraries in these outlying areas?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, the director was up in Sudbury, as I mentioned earlier, attending a meeting there of representatives from these rural areas surrounding Sudbury, Parry Sound and Muskoka areas. He assisted them in the organization of the structure that is necessary. They spend a great deal of their time in the field and, of course, they operate the actual library service, the bookmobiles, and the primary job of mailing or packaging of books on a rotating basis to many areas throughout the province.

As I recall, they are to be in Kapuskasing, some time within the next week or ten days and they spend a great deal of their time meeting with people. But the desire has to be there. It is difficult for an individual to go to an isolated community and say there should be a library. I think the hon. member will find that in all those areas that have expressed interest we have been able to give assistance in some form or other; and, of course, they then qualify for their grants under the regulations.

Mr. MacDonald: We are back to an old problem with regard to many things. True, I suppose the government can sit back and say the desire has to be there. We have to be asked to come in before we go in. But it seems to me that if the need is as great as has been spelled out, then it seems to me there is need for more leadership and more initiative. I am not being critical of the people who are involved. Trying to cover the problems of Ontario with only six professional people is almost as impossible as some of the inspection jobs they have in The Department of Labour, where you try to cover the province with a few people.

Let me move on, without taking too much time on each phase of this, to another aspect of policy. As I understand it, there have been new grants established during the past year or so in which more generous grants have been made to schools. As I see the picture, there are a lot of unresolved problems being created by this. For example, I am told that in Hamilton, or even Port Arthur, they will discover, for example, that the grants going to the school library are larger than the grants that go to the public library.

Until now, the public libraries have knocked themselves out in terms of not only servicing the community as a whole, but servicing the schools. And suddenly we have this reversal of position. I am not being critical further as to school libraries, but it is creating administrative problems. Indeed, as I understand from the quotation that the hon. member for Nipissing read, the hon. Minister had a bit of a public furor on the issue in the London area—I imagine that is a section that gets attention rather quickly—because they discovered that the public library board's income was going down.

In the relative size of these grants there has not been any working out of policies—for example, billing the schools for the service that the public libraries have been provided with in the past. My question to the hon. Minister in this particular area is: What is being done to iron out all of the uncertainties and questions that have arisen because of the development of the school libraries—in terms of working out a more efficient co-operative effort between the schools and the public libraries, along the line the hon. member for Downsview spoke about a moment ago?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, this matter is, of course, of some concern. The problem of using joint facilities is one that has been explored. But there are many problems. I think they are obvious. We have been spending greater funds for the development of libraries in the elementary schools but such libraries are really not suited, perhaps, for use by the general public. They could not be used, of course, during the school hours and if open after school, the books themselves are not very useful. There are not many adults who would want to go in and use the facilities. At least the books that are made available to Grades 3, 4, 5, 6 and even 7 and 8 would not be too suitable. At the secondary level the problem is not quite as difficult, except once again in connection with the timing. A lot of people like to use the public libraries, it has been my experience, that people like to use the public libraries not just during the evenings but during the daytime period, and for this reason it is difficult to use joint facilities.

As far as the grants are concerned, the regulations for library grants are presently under revision. This has been partially brought about by the fact that some elementary school boards, particularly, have been receiving sums that might be in excess of what the public libraries have been receiving. We are going to try to relate the two so that there will not be this disparity.

But nonetheless the possibility of joint use of these facilities presents some real practical problems. I think the hon. member can appreciate what they would be.

Mr. MacDonald: I can appreciate the problems, Mr. Chairman, and I am glad to hear that the hon. Minister is looking into the question of the relationship between the two because I think it would be most unfortunate, now that we have helped to develop libraries within the schools by these more generous grants, that we should create friction with the existing public libraries. There is no doubt about it, that those frictions have grown up and this is, I think, what we should look into.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I might add for the hon. member's enlightenment, that this problem was created in the city of London and he may be surprised that we have not resolved it.

Mr. MacDonald: Oh, well. It is unique. I have a couple of questions in relation to the library training facilities. Has the hon. Minister had any representations, or what is his view on the proposition of separating the training of librarians from OCE and making in effect a university course in conjunction with the accredited library at the University of Toronto?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I am just going by memory. I do not think I have had any representation on this. I may be wrong; I get a number of representations, but I do not recall this specific one. If you want me to pass an unofficial opinion—I am not sure that this would resolve the problem. I can see certain benefits, of course. There might be a more intensive or extensive training of the librarian in a larger school, say, at the University of Toronto, but I do not know whether it would improve the numbers of students or the numbers of prospective librarians. I do not know that I see an advantage from this standpoint.

Mr. MacDonald: It may well be that it is just a part of the problem of the attitude toward the OCE and the fact that if they were associated with the university community—it may be a reflection of that.

Hon. Mr. Davis: You mean some people's attitude toward the OCE?

Mr. MacDonald: The majority attitude, even among teachers. My final question is, Mr. Chairman—as I understand it, the University of Ottawa has a library school but it is not an accredited school. Now—it is an accredited school?

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, it is not.

Mr. MacDonald: The question I want to put to the hon. Minister is this: It has not received grants until now. The faculty of medicine in the University of Ottawa has received grants because of the obvious capacity to fulfil a need in the community as a whole. It is rather ironic that a distinction is being made—that there is a grant to the faculty of medicine and one is refused to the library school.

If it is of the standard—which I understand that it is—that is worthy of accreditation, why does the government hesitate on the proposition of making it an accredited school with grants? It has the capital base and the working operation to train more librarians. I do not need to emphasize that our desperate need, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Yorkview and the hon. member for Downsview, is to train more librarians. Here, Mr. Chairman, is a school in operation, why not accredit it, give it some grants and have it turn out more librarians, because our need is so great?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, the structure of the University of Ottawa is rather complicated. The medical faculty qualifies as a provincially assisted portion of the University of Ottawa and the library school does not because of its denominational nature. This is the reason.

Mr. MacDonald: Can it not be broadened, has it got the facilities for the teachers?

Hon. Mr. Davis: We have suggested to the University of Ottawa that perhaps there might be merit in bringing the whole university in under the umbrella so that they could receive total assistance.

Mr. Racine: Mr. Chairman, perhaps the hon. Minister would like me to make my remarks now because I think I could answer that question.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I have no objection, I have some idea as to what the hon. member wishes to say about the University of Ottawa, and whether he does it here or under the university estimates is entirely up to him. I think that it is perhaps more appropriate there, but that is up to the hon. member.

Mr. Racine: Mr. Chairman, I would like at this time to throw a little light on the question of the University of Ottawa and I think the question from the hon. member for York South gives me the opportunity.

Now, the Budget, as presented by the hon. Provincial Treasurer of this province (Mr. Allan), shows a sum of money being given to the University of Ottawa, which is entirely inadequate and which will prevent this institution from doing the job it is expected to do by The Department of Education and by the citizens of this province who choose to send their sons and daughters to this university, rather than to other existing universities in this province and in Ottawa itself.

Of course, the price for higher education has been increasing at a speed which presents us with a major financial problem. The presidents of different universities have deplored that the grants have not been higher. But in my constituency, sir, an institution of higher learning which is in no way inferior to the other similar institutions in this province, is given treatment which does not afford her the unhampered opportunity to contribute her maximum to the enrichment of the whole community. As the member of this Legislature for Ottawa East, and as a French-speaking Canadian, I would like, Mr. Chairman, to express briefly my views on this problem to the members of this assembly. Except for the fine speech of my friend the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Guindon) last year in this House, I do not think the hon. members of this Legislature are perfectly aware of the existing situation.

For over a century, with a provincial university charter since 1866, the University of Ottawa has been training generation after generation of young men and women of this province, both English and French, Catholic and non-Catholic, in the different fields of intellectual endeavour. Day after day, dedicated men have engraved the distinctive character of this institution which today is acknowledged as one of the greatest and one of the best universities in this province.

The rector of this university has been elected and re-elected by his colleagues, the presidents of Canadian universities and colleges, as chairman of their board. Her teaching staff—lay as well as in greater numbers as clerics, non-Catholic as well as Catholic—her teaching staff is as qualified as that of any other university and enjoys an excellent reputation among its peers in the different learned societies in which its members have occupied responsible posts and contributed remarkable works of research. Her students come from the common stock as those of other universities, and participate on an equal footing with the provincial and national student unions. Her graduates are immediately hired by provincial and federal civil service commissions, as well as by industry, commerce and business; or they practise the different professions for which they were trained at the university. I am sure that they are as good teachers, as good psychologists, as good librarians, as good lawyers, as good philosophers, as the graduates of other universities.

I know, Mr. Chairman, that this could be said of any other university in this province. And I am proud of all our institutions of higher learning. What I said of Ottawa in no way should be interpreted as disparaging any other institution. My only point is this: the University of Ottawa is doing for this province exactly the same job as the other universities, in a way which is not inferior to that found in similar institutions. For that same service to the province of Ontario, what are the appropriations in the Budget presented by the hon. Provincial Treasurer?

In operating grants, for 44,000 students in this province — $47,696,000, an average of $1,000 per student; in capital construction fund, for the same number of students—$53.6 million, an average of $1,200 per student.

If we turn to the University of Ottawa, we realize that for the 3,800 students actually registered—this figure will increase next year—the Budget appropriates an average of $335 per student for operating grants and $315 per student in capital construction. This is one-third and one-fourth of what is appropriated for the average student in this province.

Therefore, how can we reasonably expect the members of my constituency, and in general the families and the taxpayers of this province who choose to send their sons and daughters to this institution, to be satisfied? How can we expect the French Canadians of this province to be satisfied when such treatment is given to the only university already operating in all fields where they can qualify according to their own mentality and culture?

The hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) had wonderful words about French culture in this province. He has earned the respect of the Franco-Ontarians—as well as of all those who believe in the bilingual and bicultural nature of our country. I would like to quote something that has been said under the signature of the hon. Prime Minister in French and I will give you the translation after a while.

L'interêt de la population de l'Ontario pour un bon enseignement du français n'a jamais été si grand.

I will translate the foregoing.

The interest of the population of Ontario for good teaching in French has never been so great.

The hon. Prime Minister made this statement at the Chateau Frontenac in Quebec City, in a speech which has been largely circulated in French in my constituency and I am sure in the province at large. Here is another quotation from that pamphlet:

La population de l'Ontario est fière de ses institutions bilingues, telles que l'Université d'Ottawa et l'Université Laurentienne de Sudbury. Elle est fière de notre école normale bilingue — à l'Université d'Ottawa—et de nos 400 commissions scolaires bilingues. Ces institutions sont les moyens par lesquels nous établirions des contacts plus étroits et des moyens de communication qui nous permettraient de vraiment nous connaître et nous comprendre.

Now I will give you the translation of these words, these wonderful words of the hon. Prime Minister.

The population of Ontario is proud of its bilingual institutions such as Ottawa University and Laurentian University in Sudbury. It is proud of its bilingual normal school—at Ottawa University—and of its 400 bilingual school commissions. The institutions are the means by which we shall establish closer contacts, and means of communications which will permit us to really know and understand one another better.

For such a statement, Mr. Chairman, the hon. Prime Minister deserves the highest praise. May I submit that the time has come for us to provide help to this bilingual institution of which we are so proud? Such help would carry even greater conviction than words.

I know, Mr. Chairman, that we are already helping this university. In fact, since 1949, this Legislature has given grants to the University of Ottawa for its work in the sciences and medicine which, to quote the hon. Prime Minister in his statement on Ontario university affairs on March 21 last year.

—although within a denominational university, were rated as nondenominational facets of this institution. The bilingual nature of this institution made it desirable that these nondenominational activities should be the subject of grants.

Frankly, Mr. Chairman, I find it difficult to understand in what respect nursing, psychology, civil and common law, library science, arts, commerce and philosophy are in any way more denominational than science and medicine. Theology, I suppose, could be called denominational—or is it? Whatever may be the case, the training of priests and ministers surely does not come under the jurisdiction of the state. But the training of nurses, psychologists, lawyers and librarians, does come under the responsibility of the state. At least this is what we do for all other universities.

Of course, science and medicine are the most costly faculties in any university. But the grants we give to the University of Ottawa do not even cover operating costs of these two faculties. This means that in order to continue to produce medical doctors, scientists and engineers for the benefit of this province, the university must tap the other faculties and institutes of part of their actual revenues and cramp their overdue developments. Is this fair when we proclaim our need for a greater number of professors of French, for a greater number of librarians, nurses and psychologists? As one of my friends told me one day, the actual grants from the government of Ontario to the University of Ottawa appear like “golden chains” which gradually could bring the institution to the verge of bankruptcy.

This is unquestionably an embarrassing situation. At a time when we are spending millions after millions of dollars for the construction of new universities which are absolutely needed if we want this province to prosper, we are hampering an existing university, which has a century-old tradition of service to this province, in the accomplishment of its maximum for the benefit of all.

I know, Mr. Chairman, that the crux of the problem lies in the character of the institution. But I would like to suggest that we have solved a similar problem in a way which no one deems at variance with our convictions on the separation of church and state. I am thinking of The Hospital Tax Act. In accord with the Ontario Human Rights Code, hospital problems are solved according to hospital norms established by the civil authorities, regardless of race, creed, colour, nationality, ancestry or place of origin. No one has ever thought of excluding any hospital from the benefits derived from this Act because it was operated and controlled by a board of nuns, Catholic or otherwise. Even less has anyone dared suggest that the only patients qualifying for the benefits of this Act should be those with a heart condition or kidney trouble.

May I submit that, in the field of education, and especially of higher education, the ruling principles should be norms of excellence determined by The Department of Education. Those who qualify according to these norms should be entitled to grants. In point of fact, any question concerning the personal religious convictions of those who are accomplishing a job for the benefit of the province should be ruled out as not pertinent and against the code of human rights. Is it not true, Mr. Chairman, that all are forbidden by the law of this province to ask such questions of anybody in the practice of his profession? Why should we, the law-makers, be the only ones to do so? Is it because the legislator is above the law? We can call it what we may, but as long as we refuse grants for the only reason that the institution is denominational, we are discriminating.

Should we not rather follow the example of other countries, of other provinces, of the federal government, whose grants are available to all university students, regardless of creed, race or nationality? Or do we consider England, Ottawa, Quebec and New Brunswick as betraying the principles of the separation of church and state? Could we not be blamed for our actual policy on the ground that, after a long battle, having finally won the victory over an "established church", we have fallen into the other extreme of an "established no-church"?

May I be permitted at this point, Mr. Chairman, to quote again the hon. Prime Minister who said, a month ago, or just a few weeks ago, on the occasion of the visit of Premier Jean Lesage of Quebec:

As far as our constitution is concerned, I said last week, Mr. Premier, while we were debating some of these matters, that I did not approach the fact of changing our constitution with any fear or with any trepidation. If it needs to be changed, we will change it. If it is not functioning we must examine it and we must see where it needs to be changed. I do not think we should be fearful of it.

Those are the words of our hon. Prime Minister. Words of a great man. Words far more reaching than my humble plea for a great institution in my constituency, which is not receiving the government support it is entitled to for what it does for the province.

This, Mr. Chairman, is my point of view on a thorny question. I know that I have not solved the problem. I do hope, though, that my contribution shall not be found lacking in sincerity and dedication to the welfare of the province.

Vote 512 agreed to.

On vote 513:

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): I just wanted to make one comment on the remarks of the hon. member for Ottawa East, a copy of which he has given me.

Perhaps I should point out once again that traditionally in this province we have not, over the whole history of the universities in the province, supported with provincial funds denominational universities. The University of Ottawa is not the only university in the province in this position. Waterloo Lutheran in Waterloo is operated by the Lutheran Church and we do not make grants to that university either. This has been a government policy for many years, extending right back into the beginning of universities. McMaster, for instance, was a Baptist institution and in order to qualify for government grants, it created a nondenominational university and then that portion of it, of course, which teaches theology remained on the campus but it did bring itself within the policy that we have in the province. The same is true with Assumption University in Windsor, which became the University of Windsor. The same is true of Queen's University at the beginning. Many of our educational institutions and our universities had their beginnings in the churches of our province.

This really is the reason why part of the complex at the University of Ottawa is not given grants, because it is a denominational college. This is not directed at the denomination which happens to operate this particular university. This is the policy, as I say, which applies to the Lutherans in Waterloo, which did apply to the Baptists at McMaster, and it applied to the Presbyterians at Queen's in those days of long ago; the Jesuits in Sudbury; the Basilian Fathers at Assumption University. We are examining the whole situation. I can tell the hon. member that I have had many discussions and conversations with Monseigneur Legaré, the president of Ottawa University, and no doubt the hon. member has had conversations with him as well. He will tell you that he and I have spent considerable time discussing this problem and I have no doubt that I will spend time with him in the future.

But that is the policy of the government and that has been the policy of successive governments for many, many years.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Chairman: Is the member on 513?

Mr. Bryden: Yes, 513.

Mr. Chairman: I recognize the member for Halton.

Mr. G. A. Kerr (Halton): Mr. Chairman, under this vote I think it is appropriate to ask the hon. Minister a question about the proposed department of youth announced some months ago. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the main purpose of this new branch is to assist students, particularly in technical and vocational schools where we are to have counsellors to encourage them to stay in school and to assist them in taking courses compatible with their desires and ability. Possibly the hon. Minister could inform us of some of the details of this programme, approximate number of counsellors who would be assisting, and other particulars of the branch.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I gave a fairly full explanation in the introduction of my estimates on the youth branch, and actually I think the area that the hon. member is referring to is really not the area that we are attempting to cover with the youth branch. The youth branch started out as sort of a nebulous idea, quite frankly; it came from the realization or at least the thought that there was a large segment of our younger population, many of whom had left school at an early age, who had inadequate education and insufficient motivation to accomplish anything. One paper has estimated the number to be close to half a million. Whether this is accurate or not time alone will tell. But it is the young people who have had insufficient schooling that we are attempting to reach. Dr. Koerber, who is on loan to The Department of Education from the Scarborough board, has been trying to delineate those areas that we might successfully tackle. He has been conducting a survey throughout the entire province determining the number of agencies that are interested in this problem, whether they be private, voluntary or even from municipal or governmental agencies. The new branch is still in the realm of development, quite frankly, and is deciding upon those areas where we might be effective in tackling this problem.

Among these are the problems that we will be facing with automation, with increased leisure time, and with the development of urbanization. It is difficult for me to tell you specifically what the youth branch will accomplish within the next few months. I think it is an acknowledgment primarily of a momentous problem that we face.

There will be some who will say this is not the responsibility of The Department of Education and yet I feel quite frankly that it is and that it is one that we will consider very seriously. I hope that the select committee, when it is appointed by this House will avail itself of some of the studies conducted by Dr. Koerber in exploring this whole problem. It is one of great importance as I see it, in society today and while I do not pretend for one moment that this branch is going to solve all these problems, at least we hope it will delineate some of them for us so that we may take some effective action.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, the youth division which is covered by this vote, was the product of an election campaign, I think it would be fair to say. The announcement came either during, or shortly before the election was called.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, it was no such thing. The speech was prepared and the decision was made some time in July. The announcement was made on Youth Day at the CNE and it was related in no way whatsoever to election campaigns or politics. Quite frankly I fail to see, at this point, any political significance involved.

Mr. Bryden: Well, we can agree on this much: if it was made on Youth Day at CNE—which is a fact, I remember that—then it was made during the course of an election campaign.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I can tell you the speech was prepared well in advance of the election campaign.

Mr. Bryden: Well, I think a lot of the series of announcements the government made prior to and during the election campaign had been prepared prior to the actual calling of the election. We over here did not know when the election was going to come, but you over there did know. No doubt you had your ammunition prepared. It was a useful device in the election campaign. The hon. Minister, with a naivety which does not become him, said that he does not see that it had any connection with the election at all. Well, it certainly got him a big headline. In fact, I could even see the fellows in grey flannel suits in the smoke-filled rooms mapping out a programme as to how to get headlines to maintain momentum during the election campaign. I have no doubt that, at some stage or other—whether it was during the campaign or before it is immaterial—one of them said, "Let us set up a youth branch." That made a good headline for one day anyway; it made a very good headline.

It is actually a good idea, but now we are coming down to the practical realities of the thing and the money that is being voted—$50,000—is being voted mainly to provide the branch, or division as it is now called, with the funds to undertake research to find out what it is going to do. In that enterprise it is also to receive the assistance, I understand, of a select committee of the Legislature. Whether that assistance will be useful or not remains to be seen. But the select committee of the Legislature is also being established—so we were told in the Speech from the Throne and confirmed in the hon. Minister's speech of a day or two ago.

I am not now interested in making a complaint about the manner in which it came into being—perhaps it was a demonstration of the marvels of democracy at work—I do not know. I am happy to see that at least a tentative beginning is being made in this field. I will concede the hon. Minister's point that it is a very difficult field, difficult I suppose for the department to decide just how much of the problem it should attempt to tackle at any one time. It is quite obvious that if the division is to do a job, it is going to have to extend well beyond the area that would narrowly be regarded as the field of education. In fact, one of the major problems from my observation and from what little I have read in the field, relates to the placement of young people in employment.

I can see even in my own constituency—I will not go so far as to say alarming trends, but rather discouraging trends. Young people who have quit school are unable to get anything that could be described as continuous employment and are showing a disposition to congregate in street gangs. I do not think that in my section of the city at any rate, gangs have reached the highly developed proportions that they have in some other cities and perhaps in some other parts of this city, where they have developed themselves into little factions almost at war with society. But the problem is manifesting itself of the young person who has not found an adjustment to our society as it exists and will continue to exist; of his developing basically anti-social attitudes that will make his adaptation to society more and more difficult as time progresses. There has been a great deal of concern about school dropouts, legitimate concern, and I think the situation in many ways is improving as far as school dropouts are concerned. Many young people have been observing what is going on in the world around them and realize that they are not going to be able to establish themselves in the new world as it is developing with inadequate education. More and more of them are staying at school. This is desirable and the department and local boards of education and school boards have been doing a good deal of good work in devising courses of study that will be attractive to as many of the young people as possible and will meet their various needs and purposes. All these things are happening and they are good.

We still have the problem of the school dropouts, however, and there are some individuals to whom it is impossible at this stage at any rate to make an appeal on the basis that he should stay in school, it is good for him. From his point of view he has no interest in school; there is nothing there for him that he can see and so he leaves school. This is the person who is particularly a matter of concern. Such young people should not be written off just because we have not found out ways of appealing to them. The problem is to know what to do about them.

One small area where I think, Mr. Chairman, we could improve the existing facilities, relates to formal education of people who are somewhat past school age. I think we will always have a situation where some young people at a particular stage in their development, will simply be unable to adjust to the schooling system that we provide for them, no matter how flexible we make it. They will drop out. They will get such employment as they can for a few years and they will learn in the school of experience that it would be preferable if they could improve their basic qualifications. They will want to go back to school. But of course it is very difficult for a person of 20 to 25 years of age to go back to school with children of 14, 15 or 16 years of age. I know that such pupils are eligible for admission to our secondary schools and I believe that a few of them do actually go back to school, to the regular schools. In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, it takes a lot of courage to do so. I think we should be developing more facilities than we have to this stage, for giving regular school training at the secondary level to young adults, the people who missed their opportunity when they were in the appropriate age group for reasons that do not have to be considered when they have reached the age of 20 or so and who now wish to continue and go back to school on a full-time basis. I would like to see a development of that sort of facility and programme and no doubt this is one of the matters that the youth service division may be prepared to consider.

There is also the other problem of employment opportunities for young people, not only those who have dropped out of school, but those who have completed their school work. The problem is not particularly acute at this time because we have, at the moment, quite a high level of employment in the province or to state the obverse, quite a low level of unemployment. But when there is fairly significant unemployment I think it is a fact that young people suffer more than others. The first thing an employer usually asks for, if he has a choice of employees, is: "What experience have you had?" I do not know how he expects a person to acquire experience if he himself will only take on experienced people. Even the reasonably well trained youth in a situation of relatively high unemployment has difficulty finding employment. The one with no training at all, or with inadequate training, is pretty well out in the cold. Even, indeed, in this period of relatively high employment there are a lot of youngsters of 16, 17 and 18 who cannot get anything but casual work of the lowest possible type.

This creates a bitterness in them, a sense of alienation from society which is going to make the problem of adapting them to society more acute. I hate to see some of them standing in the middle of the day on street corners with nothing to do. I know some myself who have combed employment opportunities and cannot get jobs. I do not want to be too critical, but I feel that the National Employment Service has, to an important degree, been a failure in this country. I do not think it has done the job it ought to do in this field or in many other fields. It has only limited value in finding jobs for people in special categories, and young people, particularly those with inadequate training, are in a special category.

The National Employment Service is a great hand at finding jobs for people at very low wages—in fact, until the minimum wage laws came into effect it regularly used to refer people, especially those who were drawing unemployment insurance benefits, to jobs at 75 cents and 85 cents an hour. It seems to be able to find lots of those jobs around. It does not seem to be able to do much to place people with more difficult problems. In fact, in my experience, certain agencies of this government have done a better job in placing certain categories of people with special problems than the National Employment Service has.

I do not suppose it is the function of The Department of Education to set up an employment service. I have no doubt that it intends to work, where appropriate, with existing agencies in the field including the National Employment Service, but there does appear to be a tremendous area here for both counselling and for helping in finding employment. I have no doubt that the expert whom the hon. Minister has already brought into his department on a temporary basis has this under consideration. I would appreciate it, if the hon. Minister is in a position to do so, if he could give us an indication of anything that he may have in mind along that line at the present time, along the line of giving counselling services to some of these young people who have dropped out of school and assisting them in finding employment.

Hon. Mr. Davis: The hon. member has very capably demonstrated the need for some type of organization or study of this nature. He has covered many fields and there are still many others that I think have to be pursued. As far as the question of guidance or counselling for employment is concerned, this is certainly one area that is being explored. I think, though, at the moment our emphasis has been primarily on trying to determine the areas of the greatest immediate need.

This may turn out to be one of them, but I think until our survey is concluded, I will not be in a position to tell the hon. member those fields that we are going to emphasize first. This could be one of them, quite conceivably, but until we have completed an overall assessment of the many problems that are facing these young people, I am not in a position to tell the House specifically which areas we will tackle first.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, since this department is just in its embryo and since, further, sir, we are having a select committee on youth, and since the function of it at the present time is mostly surveys and investigations, I do not think that we are going to gain very much by debating this at any length tonight. I think we shall have to wait, as the hon. Minister pointed out, to find out just how they will proceed in making the surveys and investigations and see what the need is.

On vote 514:

Mr. Troy: On vote 514, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the hon. Minister if, in vote number two, it is in regard to the additional vocational units for school boards.

I would like to ask the hon. Minister what can be done for those areas where the need is greatest for some opportunity to gain vocational skills. There are in this province, small communities. I will refer to one in my own riding and there may be similar situations in other ridings in the province.

I will take the town of Mattawa with a population of between 3,000 and 4,000 people. The secondary education there is confined primarily to the academic side. There is no opportunity to get the advantages that larger areas have. In order to get a composite school you must have a school population of 600 or 700 and up. In these small towns young people have not got the opportunities for recreation or mental development as they have in larger cities. There also are not too many opportunities for employment in the areas. They drop out of school because they are not interested in the academic side at all. They quit school maybe after Grade 9 or at the most Grade 10, and then they are just a regular drug on the market.

What can be done for communities of that nature? Why is it that millions and millions are being spent by this government in co-operation with the federal government to give young people an opportunity of vocational training, and all of those in smaller areas have no opportunity at all of getting it except if they go to their parents who will provide them with transportation, say, to the city of North Bay—is it the nearest area? What can be done with those?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, we have been discussing this matter with the federal government. As you know, initially the thinking was that we should establish these schools with a student population in the neighbourhood of, say, 1,000 students. We have been exploring, and I think with some success, although I am not in a position to say definitely yet, the possibility of providing at least some limited vocational shops and facilities for the student population of a unit of roughly 400 to 600, which I think will cover to a degree at least those communities to which my hon. friend is referring. This is being done in co-operation with The Department of Labour and, as I say, it has been discussed by the federal authorities and we are encouraged to date by their reaction.

I have also discussed with the federal Minister of Labour some additional assistance by way of an operating grant to the province or to the boards of the province for the vocational-technical programme. As the hon. members are aware, we have received, I have not the exact figure in front of me, $800,000 to $900,000 a year for the secondary school programme, which really does not go too far. We have suggested to the Minister of Labour that the federal government consider paying 50 per cent of the difference between the academic and the vocational costs, which, if the difference is, say, $200, might be $100 per student as the federal portion of the increase of the operating cost during the secondary school programme. To date we have had no indication from Ottawa, other than that they have suggested that it is under advisement, but we have gone this far with the federal authorities. I shall inform the hon. member and the House just as soon as we receive some further consideration or undertaking from Ottawa with respect to the smaller units of, say, 400 to 600 students. We are very well aware of the problem the hon. member raises and we are attempting to solve it.

Mr. Troy: If you cannot reach that agreement then I think there may be possibly some agreement where these youngsters can be transported to the nearest area where there are composite schools, because otherwise—

Hon. Mr. Davis: In many cases these are the areas that should have them.

Mr. Troy: Yes. Thank you.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the acting House leader how long he plans to carry on tonight? The reason I ask is that there are a number of matters I would like to raise under this vote.

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): Certainly not beyond 11 o'clock.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, this vote, I believe, covers the question of the re-training of workers—unemployed workers and others who may feel they need re-training. The hon. Minister of Economics and Development (Mr. Randall), on more than one occasion, sir, has emphasized the importance of increasing the mobility of our labour force. Here is one of the key areas where one creates mobility. I am going to suggest to the hon. Minister, and to the federal government as well, since I think it puts up most of the money, that the programme is not succeeding insofar as it has that objective in mind.

To begin with, the allowances that are being paid to people undergoing re-training are simply inadequate. We will never have an adequate re-training programme as long as allowances continue in this form. I would like to read an item that appeared in the Toronto Daily Star in January of this year, as follows:

Lloyd B. Jones is one of the more than a thousand men and women who have quit—a thousand men and women, you will notice:—who have quit Toronto's adult re-training programme because they cannot afford the luxury of improving their education. Jones, 41, father of four children, left the Jones Avenue re-training centre because he found he could not live on the $36 a week he got under the federal-provincial-municipal scheme.

A. W. Fair, the programme's co-ordinator yesterday shocked Toronto's welfare committee when he listed the number of people who dropped out of the scheme designed to teach skills to the unemployed, or give new skills to those replaced by automation.

After four months of dire financial hardship, Mr. Jones finally withdrew from his diesel mechanics course six months before graduation. Although he and his wife Cora figure it cost $30 a week for food alone for the family, they were often forced to do it on $9.

"I am not going back. I am not going to put my family through that again," the tall army veteran maintained. "It would have been all right if I could have gone through. I worked hard and got good marks."

The old grey school on Jones Avenue was opened in June, 1962, for the re-training programme. Mr. Jones, of Heale Avenue, Scarborough, was one of the more than 1,000 men and women who have withdrawn from the centre because they could not live on their allowances, A. W. Fair, co-ordinator of the programme, said.

And so on. There are further details about other people who found that they could not live on the allowances and so gave up the re-training.

I am not even getting into the question of the adequacy of the courses, whether they are training people for types of employment in which they will be able to find employment in the future. That is another question and an important question. I am just raising now the question of the adequacy of allowances.

The select committee on manpower training dealt with this subject at some length and it quite validly recommended that unemployed workers should not be compelled to undergo training or re-training. It said that instead we should use the carrot approach rather than the stick.

Greater financial assistance relative to the payment due to an unemployed worker under the unemployment insurance system should be made available to unemployed workers who are willing to undergo training. I think this is the proper approach. We should try to encourage people to undergo re-training by giving them financial incentives. They are entitled, if they do nothing but simply try to find a job with their present skills, inadequate as they may be, to unemployment insurance for a period and supplementary benefits for a further period in most cases. If even those benefits are exhausted, they will get welfare. But what we are interested in is in giving them an incentive to take re-training of a type that is suitable for their particular aptitudes. I would suggest the way you do it is by paying them good money.

This may be a matter mainly for the federal government to consider. But the Minister is the man who deals with the federal government. I am going to suggest that we should be thinking in terms of payments that closely approximate full wages. I think we should consider the re-training of our work force as part of the overall employment situation. Especially as we move further and further into a period when greater and greater flexibility of our labour force is going to be required, we have to.

The person who is displaced by technological advances should not be regarded as an unfortunate casualty of our economic system, to whom we give certain minimum assistance plus opportunities for re-training if they care to avail themselves of it. We should regard him as part of our total work force, as a person whom we need for employment in some other area. We should be prepared to pay him to take the training that is necessary to fit him into employment elsewhere.

This is the sort of approach that is taken in Sweden. There are a great many other things they do in Sweden that we do not do in this country, but they are not relevant to the present vote so I will not refer to them. But this is the sort of thing they do there and they have a much higher degree of mobility of labour than we have here, although they are not satisfied with it. They have a substantially lower rate of unemployment than we have here, even under the best of circumstances. In fact, their rate of unemployment usually is about half of what ours is now and the hon. Minister of Economics and Development (Mr. Randall) has been congratulating himself on the fact that it is at such a low level at the present time.

Mr. Chairman, you just cannot ask people such as this Mr. Jones, 41 years of age with four children, who may very well have been making $1.75 or $2 or $2.25 an hour, to come down to an allowance of $6 or $8 a day. I think it is per training day at that. It is not even per day in the week. Apparently he is only supposed to eat on the training days. You just cannot expect that he is going to do it. He cannot manage it. He has to go out and find some other job that will pay him at least more than the inadequate allowances that are now being considered.

I listened with great interest, Mr. Chairman, to the exhortations from the hon. Minister of Economics and Development concerning the need for increasing mobility of labour. But then, when I look at an integral part of this programme which comes under the jurisdiction of The Department of Education, I can only assume that the hon. Ministers are not in communication with each other, or that the importance of the problem has not been fully understood.

I would say that we should be thinking in terms of re-training not merely for people who are already unemployed. We should be trying to anticipate people being thrown out of work and start the re-training process before they are actually thrown out of work.

Hon. Mr. Davis: We are doing that under programme four. We have two or three pilot projects under way now. One of the chief ones is in Leaside under programme four. I believe three industries are participating and the results, to date, have been very encouraging. It takes the participation, as the hon. members know, of industry. And I think after a limited period of time we will be satisfied enough with the results to extend the programme quite substantially.

The hon. member might also be interested to know the question of rates being paid to the unemployed is also under discussion with the federal government. The article the hon. member refers to was, I think, actually raised by his hon. leader (Mr. MacDonald) yesterday or the day before—I have lost track—at which time I indicated, I think, to him that the estimates of NES and the ones we have as well would indicate that close to 80 per cent of the 1,000 referred to in that article, found employment.

Mr. Bryden: Well, I do not think that is necessarily the answer to the question, Mr. Chairman. They found employment—

Hon. Mr. Davis: This is one reason they left.

Mr. Bryden: But did they find suitable employment?

Hon. Mr. Davis: We do not know whether it was suitable and they do not either.

Mr. Bryden: Well, I would assume they would not quit the course to go on relief.

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, I say, they are working.

Mr. Bryden: Obviously they quit in most cases in order to take other employment, but the point is that this may have been the wrong course of action both for them and for the community. It was desirable that they should improve their qualifications, but they could not because they could not live on the allowance they were getting. Therefore, they had to take whatever was available to them in the form of employment that probably carried low wages and had a low skill content, so we did little if anything to improve the quality of our labour force and certainly did not improve the position of these people.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, maybe they might be better off if they went on full relief, but I will bring you something right from the horse's mouth. It comes from Brigadier Michael Dunn. He is not given his rank here but that is what he was. He is the principal of the adult re-training centre on Jones Avenue. Jones is mentioned in this but it happens to be the name of a street and not the man.

The principal states in an article in the Globe and Mail of Friday, May 1—

Hon. Mr. Davis: That is tomorrow.

Mr. Troy: Yes, and this is a very good day; Friday, May 1 is that historic day for labour.

Mr. MacDonald: This shows you how fast he is, no wonder he gets an award of merit; he is living in the future.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Dunn says in this article in the Globe and Mail, I will repeat, of the issue of Friday, May 1:

Unemployed men and women at classes in the Adult Re-training Centre on Jones Avenue have fainted from hunger. Mr. Dunn said many students do not have enough money to eat properly.

And I suppose he also means to get enough to eat. And then he refers to how they eat, but the important thing is what they get.

With married students, he said, most of the government allowance is going to keep dependants. The principal said some students suffer from malnutrition.

"This has been one of our biggest causes for dropouts in the retraining programme," he told the City Welfare and Legislation Committee.

Higher allowances and hot lunches each day for the students are advocated in a Toronto brief to the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities endorsed by the committee. With the endorsement of the federation the brief would be sent to the federal government for consideration.

I will just interject here that no doubt the federal government will be in touch with the provincial government after they get this brief, to discuss this matter.

Hon. Mr. Davis: We may be in touch with them before they get the brief.

Mr. Troy: Well, I hope so, because we cannot have them fainting with hunger every day down on Jones Avenue.

Mr. Bryden: That is right across the road from my constituency.

Mr. Troy: Well, the hon. member had better take them over to his riding then and give them a hand-out.

Married men from other communities, attending the school, receive an $8 daily living allowance. Married men in the city receive $6 daily. The rate for out-of-town single men is $5 and for city bachelors $3 daily.

The brief, a copy of which will go to the Ontario Association of Mayors and Reeves, also proposes financial assistance to families of the unemployed taking re-training courses, to the extent of funds for emergency medical and dental services and prescription drugs. There is currently no provision for medical or dental services.

While not suggesting a definite amount for increased allowances to trainees, the city brief argues for payment to heads of families who are taking courses, on the basis of the number of dependants.

Which is again a factor that, I think, should be considered because I know that some of these chaps taking the re-training courses in my area have a lot of children.

The article finishes:

The identical amount is now paid to a man whether he has one or five children.

The same amount! So I suppose it is a case of each day: now, Johnny, you get it today and then Mary tomorrow, and finally poor little Allan gets it on the fifth day.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): What is the date of that paper?

Mr. Troy: The date of the paper is Friday, May 1, 1964.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: That is a fine thing to read in the Hansard of April 30.

Mr. Troy: This is Eastern daylight time; you see we are an hour ahead of standard time.

Mr. A. H. Cowling (High Park): Just pass it around and we will all read it.

Mr. Troy: Well, that is the situation. It is a good job we are taking this somewhat humorously at this hour of the night, but nevertheless it is a very serious problem.

Hon. Mr. Davis: We recognize this.

Mr. Troy: I know that levity is a part of any debate—but it is a serious problem. In addition to a training problem, it is also a social problem. I hope that it will get not only serious consideration, but action.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister has a very disarming way of saying that he is taking everything we mention under consideration. I have no doubt he is taking it under consideration. Obviously, he is going to have quite a few things to consider in the next little while. But I have heard the expression—I am not now suggesting that this applies at all to the hon. Minister—but I have heard the expression many, many times, and the expression "taking under advisement" or "taking under consideration" often means putting to the bottom of the file basket.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I am not sure of the exact phraseology I use, but I think that I said the question of payments to trainees was being discussed, and had been discussed with Ottawa. It was not a case of this department taking it under consideration. We have already discussed the problem with them.

Mr. Bryden: Well, I am going to suggest to the hon. Minister then that this is an urgent problem. My hon. leader made a suggestion across the floor a moment ago that since Ottawa has now taken over 90 per cent of the cost of these allowances up to the approved level, the department might consider using the money they might otherwise save, to make an immediate increase in allowances. Then I think it could use that as a bargaining point with Ottawa to ante up some more.

I would suggest that we would have to consider a major revision in the nature of these allowances. Six dollars for a family man living in the city and $8 for a family man from outside the city just does not meet the problem at all and we have had—my friend, the hon. member for Nipissing has read still another story that appears in a Toronto paper. These stories have been coming out from the administrators on the spot for a long time, for at least a year, and probably longer. I picked one of many. It happened to be one that my hon. leader had picked, too. I apologize for the repetition but I could have picked others that said the same thing in different words at different times.

The people on the spot are constantly saying that these allowances are not good enough and are seriously interfering with the programme. We hear from the higher levels that they are discussing the matter but surely at this stage it is time they did something about it and not in terms of adding another dollar or two. As I suggested earlier, they should be thinking in terms of approximating, if not actually paying, full wages to people undergoing re-training which is going to fit them for new forms of employment.

Mr. G. Bukator (Niagara Falls): Mr. Chairman, I would like to take up the next seven minutes. We are going to quit at 11 o'clock, I understand.

I have an article here out of the Niagara Falls Evening Review. When reading an article in last Friday's paper I came across the item, "Mayor Plans a Drive to Get More into Job Re-training." It quotes someone as saying:

This, sir, is a farce. Strong words, no doubt, but they are true. I know because we went through it. Never again. The courses themselves are grand and so is the big line-up by the unemployment insurance office.

But talk is all it is. After ten months in the upholstery course, we were elated when the big day came, the day my husband was handed a certificate. But alas, our joy was short-lived. He was offered a job for $1.25 an hour.

He spent ten months—the man who got his certificate—lived for ten months on $36 a week and they finally wound up, as the lady said in this particular article, with the man making more money than that when he quit the job he had before. He felt that by learning a trade and becoming an upholsterer, he would make $3 an hour—this is what he thought he would get—but can you imagine a man and his family living on $36 a week for ten months? Mind you—

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: I cannot believe that, not in this province.

Mr. Bukator: No, they did not live on it. I imagine they did exist.

Anyhow, he was offered a job at $1.25 in the city of Toronto. Now, mind you, he would leave the city of Niagara Falls! It is nice to see the hon. Minister of Mines back in the field again—

Mr. MacDonald: He is out of humour these days.

An hon. member: Maybe he got stuck in the market.

Mr. Nixon: He needs a longer holiday.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Bukator: Mr. Chairman, it is quite all right. I am enjoying this, I usually do. And you might as well hear the rest of it because I am going to stay here. Maybe I can get through in three minutes if you let me continue.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: I would like to see this House sit until 5 o'clock in the morning.

Mr. Bukator: Now, just to get on—

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Yes, please!

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Bukator: Just to get on that subject for a moment, Mr. Chairman, he has been in the House this day possibly about an hour and a half. He must have a couch in the back room.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: If you knew where I had been today, you would know I was looking after mining in this province.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. MacDonald: Does the hon. Minister of Mines think he is helping us at this point?

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: No! I am sorry.

Mr. MacDonald: That is the truest answer of the day.

Mr. Bukator: Mr. Chairman, I would like to continue this article.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Bukator: Thank you very much.

The vice-chairman of Hydro has made another contribution this year—

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Bukator: Mr. Chairman, after all this heckling, I am supposed to be in order. I think it is the silliest—

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Bukator: Four minutes to go and I have not even started yet. That was just the preamble. The lady said:

Mad? Yes, I am mad. After all, this is not a project. This is people's lives that we are dealing with.

And I think that is true too. The people in good faith took these jobs believing they would learn a trade and naturally better themselves. They wind up with a trade, and as I said, they are driving taxis now, peddling milk and working in factories as common labourers after that course that the government spent so much money on.

I can only agree with the hon. Minister that this should not only be looked into but certainly these conditions should be remedied. If people are going to take a course in any particular trade where they find a shortage of that particular type of tradesman, then at least the government should find a job for them, even if they have nothing else to do but dig mines for diamonds—for the hon. Minister of Mines claims that in some place in Ontario there are diamonds and all we have to do is find them.

Hon. Mr. Wardrobe: That is correct.

Mr. Bukator: Apparently I have rubbed the hon. Minister the wrong way. It was not his hair that I was rubbing though. If I have aggravated the gentleman, that is what I intended to do, naturally.

Now, let us go on with the article:

All these months, nothing. It seems to me that the government is spending too much money to train these men. Why not go one step further and demand a decent wage before taking this course? My husband was making twice as much as he has been offered. If this is what the government is giving, I will go without, thank you.

This is only one person speaking and there are hundreds of similar cases. I know that the government means well. I know it may be on the right track but up to this point it has not proved too much. There is a lot of room for improvement and you can rest assured that I will wait for the hon. Minister's decision on the conference that he is having with Ottawa. It seems that Ottawa has treated this government pretty well. I have sat here for several days now and the government says that it has met with the people in Ottawa and they are going to give more. Now, if this is the case—

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I never said that Ottawa was going to give anything. I never said it was. I would point out to the hon. member that while we certainly have some responsibility for the running of this programme, I think that as far as the securing of employment is concerned, the NES would have responsibility in this field.

Mr. Bukator: Apparently in this particular case it did not work quite that way.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I am just referring to The Department of Education. Our responsibility is re-training and this we try to do. I am suggesting the question of finding employment surely is within the area of NES, which comes under the federal Department of Labour.

Mr. Bukator: I like this buck-passing bit. I thought this was a joint effort between the province and Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. Davis: The re-training of the unemployed is a joint programme. We are providing the course material. We are doing our best to administer the programme. But the responsibility for finding employment afterwards, I suggest, rests with the NES, which is under the auspices of The Department of Labour in Ottawa.

Mr. Bukator: Let us look at it from the other side of the ledger then. If this government is going to train people for something that they cannot get the benefit of at all, then what in heaven's name are you accomplishing? That is a fair question. What are you accomplishing by this particular effort?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, the only thing I can tell the hon. member is that we have re-trained a very substantial number of people. Our figures indicate that something over 80 per cent of them have found gainful employment after completing these courses.

Mr. Bukator: Mr. Chairman, I suppose that there are others who would like to speak on this subject. I would move the adjournment of the debate.

Vote 514 agreed to.

On vote 515:

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Chairman, before we deal with vote 515—

Mr. Bukator: Mr. Chairman, I thought you were going to call it off when I sat down—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Carry on! The floor is yours.

Mr. Chairman, I would be happy to reopen vote 514 if the hon. member has something else to say.

Mr. R. Gisborn (Wentworth East): Mr. Chairman, I would say to the hon. Prime Minister that the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs may have misled my friend, the hon. member for Niagara Falls when he said we would not sit beyond 11 o'clock.

Interjections by hon. members.

An hon. member: You mean 11 o'clock tomorrow morning?

Mr. Chairman: Vote 514 has been carried.

Mr. Bukator: They talk about hon. members in this House, they talk about procedure, and the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs said we would not go beyond 11 o'clock. This is what I understood so—

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Now let us be reasonable. Usually if we say 11 o'clock, it could be ten minutes after 11 or perhaps ten minutes to 11.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Before we proceed with vote 515, I accept your ruling that vote 514 is carried.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves that the committee of supply rise and report progress and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Chairman: We will be on vote 515 when we return.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report it has come to certain resolutions and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow morning we will proceed with these estimates and when they are complete there are various items on the order paper we can deal with.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 11.05 o'clock, p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

FRIDAY, MAY 1, 1964

The House met at 10.30 o'clock, a.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: We are always pleased to have visitors to the Legislature and today we welcome as guests, in the west gallery, students from Deer Park Public School, Toronto.

Presenting petitions.

Presenting reports by committees.

Motions.

Introduction of bills.

Mr. N. Whitney (Prince Edward-Lennox): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day I would like to call to the attention of the hon. members of the Legislature that the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Downer) is today celebrating his 60th birthday. I thought that the hon. members would be pleased to know that, and would be pleased to recall that he was first elected in 1937.

I believe that, second only to the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Oliver), he has served the longest continuous term of any present hon. member now in the Legislature. He has brought distinction to his riding, and to himself, through his service as Speaker of the House and through service as a padre overseas. I know that all the hon. members will be pleased to join me in wishing him happy returns of the day.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, since this is a birthday party, I think I should inform the House that one of the freshmen members of the House, my colleague, the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Freeman), is also celebrating his birthday. His qualities so speak for themselves that I shall not attempt to elaborate on them.

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Leader of the Opposition): Perhaps I might be allowed, Mr. Speaker, to congratulate both of the hon. members who are celebrating their birthdays today, with particular reference, of course, to my younger colleague from Dufferin-Simcoe. I had not any idea until today just how much younger he was than I am. We have ridings alongside one another and the line between us is something like the 49th parallel between here and the States. We just do not know where it is exactly and we do not care very much.

I have always been very happy to be associated with my hon. friend from Dufferin-Simcoe and hope that he will remain in the House for many years. Of course, it carries with it the implicit hope that his older colleague is here as well to see that he conducts himself with dignity and in a manner that would do credit to both the ridings of Dufferin-Simcoe and of Grey South.

Mr. A. W. Downer (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I could not let this moment pass without a word. There are times, you know, when one finds it very difficult to express our feelings, and this is one time for me. But I do want to express my personal thanks to the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox, the hon. leader of the Opposition and the hon. leader of the NDP for their kind words and good wishes today.

You know, life is a never-ending struggle. A never-ending struggle to keep the money coming in and your hair and teeth from falling out. I want to say that I am losing on all counts.

I would like also to offer my good wishes to the hon. member for Fort William, to wish him happiness and many years in the public service of the province of Ontario. To me, politics is not a creed, not a set of fixed doctrines; but an attitude of mind and heart, a faith in man's ability through the experience of his reason, and the judgment of his mind, to increase for himself and his fellow men the amount of justice and freedom and brotherhood which all human life deserves. That has been my work during all my period in this House. I have been here for 27 years. I hope to be here for some years to come to further the interests of the ordinary man of the province of Ontario and to make this province a better place in which to live. Thank you, very much.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Speaker, I have a question of the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions (Mr. Grossman). Has the hon. Minister been invited to the special meeting of Branch 11 of the Civil Service Association in the Legion Hall in Guelph on Monday next, when certain problems of branch members will be discussed? If so, does he plan to attend?

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first question is no. I have not been invited and, therefore, the second part of the question does not apply.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I have a statement that I would like to make to the House.

In recent weeks we in this Legislature have had to deal with the rights and privileges of individuals in our society, particularly in relationship to the needs of our society as a whole. We have had to consider ways and means of protecting ourselves not only from certain criminal elements, but from a host of other practices and procedures that have grown up in our increasingly complex community life. The examination of these relationships has brought into sharp focus many matters which have been of increasing concern to many people in these last few years.

Among other things, we have all become sharply aware of the ever-increasing role of the state in the evolution of our particular way of life. Those of us who sit in this Legislature are particularly aware of the continuous pressures that are placed upon government to assume a larger and ever-larger role in the affairs of our people. To put it another way, over the years in the development of our Canadian nation there has been a continuous evolution and growth of the traditional parliamentary powers of our legislative bodies, and a continuous expansion of the role of the state in our day-to-day living.

This growth has come about through constitutional developments; it has come about by the enlargement of administrative practices and has come about as a consequence of the constant expansion of the authority of governments. Changes have occurred as new precedents have been established to meet the needs of the day. New concepts and new relationships have arisen between the individual and the state. These have led to many readjustments in the internal structure of the body politic; and to many changes and adjustments in our society itself. Perhaps the most marked of these have been the readjustments of the human rights and liberties of the individual in his relationships with the state and its emanations.

In carrying on the affairs of government here in Ontario within the bounds of the autonomy granted by The British North America Act, this province possesses authority — broad-based authority — on a very secure foundation. We have the authority to delegate certain powers to boards, agencies and tribunals created by this Legislature. Of course, interwoven with these functions is the traditional, time-honoured and, indeed, sacred position of our judiciary and the courts.

As our province grows and social change takes place, we must, in our wisdom, proceed in such a fashion that we do not impose limitations upon, or do not interfere with, the inherent rights of the individual citizen, with whose welfare we in this assembly are entrusted.

In the opinion of the government, the time has now arrived when we should pause to examine with the greatest of care, changes that may have taken place to increase the power of the state to the detriment of the individual and his basic liberties and freedoms. We must ask ourselves if we are providing adequate safeguards to protect the rights of our citizens, even as we seek to solve some of the very aggravating problems that face us. We must ask ourselves if we are extending the power of the state far beyond the point required to achieve the social purposes and requirements of our day. These very questions have been raised in other countries which share with us a common tradition of protecting personal liberties and freedoms.

In the debates of recent weeks concerning amendments to The Police Act, I assured the Legislature and the people of Ontario that I personally, and the government of which I have the honour to head, will not for one moment tolerate legislation which infringes upon or jeopardizes in any way the rights and freedoms of the individual. It seems timely, therefore, that we should examine and investigate the whole question of the relationship between the state and the individual, and the power of encroachment which may be contained in any existing legislation and which may be sought in any future legislation. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, it is timely that we should look to the guarantees of civil liberties and should look to the freedoms and the guarantee of the freedoms which are inherent in our citizenship and which are inherent in the great traditions from which these freedoms have evolved.

Among other things, we must concern ourselves with the authority granted to boards and commissions, both in their administrative functions and in their investigative powers. We must review the rights of appeal from the decisions of boards and commissions and we must also review the powers that may have been given to these boards and commissions by statute over a very long period of years.

We must examine very closely the various means that can be devised to strengthen and maintain these guarantees, such as the desirability of the creation of the position of a public defender, the possibility of the development of a comprehensive civil rights code which might be a further extension of our present human rights code in which we all take justifiable pride, or perhaps it might be the adaptation of the Canadian Bill of Rights in relation to the powers of the province. These matters must be looked into. Then, too, there is the whole question of safeguarding our people against the actions of future governments. In short, we may require a Magna Carta of our own based upon the principles of the original great charter. Any action along the lines I have indicated here will have a very far-reaching effect indeed upon the people of this province. I am confident that all hon. members will agree that these questions are far above party politics. They are not matters to be dealt with in the heat of political partisanship but should be brought under the close scrutiny and the cool judgment of the judicial mind.

To this end the government has decided to appoint a Royal commission to conduct an exhaustive inquiry into the matters I have mentioned. I am happy, therefore, to be able to inform the hon. members of the House that the hon. James Chalmers McRuer, Chief Justice of the High Court, has consented to undertake this inquiry.

Mr. Justice McRuer is a jurist of distinction, who has established an enviable reputation in the position he occupies, particularly with respect to judgments he has delivered from time to time emphasizing the importance of protecting and safeguarding human rights and civil liberties.

He was born in Oxford county, educated here in Toronto at the University of Toronto and Osgoode Hall. He was called to the Bar in 1914, created a King's Counsel in 1929 and he is a member of the bar of both British Columbia and Alberta in addition to the bar of this province.

He has practised here prior to his being appointed to the Bench for some 30 years; he has been a lecturer at Osgoode Hall in criminal procedure; he has been a chairman as well as a member of several Royal commissions, appointed to inquire into other matters of public concern. In every way I would say that he is eminently equipped to conduct this present inquiry, and I can assure you that he will have at his disposal the full and complete resources of this government and such research assistance as he requires to assist him in his task, because there will be a great deal of research and study necessary.

From his studies and recommendations, it will be our hope and purpose to be able to draft, and to present to this House at as early a date as possible, the necessary legislation to ensure that within the statutory powers of this province, the rights, freedoms and the liberties of our people here will be protected for all time.

Mr. Speaker, I am certain the the hon. members will agree that a task of this magnitude cannot be carried through in haste. It will require careful deliberation. I think one of the important lessons we have all learned in recent weeks is the unwisdom of doing things in a hurry. Someone has said that we often discover what will do by finding out in good time what will not do. And I am the first to admit that we have, with the best of intentions, at times fallen into the error of haste in our zeal to solve a problem. On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, I think that we might agree that it is only an error in judgment to make a mistake but it is a defect in character to persist in it after it has been discovered. Perhaps the real achievement is not in never making a mistake but in correcting it in time. It is in this spirit that we are endeavouring to find the best possible answer for what all of us in this House agree is a most serious problem.

We are confident that the course we are following will meet with the approbation of all the hon. members of this assembly, as well as with the approval of the people of the province. The liberty we are seeking to defend is a fundamental necessity to the spiritual and the material development of our society, for liberty is not only the people's prerogative but it is a prerequisite of the abundant life we seek for them.

Mr. Speaker, I will conclude these remarks by quoting some words spoken by an Englishman who knew his rights and dared to assert them and these were spoken some three hundred years ago in 1663. He said:

For what is done to anyone may be done to everyone; besides being all of one body, one man should not suffer wrongfully but all should be sensible and endeavour his preservation. Otherwise they give way to an inlet of the sea of will and power upon their laws and liberties which are the boundaries to keep out tyranny and oppression. And who assists not in such cases betrays his own rights, and is overrun and of a free man made a slave when he thinks not of it or regards it not; and so incurs the guilt of treachery to the present and future generations.

Mr. Oliver: Mr. Speaker, the announcement just made by the hon. Prime Minister is welcome so far as we are concerned and we shall move with him in whatever capacity lies within our power to see that what he has so boldly set out this morning, will be carried through to its fruition. I would say, Mr. Speaker, that what the hon. Prime Minister has said this morning comes I think, in the main, from the protestations and from the arguments and the appeals down through the years from those of us who sit on this side of the House. I am not distinguishing between one party or the other this morning. We have constantly, as the House will recall, made a plea that the rights of the individual should be safeguarded and his privileges maintained in this province; and that no government, through the strength that it has, should trample upon the rights of the individual in Ontario.

I have many times in this House argued that the emanations of government, such as those the hon. Prime Minister has suggested this morning, in the form of commissions and boards, although necessary to carry on the government in this day and age, nevertheless these boards and commissions have rights to interfere with the individual that the Legislature itself might not give. We have argued that the boards and commissions were too far removed from the Legislature; and that the right of appeal from the decisions of those boards was not as clear cut and definite as we would like it to be.

All these things we have argued over the years, and to hear from the lips of the hon. Prime Minister this morning that a complete and exhaustive investigation into all these matters is to be pursued is, I say, welcome news to us. We are, of course, happy in the choice of the one who is to conduct this investigation because we have complete confidence in his integrity and in his desire to find a real solution to the problems that will be put before him.

And so in a word, Mr. Speaker, I agree entirely with the enumerated remarks of the hon. Prime Minister as he catalogued each one of the dangers that are inherent in the way we are carrying on. I thought perhaps that one thing he did not include was that I have always felt that government has too much power in the making of regulations and I think that is another field that should be exhaustively gone into. I know that regulations need to be made and that powers should be given to make regulations. But over the past few years, particularly, I think we have run a bit wild in giving Ministers power to make regulations in respect to Acts introduced in the House. I think a lot that has gone into regulations in the past number of years should be in the statute itself. Certainly it seems to me that is one theatre in which critical examination should be made.

I think, too, that before we leave the Legislature we should know what the terms of reference are in respect to this matter. We should have an opportunity to examine them and to see for ourselves whether, in our judgment, they are broad enough and embracing enough to do the job that so badly needs to be done in this province. We all wait with interest and concern the outcome of this examination because we believe it is long overdue.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I would like to join with the hon. leader of the Opposition in saying that we welcome the appointment of this Royal commission, with just one reservation that I want to come to in a minute.

We welcome not only its appointment, but also the person who has been chosen to head it. I think Chief Justice McRuer has proven down through the years that he has the fearlessness to let the chips fall where they may in coping with issues that relate to the rights of the individual.

I think, however, that we should at least take cognizance of the fact that some of the work that is now being handed over to a Royal commission is very much in the nature of unfinished business. For example, there is one aspect of this threat to individual liberty relating to the question of whether or not there are adequate appeal procedures from boards and commissions, on which—let us face it, Mr. Speaker—we have had one Royal commission already.

The Gordon commission, in examining the whole operation of government, reviewed this and brought back recommendations. We, in this House, in our wisdom some four years ago, also set up a select committee to review the recommendations and to bring back suggestions to this House that might be implemented. The tragedy of it is that the select committee never completed its work. This is the unfinished business that we, in effect, now are handing over to a second Royal commission.

However, I think this is justified in view of the fact that the hon. Prime Minister has indicated clearly that he is considering much broader terms of reference—the whole range of existing or potential threats to the rights of the individual.

I think I can make my point best, Mr. Speaker, by just saying that there stands on the order paper, in my name, a resolution in which I spelled out—and I do not pretend to suggest that this is necessarily an exhaustive list—these very areas in which there should be investigation. Indeed, one of them is precisely the point (b) in my resolution, that the hon. leader of the Opposition has just now raised. There has been a growing practice of passing a skeleton statute and then leaving the power with the Minister to make regulations and failing in this House, though we have discussed it many times, to establish a regular procedure for reviewing the regulations.

At a time when nobody knows anything about it, the regulation is often made. It is published in the Ontario Gazette and, I suppose, a small fraction of one per cent of the people of the province of Ontario see it. Yet the lives of human beings are vitally affected. They sometimes discover it has been affected without their knowledge; without anybody knowing about it.

There is a whole range of issues that I have spelled out in this resolution and, as the hon. leader of the Opposition also has indicated, I trust we are going to have an opportunity before the end of the session to examine the terms of reference that the government is proposing. I invite the government to examine, at least, the points I have included in this resolution for possible inclusion. Again I do not suggest that they are necessarily exhaustive for inclusion in the terms of reference of the Royal commission.

Mr. Speaker, my reservation is this: There may well be a point in the hon. Prime Minister's underlying assertion that we have now reached the stage in the growing complexity of our society when we need to examine the machinery that is now almost inevitably appearing more and more to see that it does not represent an unnecessary threat to the rights of the individual. It may well be that we should send this off to a Royal commission to take a look at the whole range of existing and potential threats.

But, Mr. Speaker, the final guardian of the rights of the individual is this Legislature. Therefore, let us not think that we are going to solve the problem by sending it off to a Royal commission. In at least one instance we sent it to a Royal commission and we sent it to a select committee, yet they did nothing. We are, therefore, the architects of some of the folly and some of the disaster that we have run into. We look forward, as early as possible, to a report from the Royal commission so that we, who are the guardians of the rights of the individual, can assume our responsibility here, because in the final analysis it is going to rest with us.

Mr. A. F. Lawrence (St. George): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. Prime Minister would take into account, when he is drafting the terms of reference, that there may be some boards and commissions which cannot be properly called provincial boards or commissions, but which are set up under the jurisdiction of this Legislature, and that the question of appeals from these should be looked at by this commission? For example, one that comes to mind is the Metropolitan Toronto Licensing Commission.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. E. Sargent (Grey North): Mr. Speaker, as a lowly backbencher I would like to, if I may—

Mr. Speaker: Would the member just take his seat for a moment? In the matter of a statement of this kind I think it is the privilege perhaps for only one member of the Opposition party to speak to it and one of the other party.

Mr. Sargent: I think the personnel of this commission is very important.

Mr. Speaker: Yes, but it is not up for debate at this time, and if the member has some remarks to make perhaps there will be occasion again when the terms of reference are submitted to the House.

Orders of the day.

THE PLANNING ACT

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs) moves second reading of Bill No. 132, An Act to amend The Planning Act.

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make some comments in a general way in connection with this bill. The first part of this bill, Mr. Speaker, provides that the consent of the committee of adjustments would be substituted for the consent of the planning board and also where an area of subdivision control is designated by order of the Minister of Municipal Affairs, consent to be given by the Minister.

Some of the background of the problem which has existed and which has caused me to bring in this amendment goes back to the year 1960. In that year a case came before the Supreme Court of Ontario in which it appeared that the township of Scarborough had given a conditional consent to a severance, the condition being the payment of $205. The case was reported under the name Lauff V. Cooney, and is reported in the Ontario Weekly Notes. The court held that the municipality had no right to impose such a condition and spoke in somewhat strong terms of the action of the municipality in this regard. Following this an amendment was introduced in the 1960-61 session which permitted the Minister and the planning board to impose conditions by reference to section 28 of The Planning Act.

In my view this did not include the right to impose as a condition the requirement of a cash contribution. This was accomplished by the Minister and the Minister only under subsection 5 of section 28 under which the Minister could require the subdivider to enter into an agreement with a municipality.

One of the municipalities in this province, namely, the township of Brantford, in March 1961, passed a by-law which purported to impose a cash contribution on consents to severances under section 26 of The Planning Act.

A copy of this by-law was sent to The Department of Municipal Affairs in September 1962, more than a year after it had been passed by the municipality, and a letter was written to the clerk of the township advising the township that in the opinion of the law officers of this department, sir, this by-law was ultra vires of the municipality. Despite these instructions the township apparently continued to act under the by-law until the matter was brought before the courts on a motion by a land owner to quash the by-law. This case came before Mr. Justice Donnelly and is reported in the Ontario Reports, 1963. In his judgment Mr. Justice Donnelly quashed the by-law as being ultra vires of the township and in his judgment he states and, I quote:

The Planning Act does not authorize the municipality to pass a by-law requiring an owner of land to enter into an agreement and pay a severance fee as provided in the by-law.

Throughout the reasons for judgment it appears that Mr. Justice Donnelly had reached the same conclusion as had been reached by the department's legal branch who had advised the municipality.

After the judgment in this case the township council then endeavoured to have the planning board impose the cash contributions instead of the council as had been their previous practice. They either did this or they persuaded the planning board to refuse all severances as being premature and not in the interests of the municipality. In any event, in 1963 the same land owner applied to the planning board for consent to a severance and he was refused by the planning board. This land owner then took an appeal to the municipal board and, as I understand it, on this appeal the township said that unless it could impose a cash contribution, such severances were premature, whereupon the board took the view that while the planning board did not have this power the municipal board did, and it consented to the severance on condition that a cash contribution of $400 be made.

This owner then appealed to the court of appeal which held that the municipal board was wrong and had no greater power than a planning board. It then examined the question of the powers of the planning board to impose such a condition and concluded that in the case before it the planning board had no such power and so allowed the appeal.

Now, following this I prepared this legislation and introduced it some time ago with the purpose of transferring the jurisdiction to give consent to severances from the planning board to the committee of adjustment, and at the same time I believe that this legislation is quite clear that the committee of adjustment is to have the power to impose these cash contributions in a proper case.

Now, this transfer of jurisdiction also carries with it the right of any interested person, including the Minister, to appeal to the Ontario Municipal Board. Under the previous legislation only the person applying for consent to severance could appeal if it were refused or if he were dissatisfied with the conditions imposed.

Now, Mr. Speaker, basically, committees of adjustment are established to administer the zoning by-laws in the municipality. The zoning by-laws implement an official plan, if there be one, and otherwise are the only direct application of planning principles within a municipality. It seems to me that committees of adjustment which are directly and immediately concerned in the planning processes in a municipality are at least in a better position to consider severances than the planning boards, even with the members of the council constituting a part of the planning board. It should be remembered that the prime function of a planning board is to prepare an official plan, and under the previous legislation the only administrative act as such which a planning board performed was the granting of consents to severances.

There is no indication in my studies of this subject that the committees of adjustment would grant indiscriminate consents of severances any more than the planning boards would have. The existing function of the committee of adjustment is closely related to handling consents to severances. The administration of zoning by-laws is the direct application of planning principles whether these are propounded in an official plan, or otherwise.

The purpose of this bill, Mr. Speaker, is not to give more jurisdiction to a committee of adjustment, but is to assign to them a function which fits into a framework of these committees ideally, as under existing legislation for committees of adjustment, the entire procedure is provided, including the procedure for an appeal.

It is significant that this appeal could be taken by the Minister, if committees of adjustment attempt to usurp the Minister's function in approving plans of subdivision or by the municipality, if the council feels that the committee has not acted properly.

There is no reason to assume that the committee is going to act improperly or that the committee knows nothing of plans of subdivision any more than there is any reason to suppose that members of council are going to act improperly or that they know nothing about subdivision. So I recommended these amendments to the Legislature.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the next important amendment to The Planning Act is—and I might say before I leave this subject, sir, that another amendment relative to subdivision control will provide that where the Minister makes an order designating an area of subdivision control, he will have all the powers of the committee of adjustment to allow minor variations. This is to provide for cases where there is no planning board or official plan, but where an area of subdivision control has been set up by the Minister.

The next important amendment contained in this bill, Mr. Speaker, has to do with the maintenance of dwellings.

Hon. members may remember that in June, 1962, which is almost two years ago, The Department of Municipal Affairs published a very important report entitled "A Better Place to Live." This was a study on minimum standards of occupancy and maintenance of dwellings and was jointly sponsored by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and The Ontario Department of Municipal Affairs. Copies of this report were very widely distributed throughout the province to interested municipalities, planning boards, community planning associations and other similar organizations interested in this very important subject.

During the course of the study, some 360 individuals in 225 agencies were contacted, many through personal interview. Ideas and suggestions and interests were forthcoming from individuals and agencies even outside of Canada, as well as those from within the ten provinces.

This report, Mr. Speaker, is based upon the belief that housing of all forms is a valuable social and economic asset. It is both a physical and a social resource and like all resources, it is limited while the demands upon it are many. It occupies the largest proportion of built-up land area in all urban communities. It is subject, unfortunately, to many deteriorating influences and it is difficult to replace. Because it is both a resource and an important influence in shaping the lives of citizens, the conservation of it should be one of the prime objectives of every community.

For many people the investment in a dwelling is the largest investment they ever make. Usually the investor wants to protect his investment by taking good care of the house. Negative influences, however, may hinder his good intentions. The original owner may move away, or he may be short of funds. There may be changes in neighbourhood environment which discourage maintenance of the individual home, sir, such as overcrowding, lack of sufficient open space, heavy traffic, and the point of view that money will be saved if the house is neither maintained nor improved.

A house also represents a social or a community asset. As a social asset, it is the primary physical environment in which an individual grows and lives. As a community asset it is a place to live; it produces revenue and its appearance adds to or detracts from the physical environment.

Mr. Speaker, in all levels of society, there are standards by which individuals conduct themselves. Such standards may be customary or based on law, but to deviate to something less than the accepted standard is not regarded with favour. However, standards change with society and new situations create new standards and different ways, depending on the traditions of any given group. What was standard 25 years ago, may be substandard tomorrow.

Because of the importance of housing to the individual and to the community, the requirement for standards is immediate. A house must be safe from collapse or fire, hence there are standards of construction and fire prevention. There are also other standards for dwellings, such as standards regulating the size, kind and relationship of one dwelling to another. There are standards that minimize and control the incidence and spread of disease.

In spite of the fact that standards have increased in number and in quality, the deterioration of housing in some instances has been of such magnitude that expensive redevelopment projects have been necessary. Redevelopment of this type inevitably requires large public expenditures. However, the interest in preventing the spread of blight in deteriorating neighbourhoods has increased substantially in the last decade and many of the reasons for blight have been identified. One of the principal reasons is the lack of minimum standards of occupancy and maintenance for dwellings, while another is the lack of enforcement, if there are such standards.

Mr. Speaker, the completion of this report entitled "A Better Place to Live" is a comprehensive three-year study on bylaws and other regulations having a bearing upon maintaining minimum housing standards. I do not wish to quote further from this report because I know that hon. members have already read it. It has received wide acclaim from all those interested in this subject. Therefore this year, Mr. Speaker, I have provided in Bill No. 132 the necessary amendments which would authorize the municipalities, where an official plan includes provisions relating to housing conditions, to pass bylaws prescribing standards for the maintenance and occupancy of residential property and for requiring residential property below the prescribed standards to be repaired and maintained to comply with the standards.

There must be an official plan in effect and the official plan of course has to be amended if it does not already carry these provisions relating to housing conditions. Then the municipal council would pass the bylaw, but no part of any bylaw in any municipality would come into force without the approval of the Ontario Municipal Board. I consider that to be reasonable protection for the individual, and of course, Mr. Speaker, the bylaw would also set out the area in which it is to apply within the respective municipalities.

Then every bylaw under this section of the Act, Mr. Speaker, would provide for the establishment in the local municipality of an organization known as a housing standards committee which would be composed of three ratepayers of the municipality who should hold office for the term prescribed in the bylaw. This housing standards committee would be, should I call it, the court of appeal in using the facilities and the conditions in the bylaw once it is approved by the Ontario Municipal Board.

I might say to hon. members also, sir, that it is my intention to propose an amendment in the committee to subsection two of section seven which deals with the date on which this amendment is to come into force and I am doing that at the request of a number of municipalities.

I would ask, Mr. Speaker, if this bill could be placed on the committee agenda for the next sitting of the committee and at that time I will be prepared to discuss the bill completely.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Speaker, starting at the second portion of the bill, and I will move in a few moments to the first portion, I want to compliment the hon. Minister on having discovered the book, "A Better Place to Live." It is some two years now, Mr. Speaker—

Hon. Mr. Spooner: The hon. member is wrong.

Mr. Singer: Oh I know, I know, but it is some two years now, Mr. Speaker, since I read into the record great portions of that bill talking about housing. It is some two years now since I urged upon the hon. Minister and his colleagues that something should be done about this. It is not insignificant, Mr. Speaker, that two years ago and even as recently as this session, the government did not see fit in dealing with the main estimates of The Department of Municipal Affairs to indicate that it had paid any great attention to what was in the book. So, in the spirit of good faith, Mr. Speaker, I compliment the hon. Minister for having discovered it, albeit a bit late, and having taken some action on it. I think the action he has indicated in the bill makes some good sense and I have no great quarrel with that.

However, dealing with the first section of the bill—this idea of giving additional powers to the committee of adjustment insofar as severances are concerned—I must admit, Mr. Speaker, that I fail to follow the hon. Minister's reasoning. We have just listened this morning to a speech from the hon. Prime Minister of the province (Mr. Roberts) expressing his concern about the preservation of civil rights and liberties, and hardly had the hon. Prime Minister sat down when the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs stands up and says that we are going to take away from the elected officials of a municipality, the rights to determine things that properly should be determined by the people who are responsible to the electors. I grant to the hon. Minister that he has had difficulty in getting across to the various authorities and to the courts what he meant in his legislation, but I suggest that this is no one's fault but the hon. Minister's.

If the hon. Minister wants, and I see no great harm in it, to allow severances to take place and conditions to be extracted, which conditions can be reviewed perhaps by the hon. Minister and perhaps by the municipal board, in principle there is nothing wrong with this at all. But what bothers me, Mr. Speaker, about this approach, is that the hon. Minister is telling us that there is greater intelligence or greater integrity or more facilities in allowing a group of people appointed by the politicians, to make decisions that he does not want the politicians to make. I object very strongly to this continued taking away from the elected people, whether it is provincial or municipal, the powers that they should have to exercise. I can see no point whatsoever, Mr. Speaker, in giving this power to the committee of adjustment, which, once it has been appointed, he has removed from the control of the municipal people who appoint them. I fail to understand completely, Mr. Speaker, what intelligence there is in the fact that the people whom politicians appoint have greater intelligence than the politicians who appoint them, and that more power should be given to the people whom politicians appoint, and removed from political control.

I am not suggesting, Mr. Speaker, that committees of adjustment are deliberately going to violate powers that are given to them, but I say it is possible that a committee of adjustment could tear apart any municipal planning scheme and not be subject to the control of the municipal council that brought in that planning scheme. If there is necessity for this power, I think the Supreme Court cases the hon. Minister has referred to indicate that it is high time the legislation was cleared up. If there is a necessity for this power, I think the power should rest with the elected representatives of the people, with the local council. I see no reason, Mr. Speaker, why Ministers are constantly nibbling away at the rights given to those elected officials, nor why it follows in the minds of some of those hon. gentlemen that there is greater virtue in the people these horrible politicians appoint than there is in the politicians themselves. If this power is needed, and I say, Mr. Speaker, I think it is, then it should be left with the municipal councils. I see nothing that is going to be achieved by giving this additional power to the committee of adjustment.

The hon. Minister says they are aware of subdivisions. But they do not plan subdivisions and they do not make subdivision decisions. Nor is it their job. They are set up as an administrative adjunct to deal with matters minor in their natures. Now, these matters, these severances, could be major in their nature. By their very form they could destroy all of the planning control that a municipality wants to exert. After all, under our present scheme of things, this is where the planning is done in the local areas, by the municipal council. The planning board is an advisory board and its only use is to advise the council.

But I say, Mr. Speaker, that there is no point whatsoever in nibbling and continuing to nibble away at the rights given to these elected people and saying that the people that the elected people appoint have greater virtue. I think that the hon. Minister should very seriously reconsider where this power should lie and I would hope he would give it back to the elected representatives. After all, there is always another municipal election or provincial election coming on and if the people do not like the decisions made by their elected representatives, in due course they can replace them.

But they cannot replace the committee of adjustment. And the committee of adjustment can go on making this sort of decision without being subject to any control other than the control of an appeal. The hon. Minister is going to tell us the appeal is always there. But appeals are expensive and the ordinary citizen-ratepayer is not anxious to get into an appeal and to involve himself in inconvenience of appearing some distance away from his home, the expense of hiring solicitors to represent him, or the challenge of having to take on an organization that has unlimited funds to disagree with him. So that the appeal safeguard, while it is important, is not as good a safeguard as leaving this power with the elected representatives.

For all of these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. Minister should take another careful look at this before it comes before the committee.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question and perhaps make some remarks. Could I ask the hon. Minister: did I understand him to say that this will provide for conditions to be attached by the committee of adjustment in the case of land division?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: That is right. The problem has been in the past that the planning board has no right to enforce a cash payment that has been one of the considerations for severance. Of course, the hon. member must remember that severances occur only where there is no subdivision plan in effect, usually.

Mr. Young: Well, would this condition then, Mr. Speaker, allow a committee of adjustment to demand certain lands or certain grant of lands adjacent to a highway or a road or a street, if it not be cash, it be in kind?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I would doubt that, because this is dealing with the subdivision of existing lots that are ten acres or less in area, and I do not think it would involve the dedication of land. The hon. member is speaking of the five per cent lands in the case of a subdivision.

Mr. Young: No, I am thinking in terms of lands adjacent to streets. For example, at the present time Metro Toronto and the municipalities are acquiring for Metro Toronto along the major arterial roads, widenings. Wherever subdivisions occur, those widenings are sought and demanded and achieved. Now in the case of land separation, can that same road widening be achieved under this legislation? This is what I am getting at.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Well, Mr. Speaker, I am not prepared to delve into the intricate details of this legislation. We will deal with that in committee, if you do not mind. I will have my officials there to take care of it.

Mr. Young: Well then, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I was going to inform the member the question-and-answer parts on the bill would perhaps be better taken up in the standing committee.

Mr. Young: Thank you, sir. I think I will just make a few remarks here and then will continue in the committee because I think what I wanted to say has been fairly well covered by the hon. member for Downsview. But it seems to me that this bill in transferring this right from the elected representatives to the appointed board is a dangerous bit of legislation.

I say this because of what has already been said, that the planning board and council deal with the overall planning of a township. The committee of adjustment deals with minor variances and the committee of adjustment, unless in other places they are wiser than they are in some jurisdictions that I am familiar with, is not cognizant of the overall planning needs of the municipality. And they are perhaps never aware of reasons which led councils and planning boards to make certain moves and to lay down certain conditions. I think, for example, of a recent incident where a certain density was allowed on an apartment block and so the apartment builder simply left the first floor vacant, put it up on pillars and then went to the committee of adjustment and got his extra suites from them. This kind of thing is an illustration, I think, of what can happen because of the lack of understanding of the overall kind of planning that must be done. And so when it comes to giving a committee of adjustment this kind of power, which can seriously affect the overall planning, and can allow landowners, in effect, to subdivide without meeting the conditions which the community and which the municipality wants to lay down for that process—so I think this is legislation that should be looked at very, very carefully and certainly when it comes to committee stage some of us will be looking at the various suggestions that are put forward there.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Mr. Speaker, I may say that the comments made by the hon. member for Downsview are not unknown to me. I would suggest that when in committee we will go through all the intricate details of the amendment.

But I am concerned with the relative position as he refers to them as regards the local politicians against the committee of adjustment. In my experience—and I have been in this field for many years, not just since I have been in The Department of Municipal Affairs—it is sometimes very difficult for the local politicians to resist certain pressures, whereas if they were there as the guiding light and had the right of appeal of any decisions reached by the committee of adjustment, I would be inclined to think that the community generally would be better served in that way. However, we can go into the details of that during the committee hearing.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

Mr. Speaker: I might inform the members of the House that Bill No. 132 will go to the committee on labour, legal and municipal bills on Monday.

THE LABOUR RELATIONS ACT

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour) moves second reading of Bill No. 142, An Act to amend The Labour Relations Act.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, there are three principles involved in this bill and I have very little to add to what was stated on first reading of the bill.

But the first point has to do with the transfer of the power to grant conciliation from the labour relations board to the department itself. This is designed to relieve the labour relations board of certain routine procedures, with a view to speeding up the conciliation process.

The second matter has to do with voluntary recognition in certain circumstances and with safeguards provided against so-called "sweetheart" deals.

The third point is of some great importance. It has to do with the preservation of the whole conciliation process and its very nature. Any effort to abrogate the immunity which the officials of the department or members of conciliation boards have with respect to information which has been conveyed to them in the course of their duties to conciliate or mediate a dispute—any attempt to abrogate that protection or indeed, any threat to that protection—would undermine and quickly destroy the entire conciliation procedure. It is for that reason that this section is in the bill.

It is our view that with respect to the actual operations of the proposed three principles, the senior officials of the board and the department will be available at committee to deal with them.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, in my opinion this bill is a great disappointment.

I would judge from the fact that it has been brought in so late in the session that it has received mature consideration from the hon. Minister and the department. I would judge that they have been considering amendments that they think are appropriate to The Labour Relations Act for a long time. The result of their consideration is not very startling, in my opinion, Mr. Speaker.

I would not object to the proposed changes in the Act. I think they are useful changes, and they will be useful in the future development of labour relations in this province. It is unfortunate, however, that after such lengthy consideration the hon. Minister or the department apparently has not seen fit to deal with a great many other matters that I think are urgent and more important.

We still have no proposal from the hon. Minister on the matter of the check-off of union dues. We have no suggestion that the disability on certain classes of employees employed by municipal governments and municipal boards will be removed. These people are to continue apparently for another year to be second-class citizens under The Labour Relations Act of this province.

No further consideration, I take it, has been given to the whole question of trusteeships. There has been a rather important use of the power of trusteeship in the Toronto area during the past year. I think that it raises some fundamental questions. I regret that the government has not seen fit to reconsider its legislation in the light of what has happened in this particular instance. I am referring to the carpenters' union in this city, where a trusteeship has been imposed from on high with very little redress apparently available to the people affected. I would have thought that that incident might have given rise to further consideration of the provisions of the Act relating to trusteeships.

None of these matters is dealt with. One wonders why it took the hon. Minister so long to bring in this rather insignificant bill. However, this is what we have to consider since this is all that is placed before us. I think it can be said that we in this group will support the bill for the little bit that it does do. We regret that once again some much more important issues have been evaded.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

Mr. Speaker: I have been asked to announce this bill will also go to the standing committee on Monday.

Clerk of the House: The 14th order, House in committee of supply; Mr. W. G. Noden in the chair.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION

Mr. Chairman: On vote 515:

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education): I wonder, Mr. Chairman, if I might just suggest this, not that it makes too much difference: I was wondering if we might consider 515, 516 and 517, and then just for some order of procedure, if we might then go to 519, 520 and 521, if this would be agreeable to the hon. members opposite. I am just trying to relate all the votes that directly affect the department. This leaves the whole question of universities until the final vote, if this would be appropriate.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Mr. Chairman, I was going to ask the hon. Minister in vote 515 about the money that is provided for scholarships for foreign students coming to Ontario, and also the money for residents of this province who wish to study outside the province, listed in items four and five.

I would like to ask the hon. Minister how the scholarships are awarded. Do the applications come to his department and, if so, who deals with them?

Hon. Mr. Davis: On the question of the African students, Mr. Chairman, the recommendations come through the African Student Foundation. We accept these recommendations and pay the money in this respect.

Mr. Chairman, with regard to the scholarships, these are awarded on the basis of $2,000 annually as a rule. They are authorized under section seven of The Department of Education Act. The recipients in 1963-64, and they are secondary school teachers as a rule, are: Miss Marion Cornwall, assistant supervisor of the kindergarten and primary department schools in London, and she is to study at the University of Boston; Mr. John Futhey who is from Fort Frances and who will study at the University of Illinois; Mr. Simons, who is at David and Mary Thomson Collegiate in Scarborough and who has his BPHE and I assume is going to take further study in this field at the University of Leeds in England; and Mr. Tomkinson, the art supervisor in Etobicoke, who is going to study at the University of London in England.

Mr. Nixon: I am very interested to hear who the recipients are, but what I wanted to know was how are the awards made. Are they made on the recommendations of the committee of the secondary people?

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Chairman, there is one item here, item number four, relating to scholarships for African students. My understanding from the information given to us in the public accounts committee is that two or three years ago an arrangement was made with a private organization whereby this department would help that organization in bringing certain African students to Canada for study and would assist in providing scholarships for them. I think this was a good idea. The only reason I raise the matter now is to suggest to the hon. Minister that he might consider continuing and extending the plan. The answers given to us in the public accounts committee indicated that this was a one-shot affair, shall we say, lasting for approximately four years, applying to a limited number of students who are being assisted to complete their education in this country.

Now, the problem of assisting underdeveloped countries throughout the world in improving the education of their people, is a monumental problem. I am not going to suggest that the Ontario government can solve it, but I would like to put before the hon. Minister and the government a proposal that we might assist in our own small way by developing a regular programme with regard to the students or the young people of one or two countries. I would think the vast continent of Africa is an appropriate area where we could consider giving assistance. I would like to see this province, with all the many advantages that it has, doing something in this field by working out a plan whereby an increasing number and substantial number of scholarships would be awarded to African students to enable them to come to this country for either undergraduate or post-graduate training.

I would not want to imply anything that might be discriminatory, I am not suggesting that Asian students from many countries are not also worthy of assistance. It is just that we cannot solve the whole problem. Perhaps we could make a contribution by selecting one area to which we would give assistance. My understanding is that the programme of scholarships for African students, which was quite modest, is coming to an end. I would hope that the government might consider a proposal to build upon this very useful, even though modest, start, and develop a full-fledged programme whereby we might provide, say, $100,000 in another year, and $500,000 two or three years hence to assist such students. I think this would be a very modest contribution indeed on our part, out of our relatively opulent resources to assist human beings in other parts of the world to solve their own problems.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, without delaying this, I think there is some merit in what the hon. member suggests. My thought was that this matter might be referred to the new Ministry of University Affairs and with some consultation with The Department of External Affairs in Ottawa to see whether there could be some overall policy established for the Dominion. There would be no point in the province of Ontario—say we were to continue this programme—to concentrate on one or two areas that were being duplicated by one or two of the sister provinces or by the federal department itself, and I certainly intend to suggest to the Ministry that they discuss this with The Department of External Affairs to see just in what areas we might be helpful.

On vote 516:

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to get into all the complexities of the new system of legislative grants. I will frankly confess I do not understand all the ins and outs anyway. I am prepared to rely on the fact that the officers of the department understand them and will administer them in accordance with the law as embodied in the regulations.

I am somewhat concerned, however, about some of the policy implications of the hon. Minister's original statement on the new foundation tax plan, as he called it, as set forth in his statement of January 27 to this House. He stated on page 4 of the mimeographed version of that statement that the government has for the first year of operation of the new plan deliberately set the level in terms of the average. Later, at the bottom of page 10 and the top of page 11, he said:

In order to smooth the transition from the previous grant system to the Ontario Foundation Tax Plan 1964, the percentage that the 1964 grant is of the 1963 cost of operating is not to be more than 20 per cent higher than the percentage the 1963 grants were to the 1962 cost of operating, nor is this to be more than five per cent less. The general effect of this provision will be to spread over a number of years unusually large increases or decreases in grant.

Mr. Chairman, that statement created a certain alarm in my mind at the time I heard it. I would like to probe a little further as to what exactly it means. On the face of it, there appears to be a possibility that under the new plan some school boards will actually suffer decreases in grant. No? What does it mean then?

Hon. Mr. Davis: There is a floor, Mr. Chairman, so that no board will have a decrease in grant. There is also some stability at the top level—dictated by the limitation to 20 per cent increase over the 1963-64 grant situation. Otherwise, because of the complicating problems, a board might receive substantially more, not only than it would need, but than it could actually spend. This, quite frankly, is in the areas of the perhaps lower assessed separate schools. A floor level and also an upper limit have been established, at least for the time being—until we have an opportunity to see what the results of the new plan will be.

As I pointed out to hon. members the other day, $210 is the average which we have taken—and you will be interested to know, I think, the provincial average, because you mentioned this before. It is $235, I believe, for elementary, and for the separate school system I believe it is around $185 or $190. So the figure of $210 is in between the two levels that presently exist throughout the province. These stabilizing factors have been built into the plan, at least for a period of time.

Mr. Bryden: What did the hon. Minister mean then, when he said that the 1964 grant will not under any circumstances be more than five per cent less of—let me read the whole thing. I am not interested in his upper stabilizing factor, I am trying to isolate the lower one:

The percentage that the 1964 grant is of the 1963 cost of operating, is not to be more than five per cent less than the percentage the 1963 grants were of the 1962 cost of operating.

That is a rephrasing of the hon. Minister's statement to focus attention purely on the lower limit—

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): In other words, it can go down.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, this is very involved and I am not sure that I can give the appropriate explanation. It has to do with the equalization of the assessment and where the assessment of the board has been held at 60 per cent of the full equalization. This is a very technical subject and I would be quite prepared to have this explained at some length with either Mr. Rideout or Dr. Jackson. This is a very important ingredient in the plan. The intent is to build into it a base, or a floor, to see that none of these boards that are affected by this jump in equalization suffers anything from the new grant regulation. This is the purpose of it.

Mr. Bryden: Going back to the earlier statement of the hon. Minister that I quoted where he said that this year, at any rate, we have deliberately set the levels in terms of the average. Now that means, I take it, that he hopes to bring the boards now below the average up toward the average.

Hon. Mr. Davis: It is obvious, Mr. Chairman, if a separate school board, or any board, is at $185 and we have set the rate at $210, then it is going to come up $25, if my mathematics is correct, as far as the basic grant is concerned. We have established it at $210, using the elementary figure. The approximate average in the separate school system, I believe, is around $185 to $190.

Mr. Bryden: But it would not be envisaged that any board now above the average would be dragged down toward it?

Hon. Mr. Davis: We are not dragging it down. This is just the figure we have determined as the base from which we begin the calculations.

Mr. Bryden: I have here an excerpt from a story that appeared in the Toronto Telegram on February 24, 1964, and I would appreciate it if the hon. Minister would comment on it. It is as follows:

A new Ontario grant programme designed to equalize education across the province, may be responsible for hiking Toronto's education taxes this year.

Board of education finance committee heard yesterday that Toronto now faces an increase of 2.71 mills because of more students, higher salaries and a loss in provincial grants.

Toronto, said finance comptroller, G. D. Spry, lost $2 million in grants re-routed to Metro school boards. This money might be returned in some form by Metro, which would carve one mill off the increase.

But two board of education members, trustees William P. Ross and Barry Coutts, said they will suggest to the board later this week that a delegation or a brief present Toronto's problems to Queen's Park.

If the increase in Toronto's education tax is 1.71 mills, this would mean an increase of $18.55 in the school and property tax bill for the taxpayer with a home assessed at $5,000.

The problem, officials admitted later, is that no Metro municipality will know its tax situation until Metro adjusts its own balance sheets. Toronto's share could mount even higher.

And so on. Partly the concern that was expressed at that time was no doubt a reflection of insufficient information at the time. But there seems to be some concern in the Toronto board of education, or there was at that time at any rate, that they were going to have to increase the mill rate, not because of the normal sort of increase in demands but also because of what was described here as a loss in provincial grants. Has the hon. Minister any explanation of this?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I am not sure, Mr. Chairman, but as I recall it the grant to Toronto this year—and this is all involved with Metro which further complicates it—is substantially the same at the elementary level. There has not been a decrease, but Toronto as you know is perhaps one of the wealthiest boards, assessment-wise, in the province. From the information we have there has actually been an increase in the grant at the secondary level. One of the problems you would face in what has been referred to as a pure foundation plan is that if we had established a pure foundation plan with, say, the $210 and with the 11 mills and with no stabilizing factors in it, it is quite possible that the city of Toronto would have received a negative grant. That is, there would have been no grant.

Mr. Bryden: If you use the average, yes.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Yes, but this is the problem. From the information we have, the city of Toronto is not receiving anything less for the elementary level, and is probably receiving an increase at the secondary level under the new scheme.

Mr. Bryden: Did the meeting suggested take place?

Hon. Mr. Davis: No.

Mr. Bryden: They did not come to see the hon. Minister?

Hon. Mr. Davis: No. I think they found out just what the implications were and we did not have a gathering.

Vote 516 agreed to.

On vote 517:

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I believe that some weeks ago the Indian-Eskimo Association of Canada approached the government with regard to assistance for their rather encouraging outline of survey and study work to assist, in stages, Indians in various parts of the province. The information, when I raised this question with another department some weeks ago, was that it came under The Department of Education. I am now hoping that I can get a reply.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, this is true. It comes out of the miscellaneous grants. The request has come through to our department. We are considering it and I anticipate that we shall probably pay at least a portion. I cannot recall off hand the exact amount of the request, but I anticipate we shall meet a portion, at least, of the request.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, is the miscellaneous section at the end of this list, amounting to $125,400 designed to accommodate requests that come in after the estimates are made up?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Quite frankly, Mr. Chairman, it is designed to handle requests that come in after the estimates are made up, as well. We will have requests now from who knows what group. We may feel that they are justified in their request. This is the fund from which come these particular monies.

Mr. R. Gisborn (Wentworth East): Mr. Chairman, I would inquire of the hon. Minister and refer him to the public accounts, page 32. This is in reference to the miscellaneous grants, as directed by the hon. Minister. There was $1,000 to the Collegiate Institute of Ottawa. That is the one I am mainly interested in at this point. And there was $875 to the Canadian Legion, Waterloo branch. I understand that as set out in the estimates these grants are given under the direction of the hon. Minister for the various reasons he has just mentioned in answer to the hon. member for Brant. Would he tell me—I have a special interest in the $1,000 to the college institute at Ottawa—just what that was for?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I will get the specific information, but it has something to do with the band attending some—

An hon. member: Musical function!

Hon. Mr. Davis: No. I think actually they went outside the jurisdiction to perform. But it was something to do with either their band or their orchestra. The request came in and there was no other source—you cannot do it through regular grants to the school system—and this was paid through the miscellaneous fund to enable this group of young people to travel to some area to perform.

I cannot tell the hon. member the exact location, but I will find that out. And the Kitchener-Waterloo Legion grant, I believe, was paid for their athletic meet that was held in Kitchener-Waterloo. This was the first regional meet they had. They had been having it for several years but it was the first time actually they brought competitors, I believe, from other provinces as well. This was for the track meet that was held up in Kitchener. I was there myself but I cannot tell you whether it was last June or July.

Mr. Gisborn: Mr. Chairman, I thank the hon. Minister for his answer. I have done some research on that particular $1,000. It was for the technical school band to make a tour of Europe. There was a write-up in the Globe and Mail of January 8, 1964. How I came to refer to it was that the Saltfleet high school students have a 67-piece band and they made a tour of Europe in 1962, the same year, I believe, as the Ottawa technical school band. I am sure that both bands did a splendid job as ambassadors of goodwill in those countries. I know the Saltfleet high school band travelled for six weeks and it is recognized as one of the finest bands on the North American continent. It was highly commended by the well-known Harry Mortimer, best-known band consultant and enthusiast in Great Britain.

Why I referred to this particular $1,000 is because the Saltfleet students' band attempted to get a grant from the various departments. The press release referred to the $1,000 as coming from The Department of Travel and Publicity, so we approached that department and it knew nothing about it at all. We could not trace where the band got it. We contacted the people in Ottawa and they would not tell us or did not know where it came from. We tried to get some recognition and a donation from the Ontario Arts Council but apparently it had not established its policy as yet. It felt it would not recognize this kind of tour because of its leaving the country, and that this would likely be a federal problem and we should apply to the federal arts council.

I am pleased to get the answer and I am sure I will be approaching the hon. Minister's office to see if we cannot receive some consideration for a small grant on behalf of the Saltfleet high school students' tour of this year. They have been asked by their English friends to repeat their tour to Britain and they immediately made their plans and did their budgeting to go this year. They thought that they had reached the amount of their budget necessary, but apparently because of some changes in the international airline rates, they find now that they have a substantial deficit and they are trying to make all possible efforts to raise a little more money. So, based on the answer from the hon. Minister, I will be approaching his office to see if I cannot get something done on their behalf.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, we will be very happy to have the hon. member approach the office, although we have, as I recall, many requests for school bands and orchestras and groups to do summer activities or Easter holiday activities of this kind. I think we shall arrive at a policy very shortly, so I suggest the hon. member come soon. We may just decide that these matters perhaps should be handled more at the local level because of the many complicating factors. But if the hon. member wants to make this request very shortly, we will certainly take a look at it.

On vote 520:

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, having to do with teachers' superannuation, the difficulties associated with this fund have already been expressed on several succeeding years by the provincial auditor. The importance of the fact that the government has not taken action to set this fund up on a proper basis has been emphasized by the hon. member for Downsview (Mr. Singer) on several occasions.

But with the possibility in the next few months of the advent of a federal pension plan that will be supported by this province, I would like the hon. Minister to comment on how this would affect the present superannuation position of the teachers.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I cannot tell the hon. member. I had a meeting with the OTF. I have conveyed to the government the queries that the federation has as far as the fund is concerned but we do not know the answers as yet. I told the federation that this matter concerned the government, and that several questions had been raised in the House about the actuarial deficit. I gave it an undertaking that this matter would be very closely studied, and that it would have an opportunity to discuss it with the pension committee of the government to see how its superannuation fund may fit in.

As you know, the federation would like to consider the possibility of operating outside The Canada Pension Act, or any provincial plan. I believe the hon. members have been circularized with its brief on this matter. But we had a meeting with the executive of the OTF a few days ago, before the amendments to The Teachers' Superannuation Act were brought here to the House yesterday, and it has been told that the government is quite prepared to sit down with it and see how this can best be resolved. I cannot answer the hon. member. We do not know yet what effect the new pension legislation will have on the fund. But we do realize the position of the fund and it is quite conceivable that through the implementation of the new pension arrangements, this will be resolved within itself.

I also told the OTF when we were considering this—and it may come up, say, on second reading of The Teachers' Superannuation Act—that under this amendment, and the hon. member will be interested to know, because I believe he did raise this, that a person now with ten years' experience after age 45 will be able to participate in the teachers' superannuation fund.

This is quite a departure, Mr. Chairman, as you are aware, and I think it will at least to a degree look after the situation that the hon. member referred to with respect to these vocational teachers who come in at a more senior level. This is actually the principal amendment to The Teachers' Superannuation Act.

Whenever I am in a position, Mr. Chairman, to enlighten the House further on exactly the implications of The Pension Act on the teachers' superannuation fund and what we intend to do with it, I shall do so. But I have told the OTF that it certainly will have every opportunity to make its views known as far as any dealings with its fund is concerned.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, item 1 of vote 520 is for compassionate allowances for ex-teachers, and so on, to be paid as may be directed by the Lieutenant-Governor in council. The compassion demonstrated is something less than overwhelming. It involves a figure of $4,000, which is about one 100th of one per cent of the total amount of money that The Department of Education is asking for. I take it that it provides for grants to a quite limited number of teachers who cannot—

Hon. Mr. Davis: Who cannot qualify under—

Mr. Bryden: —who cannot qualify in one way or another and are in penurious circumstances. I certainly have no objection to the vote. I think that compassion is in order in such circumstances.

I am, however, discouraged, shall I say, by the apparent continuing lack of compassion of the government for a much larger group of people—two groups to be specific. One group is those who are represented by the Ontario Association of Superannuated Women Teachers and the other group is the widows of men who were teaching before 1949. These people are also human beings. They like to eat and to have shelter and heat in their premises and clothes to wear. Because of the way in which our superannuation system has developed many of them are living on very inadequate allowances.

These people have been before this House as long as I have been here and for years before that, I believe. During my period here they came before what used to be the committee on education, I believe, and year after year the committee on education expressed unanimous support for their point of view. It expressed great sympathy with their demands and considered them to be reasonable. I can remember one year when I moved a motion and the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Reilly) seconded the motion saying that we agreed in principle with what these people were saying and asked the government to look into it right away with a view to doing something about it. That is the last we heard of it for that year.

Similar things happened in other years. The private members, when left by themselves, were invariably impressed with the justice of the claims of these people, but never could we get the government to move. The committee would do as much as it could, which would be to recommend consideration, and it would be considered right into the wastepaper basket.

I received a letter from a Miss Laura O. Cook, dated January 22, 1964, saying that the Ontario Association of Superannuated Women Teachers was once again requesting the privilege of coming before the committee on education. I do not know if in our reorganization of the committee system they sort of got shuffled out of the picture. I do not know that they have, in fact, appeared before any committee.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Has the hon. member had any communication from this group since this letter?

Mr. Bryden: No.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Because I think I explained to the House two or three weeks ago that both Miss Cook's group from London and the widows' group have met with the committee. I think the last group was there some two and a half or three weeks ago and this committee is making a report to the treasurer, and of course it will come to me. But both these groups have met with the pension committee and I explained this to the House some months ago that this was the procedure we were following. It was suggested to the superannuated women teachers and they did make their presentation. I cannot give you the exact date, but it was some three or four weeks ago. I think I can recall telling the House this on that occasion.

Mr. Bryden: That would explain why they have not appeared before any committee of the Legislature, and frankly I do not see any point in their appearing before a committee of the Legislature. Committees of the Legislature year after year have gone as far as they can go. I do not know if going to another committee more directly involved, an administrative committee, will be of any value to them. I would merely say to the hon. Minister that this matter has been reported to death. I can hardly believe that there can be anything more to discover about it. It is simply a matter of the government making up its mind. Is it going to do anything, or is it not going to do anything? If it is not going to do anything—I hope that is not true, but if it is not—then in all fairness why does it not tell these ladies that it has a deaf ear to their pleas and plans to do nothing for them.

I would hope that it would take the more constructive position, but we do not surely need any more reports or investigations. I do not know what the pension committee has to do with it. This is a straight matter of a grant from the government, to provide some sort of pension for these people.

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, this is through The Teachers' Superannuation Act.

Mr. Bryden: I do not think it has to be through The Teachers' Superannuation Act—

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well, this is where they are getting it now. They are not getting this money under item one.

Mr. Bryden: No, I know they are not. Well, I do not care about the procedure, but the money is going to have to come from the government. It is not going to come from the contributions of the existing teachers in the field I would not think.

Hon. Mr. Davis: They are not involved, I can tell you that.

Mr. Bryden: Pardon?

Hon. Mr. Davis: The teachers' superannuation fund representatives are not enthused about this.

Mr. Bryden: I am sure they are not, but I do not really think they are involved. It is the government that is involved with these superannuated teachers and the widows of certain teachers. They are the people who are involved. When we looked into this matter a couple of years ago, it appeared to me that an expenditure of about a million dollars—just a straight payment to them, through what machinery is immaterial so far as I am concerned—would meet all of the demands they made and would pay them the supplements they asked for. Of course, this amount will decline year by year because these people are like all the rest of us. They are mortal and most of them have now reached fairly advanced years. The mortality rate among them is high, so that to grant all of their demands would as far as I can see, cost the government about a million dollars and I am not talking about the superannuation fund, I am saying the government—a straight subsidy would cost about a million dollars in the first year and that would decline year by year.

I have no doubt that in ten years it would not cost the government anything. The account would be completely wound up. Well now, why cannot we do that? A million dollars is a million dollars admittedly, but there is also a matter of real hardship involved. I think that I speak for most of the private members when I say that we would have sufficient compassion to see a million dollars worth of the funds of this province made available to these people. I just cannot understand why the government is so lacking in compassion that for years it has done nothing but give these people the run-around. The letter from Miss Cook says that "every year for the past eight years, members of this association have brought this problem to the attention of the government. For the past three years, the committee on education has given our request unanimous support and has recommended that action be taken by the government but postponement has followed postponement."

So now they go to another committee. I do not know if the other committee will be sympathetic to them, but I think the views of this House are quite well known.

Hon. Mr. Davis: The hon. member must be also aware of this. As far as I am concerned, I meet with these ladies. I see them far more regularly than the hon. member and I think we are all sympathetic to them. But certainly with the one group at least, it does involve certain considerations of the public service or the civil service fund as well, because they are asking for, if you check their brief carefully, perhaps minimums that would exceed some of those presently within the civil service. This is why they met with this committee to determine what circumstances might be considered as on a par with the existing public service fund and this is the report we anticipate we will have very shortly.

Mr. Bryden: Well, then, are you going to do something?

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): No, Mr. Chairman, I cannot let this occasion pass without adding a word to the situation. The other evening I was complimenting the hon. Minister on having, in at least one aspect, carried his views as a private member into the Cabinet and acting on them. I can recall the hon. Minister in days gone by, being present at meetings of superannuated teachers as a private member and expressing quite—

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, Mr. Chairman, I want to make this very clear. During my first two years here—and I cannot give the reason and I must apologize—but I was not at the education committee when these ladies appeared. I did meet them last year of course as Minister when they appeared before the education committee. Now the hon. member is quite free to suggest that maybe we should be doing more, but I want to make it very clear that, as a private member, I never made any statements in the committee on education, with respect to the superannuated women teachers, because I was not there. This matter was brought to my attention last year by one of the ladies who happens to live in my riding and she said, "My, I am pleased to see you here. You were not with us the last two years."

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister has been referring to the enthusiasm of the Ontario Teachers' Federation with regard to certain possible changes in this pension plan, and his reference was to the fact that they did not favour the making available of certain funds for the support of the two groups that are presently under discussion. I cannot for the life of me see why they should express an opinion on this at all. The responsibility, surely is with the government to look after a case of stated need.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I would think, Mr. Chairman, that if this were to be paid, for the sake of argument, out of the fund, I certainly would want at least to contact the teachers' federation to get their views on what payments are made out of the fund when they are one of the chief contributors.

Mr. Nixon: That is very true, and I am sure that the hon. Minister is aware of the fact that the OTF is in no way enthusiastic about the province taking part in a federal pension plan. They stated this publicly and their reasons were that in their view the federal authority was incompetent of administering this fund and it demonstrated this in the use of the unemployment insurance fund during the past eight or ten years. I thought that they really stepped over the boundary of their jurisdiction in stating this, but I suppose they have the freedom to this opinion if they so desire. I would be very interested in what they said to the hon. Minister with respect to the provision of a special pension for those with only ten years' experience, for example.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well, Mr. Chairman, I want to be fair and I do not want to be inaccurately quoted, but I think they were sympathetic to this provided that there was some consideration given to what this would do to the actuarial deficit. I think this was their prime concern. I do not think really they opposed this as a matter of principle.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I did want to pursue this. Undoubtedly my memory is faulty, but I thought I had recalled the hon. Minister as a private member being in this Chamber one day when that committee was sitting and making those remarks.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I was not even there.

Mr. Singer: However, his memory on this is probably better than mine and I accept him at his word. The fact remains that I do not think it is so complicated a matter to help out these people if the government wants to help them. It does not necessarily involve at all the upsetting of whatever balance you have, and the auditor has some doubts as to whether there is a balance or not in this teachers' superannuation fund. If you want to do it, and if you feel that these ladies have been inequitably treated, and I think we all agree that they have been, then I suggest that you can do it.

As the hon. member for Woodbine pointed out, this is a programme you are only going to have to wrestle with for a few years, because all these ladies will have vanished from the scene. I think in the cause of equity, justice and good commonsense the OTF will be out looking for excuses not to do it. If you made up your minds you wanted to do it you could do it and do it very quickly with the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I wanted to shift the ground a bit to the proposition that this is the government's responsibility. I agree that it is the government's responsibility. Obviously you can confer with the Ontario Teachers' Federation, but the proposition that the Ontario Teachers' Federation should be opposing this and that the government—

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I did not say that. One of the hon. members, I believe it was the hon. member for Woodbine, wondered what the attitude might be. The decision of the government as far as these two groups of women are concerned will not be based on the views of the OTF. I think in fairness that the OTF would not want to take any real position on this. I happen to know it is not enthused about anything that is going to affect the actuarial position of the fund, and this would affect it. The hon. member observed that if anything is done, it might be that it would be done outside this, and I want to be quite fair to the OTF.

Mr. MacDonald: I just wanted to make the point that it seems to me that many changes have been made—as related in the letter that I, too, got a month or so back—with regard to payments made out of the fund. For example, there were the payments to widows, which must have upset the actuarial basis of the fund to some extent. I am suggesting one more change now, to meet a need that is so obvious; a need that would seem to me should be met by a group that has any compassion.

I want to join with the hon. member for Brant in saying that I think the Ontario Teachers' Federation might examine with some care the public image it is going to create if it takes a firm stand on an issue like this or if it takes the kind of stand beyond its jurisdiction that it did—by jumping very readily into the picture against a national pension plan that would provide pensions for everybody, because it might affect the teachers'. There is a manifestation of selfishness, that "we are going to guard ours no matter what happens to the rest of the community" which in the long run is not going to be in the interests of the teachers.

On vote 518:

Mr. E. P. Morningstar (Welland): Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a few remarks about our university, which I am sure the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Bukator) would be interested in.

I rise on this occasion to recall one of the most pleasant duties it has been my privilege to be associated with since becoming a member of the Legislature. The members of this House know that the establishment of Brock University in the Niagara peninsula is one of the most important events that has occurred in the peninsula in the last century, and it was my honour to be able to sponsor the bill known as An Act to incorporate Brock University on behalf of the people who reside in the area.

I would like to remind the members that some unique features were evident as the grass roots interest in, and repeated requests for, the establishment of an institution of higher education spread throughout the peninsula. The first official action was taken by the Allanburg Women's Institute on February 6, 1957, when they requested by resolution that "the provincial government favourably consider the placing of a university in the Niagara peninsula."

This resolution was sustained by the Welland District Women's Institute annual meeting in May, the Hamilton Area Women's Institute convention in October, the Federated Women's Institutes of Ontario in November and presented to the late hon. W. J. Dunlop, then Minister of Education for Ontario, by myself on behalf of the Women's Institutes. The time was not yet ripe and the policy of the day was stated in the reply of the Minister when he wrote "that we should not proceed with the establishment of colleges at the present time but should provide, as far as possible and desirable, more buildings for the existing universities."

The next official action was taken by the Welland county council on November 19, 1957 when at its regular session it requested the provincial and federal governments to:

1. Sharply expand the facilities for training technicians and university students;
2. Abolish university fees and make it possible for all deserving students to obtain a university or higher technical education regardless of the financial status of their parents or guardians; and
3. Establish a higher institution of learning in a central location in the Niagara peninsula.

At the session on January 23, 1958, the Welland county council further requested "that the education committee take further steps toward encouraging the establishment of a university or higher technical school located centrally in the Niagara peninsula. Such steps to include preparation and presentation of briefs."

The members of the Welland county committee felt very strongly that the project should be proceeded with as a peninsula project and extended invitations to representatives of the women's institutes, the Lincoln county council and the councils of the separated cities of Niagara Falls, St. Catharines and Welland to appoint members to a joint committee to carry the project forward. This later led to the establishment of the Niagara Peninsula Joint Committee on Higher Education which held its first meeting October 2, 1958 with its membership constituted as follows: women's institutes, one; Lincoln county council, two; Welland county council, two; the councils of the cities of Niagara Falls, St. Catharines and Welland, one each—this was increased to two each after merger had occurred in the three cities.

The committee met with the hon. Messrs. W. J. Dunlop and J. P. Robarts, as Ministers of Education, the presidents of several Ontario universities, studied population and school population trends and the destination of students at the post-secondary level. Several reports were published on the findings and some of the data found its way into the report of the presidents of the universities of Ontario to the advisory committee on university affairs, entitled "Post-Secondary Education in Ontario 1962-1970" published May, 1962 and revised January, 1963.

The Niagara Peninsula Joint Committee on Higher Education had recommended the establishment of a citizens' committee selected from names of outstanding community-minded people submitted by the various councils. The new citizens' committee met on July 11, 1962 and chose an executive with power to add to its numbers. Eight days later a delegation met with the advisory committee on university affairs. The advisory committee gave strong encouragement to the delegation indicating that the Niagara peninsula was perhaps the most critical area in Ontario that would next need university facilities. The first significant decision was the selection of Brock University as the name of the fledgling institution. It met with universal endorsement and the group became known as Brock University Founders' Committee. By means of letters patent granted by Her Majesty the Queen in the right of Ontario, Brock University became incorporated October 31, 1962.

Another unique feature that indicated the broad base of acceptance of Brock University by the people of the Niagara peninsula was the method of raising the funds required for the organization and development activities. A solicitation dinner was held on November 22, 1962 at which representatives of the municipalities and the larger industries of Lincoln and Welland counties were asked to share, on a 50-50 basis, an $80,000 budget.

With the industries contributing on the basis of $2 per employee and every municipality contributing on the basis of 14 cents per capita, the sum of $82,833.84 had been raised by June 30, 1963. On May 14, 1963 the choice of the DeCew Falls site located in that part of Lincoln county, formerly Grantham township, now part of the city of St. Catharines, and in that part of Welland county contiguous to the above and being in the township of Thorold, was announced by the late Dr. Arthur A. Schmon, chairman of Brock University Founders' Committee. Phase one consists of 325 acres and phase two containing an additional 200 acres will be incorporated later. The city of St. Catharines has made a grant of $400,000 towards the purchase of the site and will provide the services.

Twenty-nine sites in all had been studied, six of them presented on behalf of municipalities or groups of municipalities. Fort Erie-Bertie township, Niagara Falls and Welland had all offered to purchase a site and provide the services necessary. The St. Catharines, Niagara-on-the-Lake and Thorold township offers varied. Although disappointment was expressed by the unsuccessful municipalities, continued support for Brock University as an area project was pledged by all on the site which straddles the boundaries of Lincoln and Welland counties. On June 4, 1963, the hon. Leslie M. Frost, QC, and the members of the advisory committee on university affairs visited the site and later that evening, at a Brock University founders' dinner in Niagara Falls, Premier John Robarts announced the appropriation of grants totalling $393,000 to the university for the fiscal year July 1, 1963 to June 30, 1964.

Later in the year, Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister of Education announced the approval of grants that would provide the necessary funds for the purchase, renovation and equipping of the lands and buildings of the former Frozenaire Cooler Co. Ltd. as temporary accommodation for up to 500 Brock University students. This is significant because it will provide accommodation at a cost of $1,500 per student compared with an average of $7,000 to $7,500 for new construction. Every effort is now being made by the board and staff of Brock University to provide for a scheduled registering of 150 students in September, 1965, and to provide for a significant proportion of the 6,000 students who will be attending universities from the Niagara peninsula by 1970.

The current and future budgets are now under discussion with the advisory committee on university affairs and it is the opinion of those associated with Brock University that mutually satisfactory arrangements in this regard will be agreed upon that will permit Brock University to progress through the following three-phase evolution envisaged by Dr. James A. Gibson, president, and the members of the founders' committee:

Phase 1: three consecutive years in arts, followed by a fourth (Honours) year in selected areas.

Phase 2: a graduate studies programme to be undertaken in conjunction with other neighbouring universities—to avoid duplication of research areas and research facilities—only after the undergraduate programme is firmly established.

Phase 3: the establishment of professional schools, e.g., architecture, medicine, social work, and an institute of land use and conservation.

In conclusion may I state that the next step in the establishment of Brock University as a degree-granting institution is the provision of a statutory charter which is the purpose of this Act to incorporate Brock University.

When we recall that:

1. The Women's Institute in Allanburg initiated the move to establish a university, in February 1957;

2. The Welland county council took its first action to further the project on November 19, 1957, and later invited representatives of the Women's Institutes and the councils of Lincoln County and the cities of Niagara Falls, St. Catharines and Welland to participate;

3. The Niagara Peninsula Joint Committee on Higher Education, consisting of representatives of the above groups, worked unceasingly in providing the research necessary to prove the need for a university and gain support for it;

4. A citizens' committee was established on July 11, 1963, which became the Brock University Founders' Committee and carried the area project forward;

5. The name Brock University has received universal endorsement;

6. The municipalities and industries raised $82,000 for organizational and development funds;

7. That a site was chosen that is situated partially in Lincoln County and partially in Welland County, that has met with approval, and to which the city of St. Catharines contributed a grant of $400,000; and

8. The provincial government approved appropriations of $393,000 for the fiscal year 1963-64; it is evident that the movement to establish Brock University was a grass roots movement and has received support and endorsement at all levels including the encouraging support of the advisory committee on university affairs.

I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that without the enthusiastic and wholehearted support of our hon. Prime Minister it would not have been possible for this great project to have come about. And further, Mr. Chairman, it is the support of the hon. Prime Minister which has made it possible for Brock University to advance its starting date by one year. The original schedule was to commence with enrollment of 100 students in September 1965. I am now happy to be able to report that Brock University will be able to start with 100 students this coming September. The credit for this earlier start must go to our government, the people's government, the government of all the people, which made it financially possible for the university to acquire a temporary building and thus establish Glen Ridge campus, immediately below the main campus which will be in operation in time for the start of the 1964-65 university year. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. G. Bukator (Niagara Falls): Mr. Chairman—

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to interrupt the hon. member—does he want to make some remarks about Brock?

Mr. Bukator: I want to follow up on Brock.

Mr. MacDonald: Let us get it in the papers before the weekend.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Yes, all right.

Mr. Bukator: I doubt very much, Mr. Chairman, whether the press will publish anything I say, but I would like hon. members of the Legislature to know that I sat in county council when that first group met with the county of Welland to discuss this project, this university, and I might say that this is one project that we did not consider on party lines at all. I recall that one of the most active workers on that committee was Melvin Swart, and the only fault I could find with him was that he was a member of the New Democratic Party, and he is still active in that particular project.

Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Welland pressed this thing from the Conservative side and I did not hear anybody in the Liberal group object to it. I feel that I should say this for them. There was splendid co-operation among all people and they did an excellent job.

I recall when this first came about in the county of Welland. I did not believe that it would progress as quickly as it did. Much more quickly I might say, Mr. Chairman, than the superannuated teachers when they came to us three years ago, when we were all unanimous, I thought, that in a matter of months they would get a little bit more by way of pension. But here was a project that looked as though it was insurmountable and yet with the co-operation of the people of that area—I might find a little bit more fault with it since I come from Niagara Falls; we had a site as good, almost, in Niagara Falls but it was good that the people at that time thought that DeCew Falls of Lincoln county and Welland county were sharing this particular honour and doing this job was a wonderful thing. I might say that some two or three years ago the hon. member for Welland discussed the teachers' college you were going to build in Lincoln county. Since that time we have talked about the possibility of bringing that teachers' college into the area of your college now near Brock University. You purchased the land quite some time ago, when you, Mr. Prime Minister, were the Minister of Education.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Before me!

Mr. Bukator: Before the hon. Prime Minister, yes. I believe that this would be worth looking into. I do believe that land could be resold and you could bring the teachers' college establishment closer to the Brock.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I mentioned to the House either yesterday or the day before that this is exactly what we are now exploring. We have already had some negotiations with Brock University to locate the new teachers' college in that area upon the Brock campus.

Mr. Bukator: This has been a rather trying time for the hon. Minister—the last two or three days of discussions. I naturally did not sit throughout the whole debate or discussions, but I think you are on the right track. Maybe someone has persuaded you to come to the right area with your teachers' college. At that time the city of Welland would have given you land for nothing, so you would have been that much ahead of the game. But I would like to add to what has already been said by the hon. member for Welland. As he outlined the history or related the history to us, I recalled every step of the way. I think this is definitely a step in the right direction and I hope there is more to come.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I discussed this matter with the educational experts on the other side of the House, at which time it was agreed that we would take the departmental estimates proper. We have completed these now, and the estimates concerning the universities are included, I think for obvious reasons, up to this point under the departmental estimates. I would assume that in the future they will come under the new Department of University Affairs. I want to explain to the House that the estimates as set out here are the results of the work of the advisory committee on university affairs and that these were presented to the government and were accepted by the government, both last year and, of course, this year as well.

It was also suggested to the hon. members with whom I discussed this that we could debate throughout this general discussion, the principles of the bill to establish The Department of University Affairs and also, of course, the Crown corporation. I thought I would lead off—and I shall have more to say, and I am sure the hon. Prime Minister will and others on this whole question—with a few general remarks and then of course the hon. members opposite will be able to make their contribution.

We arranged some few days ago to have the report of the advisory committee on university affairs available to the hon. members of the House for the purpose of this debate. This report gives a comprehensive review of the work of the committee, but also indicates that the recommendations made to the government had been implemented in almost every respect. I commend the report to the hon. members of the House and trust that each member will examine it in some detail.

Insofar as financial support to our institutions of higher learning is concerned, it is worth noting that the operating grants for 1964-65 in the amount of $46,621,000 represent an increase of $11,308,000. This increase alone is 1.5 times the total operating grants for all our universities just ten years ago. In the provision of capital funds to be made available, the figure of $54,675,000 represents an increase this year of almost $20 million, and this increase is just under the total grant only two years ago. The total sum to be provided by the government in 1964-65 is $101,296,000. The increase of $31 million this year represents a rise of 44 per cent over the grants for 1963-64.

I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, I need point out to the hon. members of the House the necessity to see that these funds are spent wisely and that full value is secured for the monies that are expended. This is a commitment that I believe every hon. member will want to have, and I believe it is only on such assurance that our people will be willing to support higher education in this province to the extent that I believe is required if the problems we face are to be met and to be resolved.

While I have no intention of going over the ground covered in the report of the advisory committee, I believe it would be useful to cite just some examples to show the essential programmes and how they are moving forward, and that they are meeting, in fact, with success.

First, I should like to refer to the Ontario graduate fellowship programme in the humanities and social sciences. Last year $1.5 million was included in the estimates for this project. The number of awards was slightly in excess of 800. This means that one quarter of all the graduate students in our universities were recipients of these awards. Many other students receive awards from other agencies and from the scholarship, bursary and loan funds of the universities themselves. For the summer of 1964 some 900 awards have been made. These have just been announced, as the hon. members are aware, along with 1,200 awards for the academic session 1964-65.

I think it is quite fair to say, Mr. Chairman, this programme has been a tremendous success. It gives every promise of making a most significant contribution to the provision of university teachers to meet the demands in the years ahead. Inquiries about the programme have been received from a great many other jurisdictions in Canada and throughout the world.

During the current academic session 4,165 graduate students are enrolled in our provincially assisted universities. The universities indicate that the maximum number which can be accommodated in 1964-65 is 5,733, an increase of 1,568 or 37 per cent in one year alone. The special grants paid to the universities for the expanded graduate programmes have enabled our well-established institutions to realize this essential expansion.

In the area of the provision of accommodation I can report that the anticipated number of first-year students seeking admission to our provincially assisted universities in September, 1964, will be approximately 11,650. I want to emphasize, Mr. Chairman, these are approximate figures. They come from the universities, and of course there will be some degree of flexibility. This represents about 45 per cent of the student body enrolled in Grade 13 in September, 1963. A survey of the universities indicates that they will have accommodation for approximately 12,700 first-year students, or potentially 1,050 places in excess of what the demand is estimated to be.

I should point out that these are cumulative figures for the whole province and that a student who wishes to go to a particular university may have to attend an institution other than the one of his first choice. Nevertheless, any student who can meet the admission requirements should be able to find a place with an institution of higher learning this year.

A second point to be made here is that because of the number of students who submit several applications for admission to different universities, the usual artificial shortage of space is likely to occur during June and July. When all applications submitted to all the universities are added together the figure is quite obviously somewhat misleading. Experience has shown that the anticipated figure in total for 1964-65 is likely to be close to the actual demand for places.

Reference should also be made to the total enrolment expected since the figures I have just given you are for the first-year students. In September, 1964, it is anticipated that the total number of students in the provincially assisted universities will be about 38,100. This figure does not include enrolments at OCE, students in pre-admission courses, or students in technology courses at the Lakehead College. The maximum accommodation available could provide for approximately 40,750 students or 2,650 perhaps more than predicted. I stress that the latter two figures are maximum figures and that it would be desirable if the actual enrolment did not exceed 39,500, which would still provide for approximately 1,400 more than is presently expected.

It is also interesting to note that our universities have expanded at the rates they set themselves two years ago and that several of them will attain in 1964 the goals they originally set themselves for 1965.

During the year, substantial progress has been made in the development of the newer institutions. Trent University will open in September of this year with a class of roughly 100 students. It will begin operation in quarters in downtown Peterborough, which it has purchased with funds provided by the province. Plans are proceeding for the first buildings on the new campus and it is expected that facilities at both locations will be utilized for some time.

Brock University, as the hon. member for Welland and the hon. member for Niagara Falls pointed out, has made remarkable progress in this past year.

Originally, Mr. Chairman, it was expected that the university would accept its first class in September, 1965. The purchase and renovation of a building on what is known as the Glen Ridge campus, adjoining the main site, has permitted the institution to move its plans forward so that it too will begin operation with 100 students in September of this year. The provision of funds by the Legislature for the securing of temporary accommodation has made it possible for the university to purchase the space necessary to permit the earlier opening of Brock. Planning consultants have been working on a design for the main campus at Brock and this work is now well advanced.

It is, of course, essential to the long-term development of a new institution that it proceed on the best possible advice available to it. The board of governors and the administration at Brock are fully aware of this necessity and are illustrating once again the importance of strong local interest and initiative in the development of a new institution.

As you are aware, the University of Guelph is now ready with the passing of this bill, to proceed with the development of its expanded campus. Some preliminary discussions on the nature of the planning to be undertaken have already been held so that as soon as the new board of governors is organized, it can proceed with its work without any delay.

York University has completed development of its Bayview campus and is now hard at work on the main campus in North York. A large complex of buildings is to be erected between now and September, 1965, when several of these buildings will be ready to receive students.

Scarborough College has been fully planned and will take its first 500 students in September of 1965. And I can recall the hon. member for York South, perhaps, having some doubts as to whether this date might be met.

Mr. MacDonald: Not so much that as at Erindale; now what about it?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Erindale College is also being developed and I think the hon. member will note that there are monies provided in the estimates. It will be expected to open in September, 1966, with extension students in 1965. I have referred specifically to the newest institutions but the established universities have also been expanding at unprecedented rates. Their well developed organizations have made it possible for them to proceed to the point where it is possible to provide the accommodation to which I referred earlier. They are, Mr. Chairman, I believe, to be strongly commended for their acceptance of the responsibility to see that capable students have the opportunity to secure the best education available anywhere.

One other reference has to do with the Ontario new universities library project. This project is unique in that it provides for the co-operation of five new institutions in the development of a basic library for each. Under the plan, the University of Toronto has undertaken to select, purchase, index, catalogue and deliver to each of the five some 35,000 volumes between now and June 30, 1967, when the project will be completed. This will permit the new institutions to develop their library facilities and to engage staff in an orderly manner and without some of the pressures which would otherwise prevail.

During the past year, the University of Waterloo was assisted by a special grant of $25,000 to conduct a detailed study into the possibility of expanding its co-operative engineering programme into the areas of the humanities and social sciences. As a result, the university has decided to establish a new course in mathematics for actuaries and other workers in this field. A special sum to permit this programme to proceed is included in the operating grants for this year. Response to this extension of the co-operative plan has been excellent and more than 100 applications have been received for admission to this particular course.

Mr. Chairman, while I have not tried to cover all developments in the areas where the government is directly involved in higher education, I think the highlights that I have described here would be of some particular interest to the hon. members of House. The matters of the principle of the bill, the principle of the corporation, Mr. Chairman—I shall have remarks, as others will, at some other stage, but I suggest that this would be the opportunity for the hon. members opposite to make some general observations on the grants recommended to this government by the advisory committee to the universities of the province of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Chairman, we will continue this discussion another time.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves that the committee of supply rise and report progress and ask for leave to sit again.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the hon. Minister of Education might indicate if copies of that are available so we could have the most up-to-date information when we come to it.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I shall have copies of this available for the hon. members first thing Monday morning.

Mr. MacDonald: That is not going to help me over the weekend.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well, I might even make an effort to get this to the hon. member so that he can peruse it over the weekend, and to the hon. member for Brant as well.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report it has come to certain resolutions and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on Monday we will continue with these estimates and then it will be my attempt, when we have completed this discussion on universities, to move second reading of the university bills that are on the order paper, so that the discussion can take place one place or the other.

We will have a night session Monday night and a night session Tuesday night. We will meet at three o'clock on Monday afternoon and I believe there are some presentations here on Tuesday, so we will have a motion on Monday to postpone the sitting until three on Tuesday, so these presentations can take place at two o'clock.

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Leader of the Opposition): Can we assume that the estimates of The Department of the Attorney General will not be up on Monday?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, I do not think you can make any such assumption.

Mr. Oliver: Well, I want to know.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: It is the next estimate to come up. We are going to complete the estimates of this department, we are going to sit in the afternoon and the evening and if we clear up the work as indicated, the next item will be the estimates of the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Wishart). They may be reached on Monday, but I am unable to say how long the Opposition is going to talk on these estimates.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Are there going to be Wednesday and Thursday evening sittings?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: May I leave that until later in the week? We will sit Monday and Tuesday and I will tell the hon. member later. But there is a possibility that we shall sit both Wednesday and Thursday because I believe the committee work will then be completed.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 1.05 o'clock, p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

MONDAY, MAY 4, 1964

The House met at 3 o'clock, p.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: We welcome to the Legislature today, in the west gallery, students from Lynedoch Public School and Vittoria Public School; and in the Speaker's gallery, a group of tour operators from the United Kingdom, France and Western Germany.

Presenting petitions.

Presenting reports by committees.

Mr. D. A. Evans (Simcoe Centre) from the standing committee on labour, legal and municipal bills, presented the committee's ninth report which was read as follows and adopted:

Your committee begs to report the following bills without amendment:

Bill No. 73, An Act to amend The Conveyancing and Law of Property Act.

Bill No. 142, An Act to amend The Labour Relations Act.

Your committee begs to report the following bills with certain amendments:

Bill No. 72, An Act to amend the Credit Unions Act.

Bill No. 103, An Act to amend The Collection Agencies Act.

Bill No. 132, An Act to amend The Planning Act.

Mr. Speaker: Motions.

Introduction of bills.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I would like to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management (Mr. Simonett), notice of which I have given to him, as follows:

In view of the explosion today of a propane gas tank in a house under construction in Scarborough, which is reported to have resulted in serious injury to two workmen, what steps does The Department of Energy and Resources Management plan to take to improve its regulations and the enforcement thereof to prevent such occurrences in the future?

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for giving notice of the question.

The hon. member refers to an incident which occurred at 40 Greenbrae Crescent, Scarborough at 8.05 this morning. Preliminary investigation indicates that a salamander heater that is not listed with Canadian Gas Association was being fired with liquefied propane gas. Two workmen were seriously injured. They are presently being treated at Scarborough Hospital. The property damage is estimated at $10,000. This installation appears to violate subsection two of section seven of The Energy Act. Further investigation will determine whether charges will be laid and against whom.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to appear to be picking on the same hon. Minister, but my question is addressed to him also.

Is the hon. Minister aware that the Upper Thames River Conservation Authority has refused to meet with a committee of the property owners regarding acceptance of offers for the property required to construct the Gordon Pittcock dam? If so, will the hon. Minister intervene to restore negotiations?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Speaker, I again would wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question.

The answer is yes, I understand that the Thames River Conservation Authority has broken off negotiations with the committee of property owners, but the executive committee feels that, for the best results, they will negotiate only with the individual property owners concerned.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The twelfth order. House in committee of supply. Mr. W. G. Noden in the chair.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): It is my privilege at this time, Mr. Chairman, to present to the House the 1964-65 estimates for The Department of the Attorney General. In the short interval during which I have had the responsibility for this respected portfolio there have been many matters which have demanded my attention. Prominent among these have been the estimates which I will shortly place before you.

It would be presumptuous for me to suggest that in the past few weeks I have completely mastered all phases of the department's operations. However, Mr. Chairman, I do most earnestly assure this House that insofar as my modest abilities will permit, I have endeavoured to prepare myself and these estimates so that full and complete information may be available to all of the hon. members.

This information is due to the House and I would offer it nothing less. You will note, Mr. Chairman, that the form of the estimates differs substantially from that which they took last year.

The ten votes, that is numbers 201 to 210, inclusive, which will demand your scrutiny, now represent the divisions of the department and include the Ontario provincial police. These votes are then broken down into the individual items which represent the operating expenditures proposed for these divisions.

It is my hope, Mr. Chairman, that this revised form will not only permit of a clearer and easier understanding of the department, but also that it will assist the hon. members in following a brief description of the organization of the department, which I think may be of interest to you.

I have recently had the distinct privilege, Mr. Chairman, of realizing just how numerous and varied the duties of the Attorney General are in this vigorous and expanding province of Ontario. The historical duties of law enforcement and the administration of justice have become furnished with various responsibilities that reflect the social progress of our country.

Thus, I bring before this House, our respectful request for the financial support and I will maintain such varied public services as fire protection, securities protection, probation officers, laboratory sciences, together with many other services that operate continually to ensure the protection which now accompanies the administration of justice and law enforcement.

The hon. members recognize, even better than I, perhaps, that the function of the department is to serve this House, the courts and the public. In providing legal opinions for the departments of government and in representing the Crown before our courts, the necessary counsel must be our servants. In the administration of the court officers and those of the Crown attorneys we must carry out that responsibility to the courts which is placed upon the province by the constitution.

I would note that the creation of the office of Chief Magistrate as set out in The Magistrates Amendment Act of 1964, indicates the approach that must be taken between the judiciary and the administration of justice, to ensure that justice may flourish in the modern environment so as to best serve our rapidly growing populace.

The service to the public—which is one of our greatest concerns—must be axiomatic if we are to truly serve the courts and this House. For in each of these forums do we find the democracy which is the people.

Through the co-ordination and supervision of police, fire and emergency measures services, we find the practical field of public order and safety upon which we all rely for the maintenance of our personal safety.

In order that these many responsibilities may be adequately provided, divisions have been established within the department which bring together those functions which have a similar purpose and staff engaged in a common service. In this way the legal officers and other specialists may realize their widest potential, while at the same time ensuring a uniform approach and policy in the particular field of endeavour. Such an organization also permits the consolidation in one area of all those services which have hitherto required duplication of staff and equipment.

A brief analysis of these divisions, as set out in the estimates, will demonstrate to hon. members our intention to work toward that system which will best serve the interests of our people. In drawing this reorganization to your attention, I must say that it is one of several new conceptions which were introduced by my predecessor, the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas (Mr. Cass). I am indebted to him for having started this and many other creditable things which I hope I will be permitted to carry through to a successful conclusion.

I would not suggest, Mr. Chairman, that any proposed organization would be perfect but I am certain you will agree with me that methods must be undertaken which will permit us most effectively to fulfill our responsibilities.

In the course of presenting the estimates, I hope that I may be able to answer any questions that may be raised, but if I must, in the interest of accuracy, undertake to provide an answer at a later date, perhaps the hon. members will grant me that indulgence.

With these remarks, Mr. Chairman, may I invite this House to review the 1964-65 estimates of The Department of the Attorney General?

On vote 201:

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Chairman, the introduction of the estimates of the hon. Attorney General is a little out of context this afternoon. Perhaps it is somewhat in line with the confusion that has existed on the government benches in so far as the role of The Attorney General's Department is concerned.

I do not attach any particular condemnation to the present holder of that office. He was called on in an emergency to take over, and from his performance since he has been assigned that portfolio, I find him a reasonable man who is trying, under very serious handicap, to do the best job he is able.

Some of us have had the opportunity to listen to his views in committee. He comes to the various committees with good will and with an effort to convince us that the government is taking reasonable steps to overcome some of the serious errors that it had embarked upon not too many weeks ago. But some of the things that are being done, perhaps in the name of expediency, cause one to wonder whether or not the government should have paused another week or two before bringing in these new bills and before allowing to be made some of the statements that were made.

For instance, this morning, when a series of bills came before the labour, legal and some other—municipal—committee it was difficult enough as a member of the Opposition to reasonably arm oneself with the ammunition to cope with some six bills, four of which had never been seen by members of the Opposition in the amended form. We knew we had to proceed with them, but in addition to that, the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Rowntree) came along and he got a bill in, too.

I do not know that there was anything wrong with the bill that the hon. Minister of Labour brought in, or with the consideration that the committee gave to it, but I do know as one member of the Opposition, and as a lawyer, I found it a most awesome and difficult task to be there this morning and to deal with The Collection Agencies Act in the substantially amended form in which it was brought before us.

We know full well, Mr. Chairman, that the contents of that bill, together with The Police Act and three other Acts, have been the subject of very much criticism and much self-analysis on the part of government. We also know that the government has available to it not only the intelligence of the hon. Attorney General, but the intelligence and abilities of all his legal advisers. They were able to draft and redraft sections and to come forward with expositions on the legal significance of these matters and were prepared, no doubt, to answer all of the questions that we in the Opposition might have raised.

An issue was made earlier in the session to the referral to committee of these bills without debate in the House on second reading. It is my submission that the ruling made at that time was a wrong one, and that the precedents quoted were not in fact applicable; and that those bills had no right to be referred to the committee until there had been a full and proper debate on second reading. There should have been unanimous consent of the House to this unusual procedure. Had it been made clear, or had there been an opportunity given to carefully examine this, I am sure that the traditional rights of the House would have been upheld and that the second reading would have taken place.

But in fact, Mr. Chairman, what happened was this: the procedures were set aside in an effort to allow the government to save face. We went into committee and were presented with a reprinted bill. I complimented the hon. Attorney General this morning for at least bringing the new text before us in a form that we were able to hold in our hands. But certainly it is beyond the capacity at least of myself, and I would suggest most of the other hon. members of the committee who were there this morning, to properly understand or comprehend or analyze the sections in a bill as complicated as that in the space of a few hours.

We did not have the advantage of seeing the printed text of these bills several days in advance, as is the usual custom. The usual custom makes all the more sense as we could see this morning when we got into such serious difficulty. Not having the advantage that the government always has of having its legal advisers there to tell the hon. Attorney General what the significance of a particular word or a particular phrase is, I suggest that the government in its panic to correct its error has ridden roughshod over the normal procedures of this Legislature. These procedures were set there for just these very purposes, to protect the members of the Opposition and to protect members of the public so that they could reasonably analyze and criticize government provisions.

These safeguards were thrown aside this morning. I sincerely hope that no real error was made—

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): I really cannot accept that. The procedure was decided upon and—

Mr. Singer: With great respect, unless the hon. Prime Minister is rising on a point of order—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I do rise to speak to a point of order. These bills will come back to this House. They will be debated here in exactly the same manner every other piece of legislation that goes through this House is debated. They were sent down so that hon. members could see them. If hon. members do not have time, I shall leave them on the order paper as long as they may wish them to be there before the debates are called so that hon. members may completely understand them.

Mr. Singer: Well, the hon. Prime Minister may not care to—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: May I make a point, Mr. Chairman? I would accept, in large part, the statements of the hon. member for Downsview that it is very difficult for hon. members to find a bill largely amended, not having seen it before they come to consider it for the first time. This, I think we may say, is something perhaps not likely to recur. But I would say this, that we only found time this morning—perhaps that was fortuitous to consider one of those reprinted bills.

My hon. friend will realize and recall that when it was asked we adjourn I was quite happy to accept the adjournment so that three of those bills will be in your hands until at least tomorrow for study. While I accept to some extent what the hon. member has said, he has not altogether been denied the opportunity of giving at least three of them very thorough study for a day.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I accept both points of order if you can call them that.

But the fact remains, in answer first to the remarks of the hon. Prime Minister, once the bill has been considered clause by clause in the committee it is just an exercise in futility to come back here into the House and debate the so-called principle, because the principle has already been decided in committee. The committee has considered and voted upon each individual section. To suggest in any seriousness that the bill can be brought back after each section has been decided upon and then debate it in principle, is just an exercise in frustration.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: These bills will come back and be debated here. That bill will have to go through the committee of the whole House. It will be considered by this House sitting in the committee stage clause by clause, as is every other bill and some principles of those bills are argued right down to where people have views opposite those of the government, those clauses are argued and those points of view are very often put in the committee stage, and sometimes even argued on the third reading. So that I just cannot see how my hon. friend was cut off.

Mr. Singer: The hon. Prime Minister does not understand the point I am making, or else he is prepared to discard out of hand the whole principle of second reading. I am suggesting to him, and I think it is a very simple hypothesis, that these traditions of parliamentary procedure have been established over the years, and they follow one after the other, as night follows day. We have the first reading, which is the introduction of the bill; the second reading, which is the debate in principle. Now the government has seen fit to short-circuit the second reading procedure and to discard, in effect, the debate in principle. I suggest to hon. members that by having done that, then getting the bill into committee and doing it clause by clause, the principle has been decided in little pieces down in the committee and the debate back in the House on principle is of no meaning whatsoever.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: This was all done by unanimous consent.

Mr. Singer: Well, Mr. Chairman, I was not in the House at the time that was done, but I had occasion to read the Hansard record very closely and I noted my hon. leader (Mr. Oliver) and the hon. member for York South (Mr. MacDonald) made violent protests about the abortion of that principle. They continued in that objection and Mr. Speaker had some substantial doubt in his mind. There was a different ruling on the crucial Monday, the Monday that Bill No. 99 was debated, and if you will remember I raised the question of unanimous consent and Mr. Speaker overruled me. The hon. member for Woodbine (Mr. Bryden), as I recall, reported some precedents which backed up the position I had taken and he was overruled by Mr. Speaker.

In face of these things, unless you expect us to challenge each successive ruling of Mr. Speaker, where do we get to? On each challenge we know we can talk just as well as the hon. members of the government; and in each challenge we make and in each position we take, we know that the government has more votes and that it is going to win. We have taken our position, and it is abundantly clear and sensible.

What I am suggesting this afternoon, Mr. Chairman, is this. The government, having put itself into a corner, having made a very serious error, then tries to short-circuit it by cutting away some of these parliamentary procedures. The government thrust an unreasonable, an unfair and illogical burden on the Opposition when it asked members of the Opposition to come before that committee and examine, with intelligence, the amendments that they had only had a few minutes to see.

I suggest that this is no way, in fairness or in equity, to expect an Opposition to do its job in the House. It is as much in the interest of the government for the Opposition to be provided with proper methods of carrying on its job as it is for the government to be allowed to carry on the job assigned to it. And so, Mr. Chairman, I say very strongly, and in serious criticism, that this procedure, resulting from panic, cuts across the traditional safeguards that are established in our parliamentary procedure, and should never be allowed to happen again.

It is my sincere hope that what we were able to pick up this morning, on just a few minutes' notice, was sufficient to properly safeguard all of the rights of the people of Ontario. I have some doubt about that. They were not only my views, they were the views of the hon. member for St. George (Mr. A. F. Lawrence). They were the views of a few other hon. members there.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: That bill will be in committee until—

Mr. Singer: This bill would be in committee, certainly. But it has approval now, and we hear other hon. members in the House, including Mr. Chairman, saying "section carried, section carried." We hear a couple of the back-bench members, who get a little bored by these procedures, saying "carried, carried." They are not going to talk any longer. These are things, I would think, Mr. Chairman—certainly I would hope a stranger would think—that should not happen.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I can only say, on a point of order, that at no time has there been any discussion the Opposition wanted in this House, on any matter coming before it, that they have not had. I have stood in the House before and watched the attempts of the Opposition—and they have been trying as long as I have been standing here leading the government—to leave the impression that I am limiting them and not permitting them to talk.

I think you will have to admit—and I think any impartial observer will recognize—that in this House the procedure we follow, in the way the business of the House is conducted, is that hon. members have a full opportunity to express themselves on any matter coming before the House. That is the way it has always been and that is the way it will always be.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, at the moment the hon. Prime Minister has a larger section to applaud than I have. The facts speak for themselves. I suggest that we short-circuited the parliamentary rules of procedure, that there was no excuse for it, that there should have been a debate on second reading of Bill No. 99 and of these other bills before they went to committee, and that in so doing the government aborted the rules of the House that were set down for the protection of the democratic process.

I was interested too, Mr. Chairman, in the observations that the hon. Attorney General had to make in connection with the original Bill No. 99. I was very surprised, really, to hear the defence of the original form of Bill No. 99 and I have noticed that the press and the hon. Attorney General have disagreed on what he really meant.

As I recall, he said that the criticisms were broadcast and rebroadcast and that nobody bothered to get up and defend the provisions of the original Bill No. 99. When the press took up the phrase "broadcast and rebroadcast" and perhaps interpreted it as applying to themselves, and to radio and television stations, the hon. Attorney General jumped in quickly to say; "Oh I did not mean all the news media. I merely meant the members of the Opposition, whose apparent duty it is, or who see their role cast, to harass and criticize government and to do it unfairly."

I would merely say this, Mr. Chairman, in connection with Bill No. 99 and those other four bills which were equal abortions of the democratic process: I do not think they needed any defence. I think they spoke for themselves and the sooner they were dead and buried the better. If the government had possessed the good sense and the intelligence to say, at the beginning; "We are sorry we made a mistake, let us forget about it and we will start over again"; the whole issue would have disappeared.

I would have hoped that that would have been done, but the government did not do it. It dragged through all that Monday until finally, retreating step by step, it was forced into the position where in effect it did withdraw the noxious sections of Bill No. 99 and subsequently the noxious sections of the other bills have been somewhat similarly treated. But when the new hon. Attorney General comes into his seat and makes a purported defence of the old bill, saying that the charges and insinuations were unfounded and were broadcast and rebroadcast, whether by the gentlemen of the news media or whether by the Opposition, as though to say we really did not understand what was in Bill No. 99 and really, if people had understood it properly it was right, then I say that this hon. Attorney General, by making those remarks, is no better than the one who went before him.

There is no excuse whatsoever for any defence of those sections of Bill No. 99. If there is any criticism being levelled at the Opposition, or at the Liberal Party for the role we played in bringing those sections to the attention of the public, we graciously and thankfully accept it, because we see our role in bringing this to the attention of the public as the real role of an Opposition in the Legislature. I am surprised and disappointed in the hon. Attorney General that he tried to defend those sections.

There was no need for anyone to get up and say what was right about those sections, after his predecessor and one of his senior advisors had spent over an hour with the press saying that these bills meant exactly what the newspapers, the radio, the television and the Opposition members said they meant. The hon. Prime Minister himself said they were indefensible.

In face of all of that, in face of the appearance of the previous Attorney General before the press, before the television cameras and on radio and his statements which were reported in the newspapers in detail, in face of the remarks by one of the previous Attorney General's senior advisors that these bills meant exactly what they said they did, how can it possibly lie in the mouth of the hon. Attorney General to say: "Well, they really were not properly understood and the broadcasting and rebroadcasting that went on was only done to harass this fine government."

Surely to goodness, Mr. Chairman, the time has come in the public life of this country when a government which makes a mistake—and no government is perfect, nor will any government ever be perfect—should be man enough to get up and say: "We made a mistake, we are sorry, and we will try not to make the same mistake again."

That was all that was required, but the hon. Attorney General could not resist taking an unnecessary slam at the Opposition. I say again, Mr. Chairman, that what we did in Opposition in connection with Bill No. 99 was the role that I envisaged that Oppositions will always carry out. They will attack with all the strength they have available to them, with all the force that they can muster, any government action that takes away an individual's rights and destroys part of our democratic system.

Mr. Chairman, there are some other things that I wanted to deal with at some length.

Mr. A. V. Walker (Oshawa): I hope the hon. member will talk about something else instead of that all the time. It is pretty tiresome after a while.

Mr. Singer: Yes, it is pretty tiresome after a while. But with great respect to the hon. member, when the government does not seem to learn its lesson and when it continues to stand up and say: "Yes, we were right"; then we are just going to keep on repeating it. In the words of the hon. Attorney General, we will broadcast and rebroadcast and rebroadcast until the idea gets across even to such people as the hon. member for Oshawa.

Mr. Walker: That is what happened to Mr. Wintermeyer, he kept repeating it too.

Mr. Singer: It is rather interesting that the hon. member should mention Mr. Wintermeyer, our previous leader. If that needs saying again, Mr. Chairman, I will repeat that one, too.

The previous Attorney General denied—I am sorry he is not here at the moment—that there was any such thing in this province as organized crime. It took two commission investigations to finally get across the idea that there was. Our leader Mr. Wintermeyer said—and said very bravely in carrying out as I have said in a previous debate, his real role as the leader of the Opposition—that there were these matters that demanded government investigation.

Therefore, I would again say that there is no one on the government benches who can say he was wrong in what he said. What he said has resulted in very serious changes on the front benches, as it should have. The charges that he made were in substance, proved to be correct and the result of those charges is that the province of Ontario will have in future a better system in the administration of justice.

Mr. Walker: The Opposition has a new leader now.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, to get on to another matter, a great Attorney General, the Rt. hon. Sir Douglas Hogg, had this to say:

Whenever therefore the rights of the Sovereign as the guardian of the interests of the public are affected, they must find their protection in the presence of the Attorney General. It has been said of that office that what is everybody's business is nobody's business. It is the business of the Attorney General. Guardian of the public interests, I say, defender of civil rights, and so he should be identified.

That was the real sin of the amendment to The Police Act; that it should be the Attorney General himself who should have come into the House and asked for the awesome and terrible powers, the unusual and depressive measures, and that was the unforgivable blow to all those who loved the very name of liberty.

It creates in the breasts of men who know the meaning of freedom under the British parliamentary system and the common law the emotion of disappointment bordering on anguish. Let us look upon and cogitate about the manner in which he came to ask for this special measure.

He held in his hand this document, which was dripping with the poisonous potion of tyranny and reeked of the offensive odour of oppression, as he stood there. He hurried through, for he was a man always in a rush. This is what he had to say, and I quote from Hansard. He moved the first reading of the bill, An Act to amend The Police Act. The motion was agreed to; first reading of the bill. The Attorney General then said:

Mr. Speaker, this is a series of amendments to The Police Act to define more particularly the powers of The Ontario Police Commission and to give to it certain additional powers, particularly with respect to determining the adequacy of policing and the designation of areas under The Police Act where municipalities are required to have their own police force.

Now, why did he do this? Why did he say this? Why did he gloss over this serious matter in such a cursory way? Worse still, why did the Executive Council and the man who heads the government permit him to do it?

All of them to whom the people of this province pay a handsome stipend for their labours are at this moment responsible for the degradation of the office of the Attorney General. Not a one of them can escape. We in this party have no intention of letting them escape, even if it means broadcasting and rebroadcasting the things that we have talked about. The people of this province feel that we have done our job well. I am satisfied with that. And this is the sort of job that we are sent here to do.

The hon. Attorney General's department should be all of the law in government. That is to say, in purely legal matters, there ought to be no freedom of action among members of the Cabinet without the collaboration, consent and approval of the hon. Attorney General. This, Mr. Chairman, is a proposition so obvious that it needs no further elaboration. If the government is in the courts, then the hon. Attorney General or the senior counsel of his department—I emphasize these words—of his department—should be in the courts.

I have spoken in this House before about the need to staff The Department of the Attorney General with a band of lawyers trained as counsel under the direction of a senior, experienced man. These lawyers should be at the beck and call of all departments of government. On the other hand, that part of the practice of law which is purely solicitors' work ought to be exclusively done by a body of persons practised in the art and on the staff of The Department of the Attorney General.

Emphatically, I just mention that they ought to pay them something more than the pittance the lawyers now on the staff receive by way of remuneration. For if a government needs to hire 50 lawyers, then I say, Mr. Chairman, that they should be hired.

Not only would it be money well spent, but it would mean a saving of hundreds of thousands of dollars that is now paid out of the coffers of this province for legal services. What licence, I ask of you, Mr. Chairman, has a government department to go to a law firm outside the government and pay that firm $11,000 to revise a statute of this Legislature? Why should not the law officers of the Crown and The Department of the Attorney General do that job of work? Why should we hire special outside counsel to prosecute lawbreakers and pay them $21,815? I am referring to a specific case and I am sure the hon. Attorney General, if he is not aware of the case to which I am referring, can very quickly find it in the records of his department. We could hire a good full-time man and get a full year's work out of him and pay him less than that. The malefactors in another case have been sent to jail for lengthy periods of servitude, and it took two years to do so and it cost us $82,416 to prosecute. It is another particular case I am making reference to. I do not know precisely how difficult these cases were, but I say with a certain sureness that they were not $82,000 difficult.

There is evidence accumulated that the government of Ontario, so far as lawyers' accounts are concerned, is to use the vernacular, a real mark. That is to say, there is no doubt of its tremendous largesse when it comes to dispensing public money to the legal profession. They appear, in the returns I have asked for over the years, never once to have taxed a lawyer's bill. At Ottawa, in The Department of Justice, there is employed a full-time taxing officer whose task is to review lawyers' accounts. He works with a very sharp pencil.

The Department of Justice goes further, Mr. Chairman.

When the brief is placed in the lawyer's hands, he is told what rate his charges will be. At this point he may accept or decline the brief. But here with this government, we have the evidence. It is all in sessional paper 88 of the Third Session of the Twenty-Sixth Parliament. That is the exact reference, if the hon. Attorney General wants to know the record to which I am referring. What the lawyers working for this government ask for in their account, they get in the overwhelming majority of cases. In fact, I cannot recall one where the government had a bill taxed.

I say to the new hon. Attorney General, as a member of this House and as a taxpayer, that this careless and extravagant practice has got to stop, and should stop immediately. The hon. Attorney General should be all of the law.

I turn to this business of expropriation by government. Tens of thousands of dollars are paid out annually to law firms. Why cannot solicitors, whom the government wants to retain, be hired on an annual basis? Or better still, they should be brought into the department to work full time at good salaries which will attract capable men. The superficial will say that it needs to be done by local solicitors. The answer to that, in one word, is: rubbish.

The Ontario Hydro recently paid for the services of counsel in a certain case the grand sum of $77,098.05. I sincerely hope that they won that case. One would not need many cases like that in the year to pay the rent. Common sense would impel an enlightened government to tell the Ontario Hydro that if they wanted counsel, then there was a staff of them available in The Department of the Attorney General because the hon. Attorney General is all of the law.

I could go on, Mr. Chairman, and cite numerous examples, but it would only serve to elaborate the obvious. It would not distend the trivial, for hundreds of thousands of dollars in public money are involved here. Here is a good place, I say to the new Attorney General, to use a new broom. Here is a good place to raise the prestige of this department and to resuscitate and restore its vigour.

Mr. Chairman, I had intended to go on at some length and talk about a code of civil rights, a code that would protect citizens appearing before administrative bodies of this province. On Friday, the hon. Prime Minister made an announcement and I commend him for this. He made an announcement appointing Chief Justice McRuer to carry on the sort of investigation that was envisaged in the next several suggestions that I had intended to make. I think this is a very sound way of approaching this serious problem of generally protecting a citizen's rights and of avoiding the dangers of encroachment by various administrative authorities.

We do not know what this will result in. We do feel very strongly that the appointment of Mr. Chief Justice McRuer was a good appointment. We will hope that the terms of reference granted to him will be wide enough to allow a real examination of the problems that face the people of this province. We feel certain that if Chief Justice McRuer is given these wide terms of reference the recommendations he will bring forward will be of substantial help to the government and to allow translation into legislation the ideas which will once and for all chart a course as to how far government must go to protect human rights.

The sort of things that I would hope would concern the Chief Justice would be matters such as the following: Perhaps there could be an administrative appeal tribunal, or court to which a citizen could appeal, from the exercise of discretion of the administrative branch of government from the Minister right on down; or appeal against an alleged abuse of, or unreasonable use of, power. This body, in short, would have the right at the instance of a citizen to review every administrative action against particular citizens.

Perhaps the Chief Justice could recommend that there would be created a branch of the office of the Attorney General which would be required to review all regulations made under the authority of statutes, in order to ascertain that they are a valid exercise of the power granted to make regulations. The whole question of regulations was touched on by my hon. leader following the announcement made by the hon. Prime Minister the other day.

Every board and commission and tribunal should be required, in my opinion, to publish every delegation of final authority to any official, and a statement of the general course and method by which its functions are carried out. Every agency of government should be required, in my suggestion, to publish within a period not exceeding 60 days all final opinions or orders in the adjudication of cases before it, except those for good and sufficient cause required to be held confidential.

Generally speaking, there would have to be exceptions. Matters of official record would be made available to persons properly and directly concerned. Certainly the recommendations of the Chief Justice could include procedure whereby, in regard to every agency interested, affected persons could petition for the issuance of an amendment or the appeal of a regulation. In every case of the adjudication of an agency of a person's rights, there would be stipulated proper notice of adjudication. This would set out the time and place, the names of the officials who were to adjudicate, the statute under which the adjudication was to be held, and the matters of fact and of law to be determined in the instance where private persons are the moving parties. Then the agency would be required to give prompt notice of the issues to be contraverted in fact, or in law, the names and addresses of the witnesses proposed to be called, and the right of the individual represented by counsel, and so on.

There are several other suggestions along these lines. I am certain that the Chief Justice will be listening to many representations in connection with the final recommendations that he might bring in. I am certain that when this report comes in, as I have said, that there will be a guide set down to government as to what legislation they should bring in to protect these very important rights.

I did want to comment just for a moment on one of the statutes that the hon. Attorney General's predecessor brought in. I did comment to some extent on second reading. But it is the statute that purports to create the law reform commission. The hon. member for Grenville-Dundas, sir, who brought it in, is a man who, when it suits his purpose, is given to the laconic and cryptic statement. He did not give us very much enlightenment about the law reform commission, except that it is going to have something to do with reforming the law. What law? Which part of the law? All of the law, or none of it? We are not told if the system of priorities is going to be established in law reform. No one has said that some part of the law needs more reform than other parts.

In this regard, a good argument could be made in any one of the various fields. Someone could say that the law of real property in this province, encrusted as it has upon it archaic notions and rules developed two or three centuries ago, is badly in need of reform. Is the law reform commission going to take under consideration such questions as to whether or not we give our married women sufficient protection that we might abolish the dower right? The United Kingdom who I fear are a much more progressive society than ours, reformed their law of real property a whole generation ago. They got rid of old and useless trappings that came to us with the British conquest.

I have no fixed ideas on this subject, and readily admit that perhaps as good a case could be made if the law reform commission should be directed to look through the public statutes of the province to determine which of them may no longer be needed.

The hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond) wandered in here some days ago and presented a bill to repeal The Vaccination Act, while at the same time musing that it was out of keeping with the times.

I glanced through the public statutes of this province and wondered how many more we have in that category. At the same time my attention was caught by the numerous statutes that deal with the matter of debt and credit: The Absconding Debtors Act, The Absentees Act, The Fraudulent Conveyances Act, The Assignment and Preferences Act, The Cost of Distress Act, The Warehousemen's Lien Act, The Woodsmen's Lien Act, and so on. I wonder whether the time has not come to consolidate these into one Creditors' Rights Act. Would this be a worthy pursuit for the law reform commission?

In fact, we were left wondering what direction the law reform commission was going to get at all from the Attorney General. And we were not even told who the hon. gentlemen were going to be who are going to make up the law reform commission. Some day soon, I presume, we are going to be told that A, B and C, who are estimable citizens of the province of Ontario, have been appointed to make up the law reform commission.

We would hope that there will be some direction given by the hon. Attorney General as to what direction this important commission should and could take. It might be put to work immediately to bring about some order out of the chaos in The Municipal Act, and all the Acts that surround that Act. I made the point before that I do not think a select committee is adequately staffed to be able to take on this important job. It may well be that the law reform commission, with the assistance of the select committee, could do a job in this regard. But again we have had no direction.

Or perhaps our reform commission could be put to work to consider how many statutes are in the category stipulated by the hon. Minister of Health in reference to The Vaccination Act.

Do we really need such Acts as The Bees Act, The Egress from Public Buildings Act, The Escheats Act, The Estreats Act, The Fish Inspection Act, The Gold Causes Act, The Lightning Rods Act, The Pawnbrokers Act, The Stallions Act, The Replevin Act, The Snow Roads and Fences Act, The Steam Threshing Engines Act, The Ticket Speculation Act, The Trees Act, The Vicious Dogs Act, The Wild Rice Harvesting Act, The Warble Fly Act? We must not forget The Warble Fly Act.

If we need all of them or any of them, might they not be better consolidated with other statutes and the irrelevant material left out?

Today, Mr. Chairman, we have some 550 public statutes in force in this province. Maybe this is too many. In 1950 we had about 425. It will not be too long, at that rate, until we reach 1,000. Then how, Mr. Chairman, is the citizen or the lawyer in the Opposition or even the hon. Attorney General, going to be able to find what the law is in relation to any one facet of government at all?

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): I imagine they would all have to ask you.

Mr. Singer: We have the hon. Minister of Mines into this and I am sure that even he would agree with me on this point: That if something can be done to simplify our statutes, it could and should be done.

Now we have a statute before this House that presents a real challenge to the government. If they are going to take advantage of it, and I would hope that before this House prorogues that we will get some indication from government as to who the personnel on this law reform commission are going to be, and in what general direction they are going to be pointed. This does not mean that they have to be tied within the four walls of a very tight series of references. But surely, with all of the difficulties that we have; with this great number of statutes and apparently with hundreds of words on our statute books that nobody wants to pay any attention to any more; some group or some body should be set to work to put these statutes in more readable and understandable form so that, together, the hon. Minister of Mines and I will be able to find out what the law is a little more readily.

I want to make some general remarks, Mr. Chairman, about the coroners' courts. In recent days, weeks and months, we have seen a great deal of publicity attached to the method by which coroners' courts have been carried on. We have watched—I do not know if the proper words are "with interest"—but we have watched with some sort of a horrified sense of duty the chief coroner of Ontario getting into violent disagreement with the gentleman who has the title of chief coroner for the city of Toronto.

We have watched a coroner's inquest in Sudbury carried on in a method that I think would raise the hackles on the back of any lawyer who has respect for legal processes. It is reasonably obvious, Mr. Chairman, without berating any particular individuals that much has to be done in dealing with our whole system of coroners and our whole system of inquests to bring sense and intelligence to this form of inquiry.

I do not know that I would want to condemn out of hand any of the things that were said in connection with the recent dispute in Metropolitan Toronto. It appears that, as a result of this dispute, whether the charges that were made or the counter charges that answered them were right or wrong, as a result of that all of the discussion that took place certain facts that should have been made public were made public.

It would appear to me that somewhere along the lines there was not an over-anxiety to investigate some of these happenings with the zeal and carefulness with which they should have been investigated. I do not intend, Mr. Chairman, to get into any discussion, as I said, about the personalities involved or the charges and the counter-charges. But anyone who followed the newspapers in regard to those inquests in Metropolitan Toronto, or in regard to the inquest up in Sudbury, will recognize that there is something very, very wrong with our system as it presently operates.

The coroner's court is a very old court. It was well-defined by the year 1215. Some stories have suggested that it goes back back as far as the reign of Alfred the Great who, I am sure every hon. member of this House—including the hon. Minister of Mines, is he here? Yes—would know that Alfred the Great was the king of England from 871 up until the year 901.

By the 13th century the coroner was an elected official by universal suffrage and his duties went beyond looking into cases of sudden or violent deaths. His activities extended through a wide range of criminal matters and his responsibility consisted, in part, of bringing criminals to justice. In fact, he arrested witnesses to a crime and saw that they appeared at the trial before itinerant justices.

The office of the coroner in Canada goes back to the very earliest days following upon the British conquest. There is a reference to them in 1780. By 1859 the proportion of medical men appointed to laymen was 3 to 1. By statute of 1836, it was provided that if a coroner's jury found a person guilty of murder or manslaughter, then the finding was the equivalent to that of a grand jury and no further proceeding by way of indictment was necessary to put the person on trial.

I think that observation is a most significant one in contrast to the procedure that we seem to have today. Because in the procedure that we seem to have today, there seems to be a system of double trial. There is a trial before the coroner's court. There is a trial in the newspapers and, sometimes, there follows thereafter a trial in the courts. I commend that particular observation to the hon. Attorney General's notice.

This was the law until 1892, when the new Criminal Code deprived the coroner's court of the power to indict anyone. Many people in the province over the years have wondered if the office ought to be abolished. In 1921 the Gregory Royal commission inquired into the office and in that commission's report it was revealed that several leading Crown attorneys, and many listening to me will be properly impressed when I say that R. H. Greer was among them, advocated the abolition of that office as serving no useful purpose.

If it was to be retained, many witnesses suggested that magistrates conduct inquests instead of doctors, and that the medical men be called as witnesses. It is too trite an argument to say that a man trained in the law is one most suitably qualified to conduct a judicial proceeding. Now, that commission's report was made some 43 years ago. Things move very slowly in this province, particularly with a Conservative government. I read one part of that report.

It frequently happens that a person suspected of committing a crime which is the subject of an investigation is refused the opportunity to appear before a coroner and examine witnesses. If he is heard at all he is told that he is heard only as a matter of courtesy. In our opinion anyone under suspicion or otherwise directly interested in the proceedings should have the right to be heard at the inquest and be given a reasonable opportunity to question the witness. If inquests were conducted by magistrates, fuller opportunity might be given than if they were conducted as at present by physicians.

These remarks, Mr. Chairman, and these recommendations are as true today as they were in 1921. They are as true when applied to the unfortunate events involving those two doctors from the East General Hospital, or they are as true when they involve the unfortunate events which took place in Sudbury a few weeks ago.

One inquest was described by a prominent Toronto lawyer as being an outrageous and shocking perversion of proper judicial procedure.

And with this description, I think the hon. Attorney General would agree. This particular lawyer said so because this inquest denied a person who was mentioned—the essential right of democratic justice—the opportunity to confront his accusers. The late and great Mr. Justice Riddell said one time that a trial which declined to allow the defendant even to cross-examine the witnesses would be a disgraceful travesty not to be dignified by the name of a trial.

So we in this House, Mr. Chairman, must be concerned about the institution known as the coroner's court. We must approach it analytically and, if we determine that it is not suitable to our enlightened age, then either we must abolish it or improve it. In any event we must remove those characteristics which offend human conscience and dignity.

It needs no further word from me, Mr. Chairman, to put this case about coroners' courts before this government. The government should be aware that the present system is falling apart at the seams and is doing grave injustice to the people that it attempts to deal with. The time is long overdue when the hon. Attorney General should set very high on his agenda the task of reforming the whole coroner's inquest procedures. He should examine very carefully whether or not persons who are not legally trained should have the right to set themselves up as judge and jury and to condemn people who have no chance to defend themselves. This is the sort of job we envisage that the hon. Attorney General should be doing.

I want to turn to another topic, Mr. Chairman, the question of legal aid. There is a commission on which the deputy Attorney General serves and others, estimable gentlemen, with him. They have been going around the province and getting various ideas about what direction the province should take in connection with legal aid. They have been receiving some very interesting briefs. I do not want to prejudge the kind of report they are going to bring in. But let me say simply this in regard to legal aid. The problem of free legal aid services for the needy is basically a social problem. It is not a legal one. In the past the legal profession has taken unto itself the responsibility of attempting to solve it, but those attempts have fallen far short of any real solution.

When I say it is a social problem, Mr. Chairman, I mean it is the sort of a matter that any member of this Legislature should have an opinion on. It is a matter that we, in this Legislature, should have to determine on the basis of whether or not we believe justice is being done to the citizens of Ontario. If we believe justice is not being done to all of the citizens of Ontario, and there is a method whereby we can remedy this mistake even though that remedy costs some money, then this decision has to be made by the members of this Legislature. Now I am suggesting, Mr. Chairman, that our system of legal aid in this province leaves a lot to be desired, and will continue to leave a lot to be desired until the day the government of Ontario is prepared to say we are responsible for seeing that anyone who comes before our courts has a reasonable defense and a reasonable representation whether or not he is able to afford it.

This is a decision, as I say, which does not affect just the lawyers. Nor should it affect just the lawyers. Until this decision is made, and until this government is prepared to say it is prepared to spend enough of the public money to ensure that these facts are going to pertain, then I say the people will not appear before the courts in this province and be given equal treatment.

The social group in need of free legal assistance is not only the indigent, but is also those of moderate means. The English experience indicates that about 75 per cent of those who seek legal advice need financial assistance, at least to some degree. Since the English experience is based largely on civil litigation, it is probable that as many as 90 per cent of those involved in litigation need wholly or partially subsidized legal services.

In my opinion the right solution to the problem is not charity by the legal profession to the needy group, either in whole or in part. The present system of charity in Ontario by the profession is supplemented by a grant of $15,000. It escapes my memory how much the hon. Attorney General is asking for this year. I think it is a little more, but it is still nothing more than to supplement a charitable donation by the legal profession.

The problem I emphasize, Mr. Chairman, is a social one. The expense of the solution must be borne by society as a whole, by all of the people of Ontario. There is no reason why the legal profession should subsidize a needy segment of the public, especially not, as at the present, the burden of subsidization is borne largely by the less affluent members of the bar.

In a form of criticism addressed to many of the members of my profession, I say that it is a fact of life that it is not the most affluent members of the bar, or the members of the biggest firms, who hasten to give legal aid. Unfortunately, in too many cases it is the young man who is just out of law school, and who is trying to make a name for himself, who happens to rush into this breach.

Obviously the only social body that can shoulder the cost is the state. Occasional suggestions that the United Appeal should take the responsibility can hardly be taken seriously. Further, charity by the profession is disadvantageous to the public as well as to the profession. American studies show for example that the quality of legal services received by the needy under charitable schemes is most unsatisfactory. For the information of the hon. Attorney General, and I am sure he is interested in these things, there is a report to this effect contained in No. 76, Harvard Law Review, at page 579.

Of the two possible systems, there is the public defender system and the legal aid system on the English model, which does not there operate extensively in the criminal field but could be adapted to do so. I say that the better is the legal aid system, in which the government through the law society would pay lawyers on a fee-for-service basis. In the case of an indigent client the government would pay the whole fee, or possibly the great portion of the usual fee, such as the 80 per cent of the tariff that is paid in England. In the case of a client of moderate means, the government could pay half of the fee and the client could be expected to pay the rest.

Possibly special arrangements should be made in capital cases to ensure that an accused can not only afford a lawyer, but that he has available to him an outstanding one. The public defender system need not be sold short. Within its limits it does a reasonable job. It operates successfully in many parts of the United States and allows both for specialization on the part of the legal staff, the provision of an efficient secretariat and a trained staff of investigators.

But I have noted in some of the briefs that have been presented to Mr. Common and his committee, that there have been valid criticisms taken against the public defender system. Many of the criticisms, and I am not going to deal with them at length, I think are most valid. I think, for those reasons, the public defender system is not one which we should bring into this province. Perhaps its cheapness might recommend it but if we are going to get into this field—and it is my suggestion that we need to get into this field—I do not think we are going to achieve anything by taking a cheap and inferior solution.

Even if the public defender system were adopted, it takes care of only a part of the problem. It can provide free legal care for the indigent class, which admittedly is the most pressing problem, but it cannot help people of moderate means without destroying the criminal bar.

About 90 per cent of the criminal cases were handled by civil servant lawyers. There would not be enough work left to sustain more than a handful of criminal lawyers in private practice.

Moreover, a legal aid system would allow an accused person to choose his own counsel from a panel of participating lawyers. Under a public defender system, he would be assigned counsel. Possibly this is an illusory advantage, since few accused persons have enough knowledge of the capabilities of members of the criminal bar to make an informed choice. But at least, it is psychologically reassuring for them to have the privilege of choosing.

Finally, sir, the leaders of the legal profession are determined not to have any government plan in the field of civil law except on a fee-for-service basis. And I think it would be a mistake in tactics for the members of the criminal bar to ask for anything less profitable to themselves.

I am not really concerned about the profits to the members of the profession. I am concerned about the serious social needs, and I think the government has to wrestle with the social needs, and it has to do it in a method whereby the profession is going to go along with the problem that is presented to it.

We have seen, in other provinces, the difficulties that have ensued when government tries to unload a scheme of its own on a particular profession. We saw in Belgium a little while ago some of the difficulties that might ensue. I do not think the government is going to get anywhere in coming to a particular profession, whether it be the medical profession or the legal profession, with a big stick and saying, "You must do so-and-so." The government, if it is going to get into this field—and it is my earnest suggestion it must get into this field—is going to have to do it through co-operation with the profession. And the hon. Attorney General, I know, is the last person who needs to be told this.

Without presuming to guess what the select committee or Royal commission—I have forgotten the title of Mr. Common's committee—is going to bring in, that is all I want to say at this time, except that when the report comes in, and I would anticipate it would be in, in not too long a time, that the government be prepared to come forward to this Legislature when it reconvenes after the end of the present session, with a scheme for legal aid, a scheme that will work, a scheme that will satisfy this social need.

Mr. Chairman, I wanted to say a few words too about the securities commission. In the Budget debate I did have a few things to say about what I thought the securities commission might be directing its attention to. Since that time, the report of the Royal Commission on Banking and Commerce of the federal government has reported. It devotes a whole chapter to the securities trade or profession in this country with particular attention to what goes on in the province of Ontario. Some 70 per cent of the trading in securities and stocks take place in Ontario and, substantially, the tone for this particular industry is set by government action in this province.

I talked, for instance, about takeover codes and takeover ethics. Mr. Chairman, you will remember that about a year ago now, a committee was set up by trust companies, stock exchanges and investment dealers, to set out a code for takeover ethics. They came down with eight or ten ideas on how takeovers might be done and all those responsible for drafting the code commended these points seriously to the attention of those who were going to be involved in takeovers. Well, as one gentleman who writes on the financial page of the Toronto Daily Star, Allistair Dow, said:

Who cares about takeover ethics? Ethics smethics, you don't need any evidence—

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): What was the last name?

Mr. Singer: Dow, D-o-w.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: What was the expression?

Mr. Singer: "Ethics smethics!" That is what the man said. And he had this to say:—you don't need evidence provided by this week's bid for control of Burns and Company, a bid which violates several of the recommendations of the committee's code of procedures. Since the committee's recommendations on ethics were published last May, following a series of corporate mergers and acquisitions which reflected the need for more protection of minority shareholders, there has hardly been a takeover bid that has adhered completely to the committee's code. The problem is—and this is the Attorney General's problem—that the code is voluntary and that the law is silent on these matters. The bid for Burns and Company is the most flagrant breach of the takeover code. It doesn't identify the bidder. Shares will be accepted by the buyer on a first-come, first-served basis instead of being pro rated. Burns directors weren't given a chance to assess the adequacy of the $11.25 share price.

And so on and so on.

These are the imponderables that face the estimated 3,000 shareholders of the Calgary

Meat Packers; each of these unknowns could have a bearing on their decision whether to sell Burns shares for $11.25 each or to retain them. There are many other examples of how takeover codes have been contravened.

The ink was barely dry on the published code when in August a bid for the control of the Ontario Loan and Debenture Company was made by the Toronto stock brokerage firm Midland Securities Limited on behalf of unnamed private investors. It was not until months later that the identity of the bidder became known and that bidder was Massachusetts Protective Association. The bids by Steel Company of Canada for Page-Hersey Tubes in February this year; by Charter Oil for Midwestern Industry in December; by the French-controlled Aquitain of Canada for Banff Oil Limited; by Anthes Imperial for John Wood Company; not one of these, Mr. Chairman, not one gave the shareholders much information about the probable future conduct of the companies, which is a quotation taken directly from the proposed takeover code.

This article goes on, at some length, saying that:

The code, as well-intentioned as it might have been, is hardly worth the paper it was written on because the government has not seen fit to make this takeover code a part of the securities regulations.

I wonder if the hon. Attorney General had a chance to read an article that appeared on the front page of the Financial Post on March 21, 1964, under the byline of Mr. Frank Kaplan. This is headed: "Looser Rein on Stock Pushers Hints at a Boom." This is what this very astute observer of the financial scene in the province of Ontario had to say:

Ground work for a major revival of sales of speculative mining stocks to the public have been laid out in the past year. Behind the revival, the general boom in profits of mining companies and a rapidly brightening outlook for producers of metal. This week's breakthrough in the price of copper is certain to spur speculative interests. At the same time in Ontario, long the leader in developing securities laws and practices—

As I said earlier, Mr. Chairman, Ontario must be the leader in developing securities practices in this country because some 70 per cent of the trading takes place in the Toronto Stock Exchange.

There appears to be in Ontario a lowering of the barriers in the business of selling shares. New legislation and new policies within the securities business and in the Ontario government, reflect a changed attitude from tighter restrictions in recent years. What happens in Ontario is significant for the rest of Canada. Bay Street stock salesmen, given elbow room to operate, are acknowledged experts in inducing the public to take a flyer on a drill hole bet. And what has happened in the past week or ten days certainly confirms that last statement.

In the past, sections of the stock business using a long-distance telephone, have sold shares across Canada and in the United States. Why the barriers of sale of speculative stocks are being lowered whether unconsciously or deliberately, so far remains a puzzle.

It is known that more than a year ago a concerted effort was made to convince the Ontario government that securities legislation and the administration of the Ontario Securities Commission were too strict and should be eased. The argument used then and still being pressed is that Ontario's mining development has slowed because the Ontario Securities Commission and the Toronto Stock Exchange have reduced the flow of speculative mining in their efforts to protect the public.

This gentleman goes on at some length to develop the theme that I have already read to you, to point out the effects of changes that were made recently in the statute governing Ontario securities transactions and to not hint, but to ask bluntly, why the government has apparently opened the doors wide and allowed these abuses to come back. I think that before these estimates are over, the hon. Attorney General should be prepared to tell us this.

I referred earlier to the report of the Royal commission and there are some very fascinating observations made here. Chief Justice Dana Porter and his associates spent a considerable time investigating these problems. In the 20 or so pages where they deal with the Ontario Securities Commission they made a number of observations that certainly should commend themselves to the attention of the hon. Attorney General.

For instance, these are some notes that I made on reading through that chapter in the report of the Royal commission:

The capital requirements of the stock exchanges seem to protect the public adequately, although the minimum standards of the broker-dealers association appear to be unduly low, calling only for a minimum of $5,000 in free capital. In our view—that is in the view of the Royal commission:

—this should be raised and related to business liabilities. However, the broker-dealers association, which requires a broker's blanket bond or securities insurance in the minimum amount of only $10,000 for members in the five major cities and of only $2,000 elsewhere, are in our view, to relate the minimum more closely to the size and the nature of the risk.

The commission deals at some length with listing requirements and draws comparisons with what goes on at the New York exchange. It points out that in New York, for example, listed companies are required to demonstrate net profits of a million dollars annually under competitive conditions, and should have net tangibles of at least $10 million. Toronto has no set of standards for industrial listings, but considers them on a basis of an earnings record.

Proof of consistent earnings is regarded as removing the security from the highly speculative field. Surely this is a field where there should be some legislation to set these things out.

The whole question of disclosure standards has been sadly neglected in this province and I commented upon that phase of it in my earlier remarks in the Budget debate.

New York requires high annual disclosure standards. Regular periodic reporting in connection with the solicitation of proxies, publication of all transactions by inside officers and controlling shareholders. No such requirements exist in this province at all. The very minimal standards disclosure really does not mean very much as a protection to the investor. The Toronto Stock Exchange a few years ago approached almost 400 listed companies, urging them to publish interim reports. Just over 50 agreed to do so and the majority did not even bother to answer the exchange. The question of qualifications for salesmen: There are certain very stringent requirements in other jurisdictions, but none here at all—or very minimal ones if they do exist.

I could go on, Mr. Chairman, at substantial length, talking about the securities regulations or lack of them. The fact is that there is no real control exercised by government over disclosure and related matters, over takeover bids, or over dealing by insiders and many other abuses that are set out in this very capable report just brought down by the Royal commission. At the time the estimate for the securities commission comes up, I am going to deal at some greater length with some of the remarks made in the report. For the moment, however, I would urge upon the hon. Attorney General and upon the government, that its real attention to this very important field of economic activity in our province and ask the government why they have been so loath to step into a field that is crying out for a positive legislative supervision and direction.

In the course of the estimates, I am certain that my colleagues are going to address other criticism towards the government's policy generally. As I said at the beginning of my remarks, it perhaps is not too fair to criticize this hon. Attorney General personally.

But one point I do want to make, in closing, is this, Mr. Chairman: That the government, by changing its Cabinet officials from time to time, has not found a new way or a simple way to avoid criticism. It really does not matter which government member is sitting in a particular chair. He is responsible, together with his colleagues, for government action in connection with his particular department. He is the figure that has been put there by the hon. Prime Minister. He is the man that is responsible for government action in that department over the last 21 years. He is the man who is expected to account for this action. While we sympathize with the present incumbent, and we believe he is a fine gentleman and he is going to give us the best information available, it is not sufficient to say that he is new to the job and that a particular problem is going to require more investigation. These answers we seek are answers most urgently needed. These are answers that we in the Opposition insist we be given. We know that the people of Ontario insist that the government state its position.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Chairman, before I turn to the remarks that I had planned to make on the hon. Attorney General's estimates, there are a few introductory comments that I would like to make in light of what has happened so far in the estimates.

In the first place, Mr. Chairman, I would like to protest mildly—I say mildly because I happen to be prepared and therefore it does not make much difference to me—but on Friday we left the House here with a clear indication to us that what we were going to be dealing with first this afternoon was the estimates of The Department of University Affairs.

Following that, sir, we would then move to the hon. Attorney General. Somewhere over the weekend, the university estimates disappeared and, without any notification that I was aware of at least, we are on the hon. Attorney General's estimates.

I would say to the hon. Prime Minister that along this line I would not want to drive the point as far perhaps, as the hon. member for Downsview has done; but in the orderly carrying out of the business of the House surely the Opposition is entitled to know what estimate is going to be coming up on what day. If there is going to be a switch for whatever reason, sometimes they are valid, they are entitled to be informed.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I might speak to that. The only reason we did not continue with the education estimates was, that the hon. Minister of Education (Mr. Davis) was not here and I did not know when he would be coming into the House. Now the situation is that I think it is at least three weeks since I set down the order in which the estimates were to be taken. Everyone in the House knew that the estimates of the Attorney General would follow upon the estimates of The Department of Education. We have finished all those, with the exception of the one item the hon. member has referred to, and certainly there was no plan in my mind, nor did I devise any scheme over the weekend to shift these things around. I am taking them in the order in which they come in an attempt to clear the business of the House.

Because of the length of time it has taken to deal with the estimates, we have had literally weeks of notice that the estimates of the Attorney General, if they did not come up at, say, quarter after three, then they might have been expected around four or five, or whenever the remnants of The Department of Education were completed.

Mr. MacDonald: I do not want to get into a lengthy argument with the hon. Prime Minister. But the fact still remains that we were told on Friday that first thing this afternoon we would be dealing with university estimates. There were people who were interested in university estimates who came to the House to hear the debate. Then when they arrived here we suddenly discovered that we have switched. However, I do not want to pursue the point. I just reiterate: if there is going to be a change, we are entitled to some indication of that change. Perhaps people who have learned, either from the press or from our information, that there is going to be a debate, would not then come here under a false impression.

The second point I wanted to make is a brief comment on the rather lengthy introductory comments of the hon. member for Downsview. The hon. member seems to be impelled to fight the battles that have been fought and won. On the issue of Bill No. 99, surely it has been fought and won in a fashion that was more humiliating than any government has experienced in this province for quite some time. On the issue of the other bills now before the committee, this was fought out here the other day. Both the hon. leader of the Opposition, his leader, and I made our protests with regard to this procedure to make it clear that in our view this procedure should not be followed in the future, and I, for one, am not going to re-fight these battles once again. It seems to me that once they have been fought and once the issue has been made clear enough, we can let the matter rest right there.

Mr. Singer: The hon. member did not bother to come into the committee this morning and sit for two-and-a-half hours and try to cope with those amendments.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I am not a member of that committee. I attended only on the occasion when Bill No. 99 was there. But as the hon. Prime Minister has pointed out, and after protest, as the hon. leader of the Opposition agreed the other day, we will have plenty of opportunity to discuss it here in the House. One is driven to the conclusion that the Liberal Party so seldom finds itself in real disagreement with the Conservatives that when they get an issue they really have to dig their teeth in and stay with it for days, threshing old straw.

Let there be no misunderstanding, lest my remarks might be interpreted in any wrong fashion. On the issue of whether or not a public bill brought in by this government should in our view have second reading, the House rules are very clear. Any exceptions, I want to suggest to the hon. Prime Minister and to you, Mr. Chairman, again, are exceptions which should not be our guide in the future.

Now the rule is clear as to what should be done, and if the government wants to revamp a bill then the procedure again is very clear: that they withdraw one bill and give notice of introducing another one—if it is going to be as seriously revamped as the bills we have had.

There are a number of other issues, Mr. Chairman, that fall within the jurisdiction of the hon. Attorney General's department, which are now out for study by a Royal commission that has just been established or by the committee of the Attorney General looking into the whole reshaping of administrative procedure of legal aid.

Once again, I do not propose to deal with these at any great length this afternoon. It would seem to me that the appropriate time to deal with them is when we have reports. And when the House has the benefit of these studies, the government, presumably, is then going to be in a position to, and would be willing to, move and do something about it. Clearly, the government is not going to do anything about it until these committees have reported. So I do not intend to dwell at length on those items, Mr. Chairman, because there will be more appropriate times to do it. Let us get down to The Department of the Attorney General itself.

In attempting to come to grips with it this year, Mr. Chairman, I think we are faced with some rather serious difficulties. In the first place, the predecessor of the hon. Attorney General came into this department and made no secret of the fact that he was going to streamline it. He was going to reform it. There was going to be a great deal of administrative changes within the department and he was in the process of doing this. Indeed, he had achieved something of the role of trouble-shooter in government departments over the years; first in The Department of Highways, then in The Department of Municipal Affairs, and then in The Department of the Attorney General, he had achieved the accepted role of the trouble shooter who was put in to clean up the mess — once the hon. Prime Minister had come to the conclusion that some serious attention was required. He was in the process of doing this. Some of the things, we were able to see from the outside that got coverage in the press, were a bit troublesome, were a bit worrisome. This is something that I think we should review. This is something that I think the hon. Attorney General should spell out in some greater detail than he did to the House.

I want to say to the hon. Attorney General with all the fairness that I can summon for a man who has just been thrust into a very difficult position, that I think his introductory statement was most inadequate. He was operating on the basis that if you say nothing there is less for people to latch on to and be able to be critical of. But it seems to me that all that has happened, all the apparent confusion and uncertainty and conflict in The Attorney General's Department, and various agencies that come under its jurisdiction, would have made it advisable for the hon. Attorney General to come into this House and indicate the general lines of what he was planning to do, instead of just coming in with the kind of statement that he did and then leaving us to sort of take off from that point.

As a matter of fact, I think the significant point to be acknowledged here, Mr. Chairman, is that the explosion which ultimately blew the hon. Attorney General's predecessor out of his position altogether, was really—and if I may switch my analogies here—the final straw that broke the camel's back. Public indignation had been mounting on a whole series of issues with regard to the Attorney General. If I may revert to the parlance of the baseball—now that the season has opened—what you had in the last three or four months was a case of three strikes and the hon. Attorney General's predecessor was out.

In December there was a great public furor over the issue of used cars; he opposed the idea of an investigation; he had to reverse his position. In January, and into February, there was a great public furor over the question of Dr. Shulman and related issues with regard to coroners; not only the hon. Attorney General but some of the top officials in the department opposed Dr. Shulman's position. They had to reverse their position or lapse into silence. I shall come back to that in a moment.

Then finally there was the whole issue of the so-called police state legislation. This was the third strike on which the hon. Attorney General had fanned and I think the kind of indignation that emerged, not only among government members but in the House as a whole, was an accumulative one that resulted in an explosion.

I want to go back for a moment, Mr. Chairman, and review each of these because there are some untidy tag ends lying around, that I hoped the new hon. Attorney General would at least have had some comment on this afternoon. For example, in the instance of the whole used car issue. The hon. members are aware of the fact that this issue had come into the hearings of the select committee on consumer credit. We recognized that, while this overlapped into what we were interested in, it was not four-square within our terms of reference. So, on my motion, seconded by the hon. member for St. George, it was referred to the Attorney General for investigation.

There were many very good precedents for this kind of thing. But the Attorney General refused to act. He refused to look into it. He made a number of public statements, to put it as kindly as I can, that simply did not square with the facts. Outwardly the public outcry was such that he had to change his tune. He appointed an investigation under the jurisdiction of Harry Bray, QC, and presumably this investigation is going on.

Perhaps the best proof of the fact that the Attorney General's action was a very belated eleventh-hour action, was that the government itself, even before it had received a report from this investigation, proceeded to bring in a bill on generally the same lines as the licensing of mortgage brokers. They are now going to licence car dealers.

Mr. Chairman, it may well be that this is the solution to the problem. Indeed, in the last of the series of releases I made to the press—when I decided that a fire would have to be lit under the previous Attorney General—after the actual appointment of Harry Bray had been made, I made a suggestion that—complicated as this problem may be, the answer is a relatively simple one—instead of just registering used car dealers, they should be licensed and there should be some sort of tribunal before whom they can be brought if there is an accumulation of protests with regard to their business ethics or their business practices. In this way they could be called to make some accounting of their actions and if they could not give some good explanation of what was happening, then their licence would be withdrawn. It is as simple as that. This, presumably, is what the government has done. We will have a chance later to examine this bill in some detail.

However, the untidy tag ends that are now lying around so to speak, Mr. Chairman, are: what about the investigation? The government has acted before it has had a report. I think it is appropriate to ask the hon. Attorney General if he expects a report from Harry S. Bray. If so, when does he expect this report to come? Does he contemplate that beyond that there will be further legislation or further action taken by the government? For example, does he contemplate that it will be possible to redress some of the filching of innocent people that has gone on in the racketeering and the used car fields for many years when the Attorney General turned a blind eye to it and claimed it was not his responsibility? I think these are a series of questions of which we are entitled to know the answers at the present time.

Indeed, Mr. Chairman, I want to emphasize one point. If the report has not been made to the hon. Attorney General, I hope that when it is made there will be some observations in one particular connection. If they are not there, I suggest that he should solicit them when he gets the report.

When I was engaged in the public discussion, in the alerting of the public if you will, as to what had gone on in the used car field—admittedly, with the co-operation of the Better Business Bureau, whose files had been bulging with information available to the Attorney General for years but he chose to ignore it—I was honestly of the conclusion that the racketeering practices that have grown up in the used car field were restricted to certain fringe operators, some of these people, who were among the one thousand licensed or registered dealers in the Metropolitan area who have not even got car lots, who change their name and disappear almost as frequently as the months change.

However, Mr. Chairman, I became persuaded, as I was literally flooded with complaints by telephone and correspondence as to cases in which people had been victimized, that these racketeering tendencies were not restricted to certain fringe operators. Indeed, in the Metropolitan area, there are some established used car dealers, among the best known dealers in this city, who are as guilty as the fringe operators. I have passed on to the investigating officers, who were working with Harry Bray, cases involving them. Indeed, in correspondence I have had in the process of passing them on, I have had confirmation from the investigating officers that they had found these practices to be prevalent with established operators.

I think the government has neglected this field for so long that the disease had spread far more widely than we perhaps had believed to be the case. It exists not just among the fly-by-nighters, but among the established operators. Indeed, because of the very fact, it seems to me that the hon. Attorney General might well look into the whole question of redress.

Indeed, he might look into the question of whether charges should not be laid, and what action should be taken with regard to people who got away with things just as they pleased and for far too long. Indeed, in that connection, Mr. Chairman, there is one final point. I have received quite a number of communications from people who had originally been in touch with me and whose complaints I had passed on to the investigating officers. Let me illustrate what I mean. I have here a copy of a letter which was sent to me from Stanley G. Roberts of Hamilton. A copy also was sent to the hon. Attorney General. It reads as follows:

I am writing you regarding a complaint

I have filed concerning the purchase of an automobile. I completed the questionnaire and returned it to the above address—

This is to Mr. Eric Silk, QC, 175 Lakeshore Boulevard East—

I would like to be advised as to whether it is the intention of the Ontario government to appoint a judge in each city to hear these cases. If so, I feel that my particular case is worthy of consideration.

Thanking you for any information that you might give me in this regard.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: What date is that?

Mr. MacDonald: April 18. Now, as the hon. Attorney General is undoubtedly aware, what happened when the investigation was set up was that people were asked to send in their complaints. I believe a standard form was prepared and it was sent back. This was filled out and sent in with the suggestion, in at least some cases, that there was also going to be a follow-up for further questioning of the person.

I have had quite a number. In fact, I took the precaution when I told people that this was the procedure, of saying that if nothing happens I would appreciate it if they would let me know. I was just wanting to know in advance how thorough this investigation was going to be. I have a few who have written back. The number of people who will do this is very few, but I have had a few who have written back and said nothing had happened. They had acquainted the authorities with the details of their case and nothing had happened. Here is one man who specifically asks what is being done about it.

To sum up, Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. Attorney General should report to this House what exactly is the stage that has been reached in this investigation, give some comments on the report and the role he anticipates that that report can, or may, play beyond the legislation that has already been brought in.

I turn now to a second item, the second in a series of three that blew the previous Attorney General out of his office altogether. That is the coroners' situation and, more particularly, the situation with regard to Dr. Shulman. I do not want to review at any great length and detail what happened back then, but I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that too many serious—in fact incredibly serious—statements were made during that public altercation to be just ignored from that point forward. If there was half as much truth in some of the charges that were made by the parties, one of them being the chief coroner and the others being top officials in The Attorney General's Department, then I do not think this whole thing can be swept under the rug and forgotten. Just to remind the House, I have here a Toronto Telegram story of March 11 which says:

Metro Chief Coroner Dr. Morton Shulman said last night his predecessor, Dr. Smirle Lawson, suppressed inquiries into deaths in hospitals.

I acknowledge that Dr. Lawson is now deceased. But is this the kind of thing that has been going on? Silence on the issue I do not think is good enough. Here is a clipping from the Telegram of February 4, entitled: "Inquests Whitewashed, Says a Lawyer." And it quotes Glen How and John J. Robinette, who were on the panel:

Coroners' inquests into hospital deaths frequently resemble whitewash, the Toronto lawyer charged.

Glen How, lawyer for the Jehovah's Witnesses, told the panel discussion at most hospital inquests the witnesses are doctors and no one is allowed to ask embarrassing questions. Any distinction between that and a whitewash is something that will have to be explained to me.

I have here a clipping from the Telegram of January 28 entitled: "Shulman Charges Deputy AG and Coroner with Interference." And this was repeated in the press charges of interference, beyond the legitimate right of interference, by top officials in The Attorney General's Department.

It seems to me that this is not the kind of charge that should be made by a responsible official and then just forgotten altogether. I continue: "Shulman Claims Political Pressure Used. Seeks Public Inquiry into the Coroner System," is the heading of a Toronto Globe and Mail story on January 28. And from the Toronto Daily Star of the same date, I quote: "Coroner Demands Political Interference Probe."

Here are a great number of very serious charges that have been made with reference to the role of The Attorney General's Department. I say to the hon. Attorney General this afternoon that I do not think that he can come into the House and give us as brief an introductory statement without at some point coming back to an explanation as to how much truth there was in some of these charges; and second, whether or not there is going to be any investigation along the line that was suggested by the hon. member for Downsview, into this whole issue.

Now, I want to come back a little later to the question of coroners' juries—another aspect of them.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, there is the question of the Ontario Police Commission with its many unresolved questions in the wake of Bill No. 99. It was rather interesting to note in the course of the debate that we had on Bill No. 99, and the subsequent debate on the crime report of the Ontario Police Commission, that the government in the course of the debate—without frankly stating so—indicated two rather significant shifts in policy.

The hon. Prime Minister intimated, or rather, I believe, it was the hon. Attorney General in this instance, who intimated that there was some kind of working relationship established now between the Ontario Police Commission and the Ontario Provincial Police.

We are all very aware of the titanic battle that went on behind the scenes; a battle that I think has been as graphically described in a story in the weekend magazine of the Globe and Mail a week or so ago—a struggle for power between the commission of the OPP and the chairman of the Ontario Police Commission, which was finally resolved in favour of the commissioner of the Ontario Provincial Police.

There was an intimation by the hon. Attorney General that, presumably, now that this issue had been resolved and since you have a new chairman to the Ontario Police Commission, thereby removing the rather serious personality clash that obviously played a very important role, that now, presumably, the OPP is going to report to the Ontario Police Commission and to the Attorney General. So that we are back a step or so from what appeared to be the position after the amendments a year ago, which reversed the original position established by the government when it brought in the legislation to establish the police commission.

Now, if you have been able to devise some sort of a working arrangement, it seems to me that this may serve the purpose of a co-ordinated approach of all of the law enforcement agencies through the Ontario Police Commission. This is a very desirable thing in the province of Ontario.

As one looks back and examines the areas of greatest threat of organized crime, it was out in the areas beyond the more efficient Metropolitan police forces of Toronto and Windsor and elsewhere. It was out in the smaller areas and areas where the OPP had jurisdiction back in the time when one of its branches was rather seriously crippled by people within the branch who have since been found to have been working with the leaders of organized crime. In other words, there is clearly the need for some sort of a co-ordinating agency to bring together all of the law enforcement agencies, including the Ontario Provincial Police.

It always seemed to me from the outset, apart from the clash of personalities, that it was possible to get a working relationship there.

Now I assume from what the hon. Attorney General has said that there has been something of a shift from the adamant position taken by his predecessor and that now it has been achieved.

We also had an intimation from the hon. Prime Minister—rather slyly included in some remarks so that you had to be alert to spot it—to the effect that the amalgamation of the smaller police forces, which had been recommended by Judge MacDonald and which had been dismissed out of hand by the former Attorney General, was something which would take time to implement. Implicit in his comment was that this was something that we are going to work toward.

Once again, it seems to me that this is desirable if one is going to have a modern, striking force in our law enforcement agencies to deal with, not only organized crime, but with the normal law enforcement. This certainly cannot be done through some of the small and relatively inefficient police forces that we have, which simply have not the modern equipment which is required.

Now there is a second comment that I want to make in this connection, Mr. Chairman. That is that I was a little intrigued at the outburst once again last week, after we had had further debate in the House on the question of the revised Bill No. 99, as to who was responsible for this whole furor in the first instance. Indeed, the hon. Attorney General was quoted as saying in this House, and subsequently afterwards, that the responsibility really rests with the Opposition parties.

He was first quoted, I think somewhat unfairly, that the press had stirred up the storm. Then he was quoted as correcting it in saying that it rested with the Opposition parties, that none of them had at any time pointed out the fact that, for example, the original draft did not exclude the right to counsel. Let me say to the hon. Attorney General, and to the government and to all concerned, that I think the government might as well face the fact that the responsibility for the original Bill No. 99 rests with this government and not with the press and not with the Opposition parties.

Indeed, if there ever was a man who was the architect of his own disaster, it was the previous Attorney General. If he had come into this House and had said to this House, as normally one would expect on a serious bill like this: "I have a bill here which is attempting to achieve a very difficult task of balancing the protection of individual rights and yet, at the same time, strengthening our investigating powers so that we can dig out the facts with regard to organized crime. I invite hon. members to examine this with the greatest of care to make certain that we are protecting the rights of the individual. I have the assurance of the law officers that we have done so, but I cannot drown my doubts."

If he had come into the House and made this kind of a statement, I submit, Mr. Chairman, that even with the original bill, there would not have been a political storm. Certainly we would have had arguments, because certainly when we took a look at the bill it would have been obvious to anybody that you had to protect the rights of the individual more; but we would not have had the political storm.

The political storm was created by the statements made by the Attorney General when he went out and revived once again his continuing vendetta with Judge MacDonald, even though Judge MacDonald had left the OPC. He forgot the basic principles of responsible government when he, under grueling by the press on the question of why this was necessary and why he should have such a dangerous bill, finally tried to dismiss the question by saying: "Well, ask Judge MacDonald", when clearly it was his responsibility, because he had brought in the bill.

Being a member of this government means the government must accept the blame. But if there ever was a man who was the architect of his own disaster, Mr. Cass was that man. I submit to the hon. Prime Minister and the hon. Attorney General that it is time to quit berating the press and berating the Opposition, and to accept the blame.

Now, once again getting on to other important tag ends that are lying around after this political storm, I want to ask the hon. Attorney General this: is it his intention to make certain that the Ontario Police Commission proceeds to complete the investigation into organized crime? I do not need to remind him that there are repeated references during the course of the report, which we debated when we came back from the Easter recess, to the fact that this is a preliminary report and that they had gone as far as they could go. They had to get clarification as to their powers in coping with reluctant witnesses in in-camera sessions. It was clearly indicated that powers they felt they could get, and that they should get, had not yet been granted.

I do not think, after years of argument as to whether or not we have organized crime in this province, when the greatest obstacles to getting at the problem were the Attorneys General; that now, after the Roach commission, after this OPC report and some four or five years of inconclusive effort, we can let this matter rest when the Ontario Police Commission has indicated clearly they have not finished the job. I would like the hon. Attorney General to indicate to the House this afternoon whether it is his intention to instruct the Ontario Police Commission—with the powers that they will have in the revised Bill No. 99, providing all of the protection to the rights of the individual—if it is his intention to instruct them to proceed with all haste to complete this investigation so that we can have a report available for the next session of the Legislature and be in a position to deal with some degree of finality as to just how deeply organized crime has become rooted in the province of Ontario.

Now, related to this, there are one or two other tag ends that I want to draw to the attention of the hon. Attorney General. I was astounded to read in the Globe and Mail of March 26, a story that is entitled "Club Charters Still Being Held by Two Gamblers." Let me quote the first two or three paragraphs of this story, under the byline of Albert Warson and datelined Ottawa:

Gamblers Joseph McDermott and Vincent Feeley still hold two federal club charters despite a strong plea from Metropolitan Toronto police that at least one of them be cancelled.

The police, who feared that the charter might be used as a front for illegal gambling, asked The Department of the Secretary of State here to withdraw the Aram Equestrian and Breeding Association Inc. charter in late 1962.

Early last year, Louis Lesage, the department's companies and corporations branch director, replied by letter that it could not be done.

Now I would like some statement from the hon. Attorney General as to what in heaven's name is going on here?

For years we had these operators Feeley and McDermott with clubs in operation with the Mafia on the outskirts of the Metropolitan area. Anybody who had eyes to see and ears to listen knew that things going on in these clubs were in violation of the law—barred windows, triple doors, hounds on the grounds, and so on. Yet the law was frustrated in coming to grips with it.

There was even a statement from the Attorney General that there were to be no further raids "except on complaint," so that for at least some period of time no more raids were made on the institution. When you have this kind of a situation, there is at least prima facie evidence that protection money is being used and something is frustrating the law in coming to grips with this kind of a situation.

I think the time has long since passed in the province of Ontario that people like Feeley and McDermott, whose record is now clear as operators in the field of organized crime, should be continuing to operate clubs. For some reason or other this government, or the police agencies in the province of Ontario, asked the federal government to do something about it and nothing happened. They say it cannot be done. I hope the hon. Attorney General—in fact I ask him now—can explain exactly what are the difficulties. What are the precise details as to the reason why he cannot have withdrawn a charter from a couple of operators? He does not have to necessarily answer now, unless the hon. Attorney General wants it.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I would like to answer now if the hon. member will permit. I have not seen the article to which you refer. I would like to get the date of it. But I would say this at the moment. McDermott and Feeley, as we all know, are in jail. That is the first thing I would answer. So they are not running the club.

The second thing that I take from the article that the hon. member read, is that these are federal charters that were granted and that we have asked to be cancelled. The federal authorities, the Secretary of State, says we cannot do it.

I have not had an opportunity to investigate this matter as yet, but I can assure my hon. friend that we will certainly follow it up and do so. But at least part of the answer is there; that the two principals have been put behind bars and that the charters are granted by the federal government and that I will follow it up.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, may I say to the hon. Attorney General it is in the record already, but the story I have just referred to appeared on March 26. It was a front page story in the Globe and Mail. May I say to the hon. Attorney General that I hope he is not going to continue to be as naive as to make the kind of statement he has just made.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I am not being naive.

Mr. MacDonald: Just let me explain why I am suggesting you are being naive, and perhaps you will have further reason to be critical of what I am saying.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Perhaps it might be better to say this: March 26 is the day I took over the office I now occupy. Since that time I have been quite busy, I think the hon. member will agree, with various important legislation which has been before this House. There had to be certain priorities given to that legislation, and to these estimates. Other matters are going forward, but they have not yet received my full personal attention. But I assure the hon. member they will.

Mr. MacDonald: I suggested to the hon. Minister that he was naive and I reiterate it when he says that because Feeley and McDermott are behind bars they are not operating a club for which they hold a charter. There are statements by people like Alan Phillips stating that Feeley and McDermott were operating in co-operation with the Mafia. Anybody who knows anything about what has happened in the United States, knows that one of the terrifying aspects of organized crime in the U.S. is that although they have locked up some of the leaders, they continue to operate their empire from Sing Sing and other prisons.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Not from our institutions.

Mr. MacDonald: Don't you be too sure. Don't you be so smug and complacent about it, along with the other Ministers. Read the testimony of the report of the Ontario Police Commission and you will see that we have not gotten to the bottom of the operation. I just submit that whatever may be the operation, that if Feeley and McDermott are in jail it is an even more incredible proposition that any government, including a Liberal government in Ottawa and a party that is presumably interested in cleaning up this situation, should tolerate two men who have been convicted as professional gamblers and many other things, to be in jail yet continue to hold a charter.

I trust that the hon. Attorney General will look into the situation and that he will come back to the House as quickly as possible, or that he will make a public statement on the issue if, perchance, the House has adjourned in the interval. I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that this is an intolerable kind of situation. When you see men who are clearly categorized, as Feeley and McDermott are, continuing to hold club charters in view of the kind of thing that has happened on the North American continent, you can come to the conclusion that somewhere along the line the full implementation of the law is being frustrated.

If the full implementation of the law is being frustrated, somebody is being paid off. These people operate on protection money. This is the naiveté that I ask the hon. Attorney General to discard. If we are going to get at this issue, then when you see that kind of a situation do not come into the House and make excuses for it, because your second predecessor made excuses for four years until he began to look about as foolish as any man could be on this score. Now, let me proceed, Mr. Chairman, to another aspect of it.

Hon. A. K. Roberts (Minister of Lands and Forests): If the hon. member is making a statement about me I would say that we went ahead and did our best to knock out these people he is talking about. We succeeded in knocking them out and—

Mr. MacDonald: If the hon. gentleman is going to intervene, there is one thing he has never learned, and that is to sit silently when he should. If the hon. gentleman is going to intervene I will remind him that he—

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. MacDonald: Have I got the floor, Mr. Chairman?

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order, order!

Hon. Mr. Roberts: If I was as big a failure as you are I would resign and get out of here.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. MacDonald: As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, just let me say this, as a parting shot to the hon. Minister: If he were an honourable man he would have resigned his seat long ago because he gave a commitment on the NONG affair that although we have not got the full details of it, he said he would stake his office on it. It is about time he resigned. But resignations are not visual in the government. This is the one thing that I have said, that the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas—

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Mr. Chairman, on a point of privilege—

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): You will have lots of chance to say—

Hon. Mr. Roberts: My hon. friend has talked about resigning. I presented myself to the public in the light of all this, and I was redeemed and brought back again into this House. That is a lot better than this sort of rot.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, if I might quote the hon. member for Downsview, his competition on the Liberal side was a young lawyer who obviously was, in his opinion, a little wet behind the ears. That was the intimation of the hon. member for Downsview. Maybe you did not have tough enough competition. I do not know.

That does not alter the facts with which I am dealing. Indeed, the old Frostian principle is that if you can settle issues that should be decided in the courts by going to the jury of the people, then no matter how many laws have been violated, if you are re-elected again, everything on the slate is wiped clean. I submit that it is about time that we got rid of that principle in the province of Ontario. You of the old guard operate on that principle.

Mr. Singer: Are you through with him? Because if you are going to quote me, quote me correctly. I did not say a word about his ears.

Mr. MacDonald: I said that was the implication of the comment.

The other point, Mr. Chairman, is that since I have dealt with one aspect of a very strange reluctance to come to grips with one incidence of the operation of organized crime, these clubs are still chartered by Feeley and McDermott even though they are behind bars—the other aspect I want to come to is one that I have touched on already in this House, but I think that we have got to reiterate this and ask the hon. Attorney General what he is going to do about the recommendation of the Ontario Police Commission with regard to the collaboration in illegal gambling in the province of Ontario by radio, TV, and if I may add, the newspapers.

Just let me try to intimate to this House

how serious this situation is that the government has been winking at for quite some time. We have official figures that the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan) can confirm that $90 million a year is bet legally in the province of Ontario through the pari-mutuel at the race track. We have the suggestion in the report of the Ontario Police Commission, their crime report, that for every dollar that is bet legally, anywhere from three to five dollars is bet illegally. This means that upwards of something like $450 million a year is bet illegally in the province of Ontario.

Mr. A. Carruthers (Durham): Back it up!

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, if one accepts the pattern of organized crime, particularly in relationship to illegal gambling in the United States—a pattern that has been studied in the United States until we have full details of it—you will find that in the United States it is conservatively estimated that one-fifth of the illegal money that is bet goes into the treasury of the underworld.

The figures in the United States are $47 billion in illegal betting, with $9 billion going into the treasury of the underworld. If we bet upwards of $450 million, sir, in the province of Ontario, and if approximately the same kind of thing is happening here, then this means that we have something approaching the sum of $90 million, for which there is no income tax paid, going into the treasury of the underworld and to those who are organizing illegal gambling in the province of Ontario.

Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, and this is really the crux of the whole issue, in the United States it is estimated that 50 per cent of the $9 billion that goes into the treasury of the underworld is used to corrupt police forces, judiciary and politicians—protection money to continue this sort of thing.

Once again I am only applying the American yardstick. If that is the case, then it means that in the province of Ontario there is something approaching $45 million a year being used for protection money. Now, do not smile and laugh it off.

Mr. L. M. Reilly (Eglinton): How could you use it as a guide?

Mr. MacDonald: I can use it as a guide. The hon. member over here asks how can you use it as a guide? A lot of semantic argument is going on as to whether or not we have organized or syndicated crime in the province of Ontario. Let us cut out the verbal quibbling, Mr. Chairman. On the issue of illegal gambling, Mr. Justice Roach stated that this is the one serious aspect of organized crime. On the issue of illegal gambling, the crime report stated explicitly that this is the one serious issue. If there is anybody, for example, for one minute who does not think we have syndicated crime—I do not care what words you use—we certainly have internationally organized crime—the race tracks close in the province of Ontario at the end of the season, does anybody suggest for one moment the betting quits? All you have to do is pick up the Racing Form which does not publish what is going on on the American tracks while our tracks are in operation here, but immediately starts to do so when the Canadian tracks close for the season, and, clearly, the bookies are in operation in the province of Ontario in the off-season.

The whole thing ties together. Where was this organized? Let us face it, Mr. Chairman, beyond any shadow of doubt, we have got a highly organized, efficient system of international organized crime on the level of illegal betting, of gambling. And if the American guide is an accurate one, one-half of the monies that go into the treasury of those who are running this operation, is being used for protection money. Then I submit that it is about time that this government ceased tolerating open violation of the law.

As I have already intimated in the House, you can get into pastoral rural areas of Ontario and hear stations like CJET down in Smiths Falls publishing the results every half hour throughout the whole afternoon while the races are going on.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: May I ask my hon. friend, if he honestly and sincerely believes that one-half of $90 million in this province is being used to corrupt politicians and judiciary and the police force? Those are his words. Does he believe that?

Mr. MacDonald: I will say to the hon. Attorney General that I do not know, but I will say to the hon. Attorney General that no person who is conversant with the details of the picture of organized crime in the United States, will dispute seriously the fact that one-fifth of the money that is bet is going into the underworld, and that one-half of the money going into the underworld is being used for protection money. These are the studied and careful conclusions of the American Senate committee.

The hon. Attorney General cannot tell me that this is not the case in the province of Ontario. He does not know. I do not know. But certainly this is the pattern on which they operate. Will the hon. Attorney General explain, where it says, for example, that you cannot have illegal betting? Will he explain why he, his department, the police force, could wink at the violation of the Criminal Code by open collaboration with those who are engaged in illegal betting, through the press, on radio and on TV?

Let us cut out any other argument in the issue. Will he explain why we have winked at this violation of the law? It is idle for the hon. Attorney General to say that organized crime is a serious matter, and then to tolerate illegal betting and gambling which is the basis of organized crime. It is idle for him to do that and then to wink at this open collaboration with the perpetuation of this system. And I submit to the hon. Attorney General that the time has come for him to rise and explain to the House why this continues to go on. When is he going to hearken to the recommendation of the crime report and enforce those sections of the Criminal Code?

Now, Mr. Chairman, I turn to one or two other items. The first one is some brief comment on the government's whole handling of the Northern Ontario Natural Gas report. The day after the conviction of Ralph Farris on the perjury charges, I asked the hon. Attorney General whether it was now his intention to release the report because it is obvious that, since it is going to be appealed, it will be in the courts for who knows how long, two or three years, before it gets to the highest court in the land. Therefore, if the government is going to persist in its previously announced policy that as long as this matter was still before the courts nothing more would be done, either in releasing reports or in laying further charges, in effect, what it is doing is just drifting with this issue for another two or three years.

I suggest to the hon. Attorney General that the Farris perjury charges are a side issue, and nothing more. The real issue of the original investigation into Northern Ontario Natural Gas in 1958 was because of charges made in this House with regard to the corruption of municipal officials by officials of Northern Ontario Natural Gas in their efforts to get the local franchises throughout the province of Ontario. This is the real issue.

Without going into details that have not yet been resolved, I say to the hon. Attorney General that enough evidence has come forward for there to be absolutely no excuse for the hon. Attorney General to fasten onto the side issue of the Farris perjury charges, and not get at the real issue. The real issue is whether municipal officials were corrupted in the process of getting the local franchises for establishing the Northern Ontario Natural Gas distribution system in the province of Ontario.

Mr. Chairman, this becomes even more important since one of the people whose name has now seriously been brought into question happens to be a man who is a judge in the Ontario Supreme Court.

I say to the hon. Attorney General—and it has been said in many other places many times, there is nothing original in this—if Mr. Justice Landreville is not guilty then his name should be cleared. But if Mr. Justice Landreville is guilty, he should be removed from the bench without a moment's hesitation.

It is an intolerable proposition that a man should be sitting in the highest court in the province of Ontario with this kind of a cloud hanging over his head. The responsibility rests with this government and I find it absolutely incomprehensible that any government should be so insensitive to what is obviously a public need in not moving quickly to resolve this situation.

I repeat to the hon. Attorney General that the Farris perjury charges are a sideline issue that do not one bit stand in the way of such further action as the hon. Attorney General deems necessary on the NONG report.

This tactic, in the first instance, had all the earmarks of being a dodge to get the thing under the carpet for the purposes of the election. To persist in resorting to this kind of an excuse for drifting, for inactivity, when you have as important a personage as a man sitting as a judge in the Ontario Supreme Court with this kind of a cloud over his head, will mean that the blame is going to rest with the hon. Attorney General.

It is idle for the hon. Attorney General to go around this province, or for this government to go around this province, pleading for respect for the law, pleading for municipal officials not to be cutting corners; indeed not to violate the Criminal Code and The Municipal Act, if some of the charges that have been suggested with regard to Mr. Justice Landreville are at all accurate.

I would like the hon. Attorney General to explain, in a more convincing way than the excuses that have been given in the past, why he does not propose to move that the statement of a week or so ago is an accurate indication of government intentions.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I want to turn to the question of coroners' juries and how they operate in the province of Ontario—I do so partly because of the issue itself, but also because of another strange instance of a government which has openly tolerated the violation of the law. From what I have been able to discover, it has done nothing about it at all.

Let me preface the statement I want to give to the House here, Mr. Chairman, by reading three brief sections from The Coroners Act, so that hon. members will be aware of exactly what the law is. The Coroners Act, Revised Statutes of Ontario, 1960, Chapter 69, section 27, reads as follows:

A person shall not serve as a juror at an inquest unless he is named in the voters' list of the municipality and marked therein as qualified to serve as a juror, nor shall a person who has acted as a juror at an inquest act in a similar capacity within one year thereafter.

Section 31 reads as follows:

A summons to a juror or to a witness may be served by personal service or by sending it by registered mail addressed to the usual place of abode of the person summoned.

Section 34 reads as follows:

A coroner may appoint such persons as constables as he deems necessary for the purposes of assisting him in an inquest and before acting every such constable shall make oath that he will faithfully perform his duties.

That is the law. I have here, Mr. Chairman, the transcript of a programme that was carried on February 4 this year by "Toronto File." This programme in which Ed McGibbon brought before the cameras—with he himself contributing continuity by way of explaining the law and explaining some of the observations that were made—he brought before the cameras Dr. Cotnam, Dr. Shulman; a number of people who had been coroners' jurors; and Sergeant Cruickshank, who is the constable down on Lombard Street. The incredible thing, Mr. Chairman, is that when I saw this in the first instance I found it was absolutely unbelievable. When you read it—and I propose to read it into the record here—it is solid documentary evidence, testimony, by people indicating that the law has been violated.

As I shall show you in a moment, they would bring Dr. Shulman and Dr. Cotnam on and say "What is the law?" Dr. Shulman and Dr. Cotnam would spell out what the law is. Then Mr. McGibbon would flash on the TV screen some jurors, who explained how they were chosen and what they did. What they were saying was in complete violation of the law.

I want to come back to this point in a moment, but this is the key point that I draw to the attention of the hon. Attorney General: this was aired three months ago, a clear and solid documentation of blatant violations of the law.

The question I want to ask the hon. Attorney General after I have let the House in on the picture a bit, is: What has been done in the interval? Just what does one have to do to draw attention to violations of the law? What has one to do to get action from the government to see that the law is lived up to? Do you have to have a metal sledgehammer, or would a wooden sledgehammer do it if you hit the right person right squarely on top of the head?

To begin with, in this programme, Ed McGibbon pointed out that a bad practice had grown up in the province of Ontario, back in the depression years, of what was known as "professional jurors," people who were on juries repeatedly because they were just chosen by friends who happened to be in a position to choose them. Back in 1939 there was a prohibition put in the Act to the effect that you could not sit on a jury more than once in any year. That is in section 27 that I read a moment ago. Again, some two or three years ago, there was further tightening up of The Coroners Act to get rid of the practice of "professional" jurors. Just let me break into the script here. Ed McGibbon is speaking:

I asked Dr. H. B. Cotnam, supervising coroner for Ontario, whether the practice of picking hangers-on around the court room still goes on.

Dr. Cotnam said:

No, I don't think this practice exists any more. I am quite aware that this did exist in the past.

Ed McGibbon: Until when?

Dr. Cotnam: Well, I can only speak since my appointment, but certainly it hasn't existed in the last two years. Jurors are now picked in the manner that is outlined in The Coroners Act.

A little later Ed McGibbon said:

Dr. Cotnam, what procedure should be followed when impanelling a jury—a coroner's jury?

And Dr. Cotnam spells it out:

Well, the qualifications for a juror, of course, are laid down in The Coroners Act for the province. Number one, they should be on the municipal voters' list and their name must have "J" to it, meaning eligible for jury duty. And the second requisite is that they cannot serve on a jury more than once in a 12-month period. Now, the actual section, I feel, is a dual responsibility of the coroner and the coroner's constable—

If I may interject here, Mr. Chairman, this is rather interesting. Dr. Cotnam saying it is a dual responsibility, not just of the constable but also of the coroner. Continuing in the script now:

—and the coroner should certainly have some part in this and sit with the constable and try to pick out juries that are going to be capable of assessing the matter under discussion of the deceased's death.

Then Ed McGibbon queried Dr. Shulman:

It is not possible to create a special list within the voters' list and the jury as indicated on the voters' list? If you continue using the same jurymen year after year, couldn't this become almost a professional jury?

This was Dr. Shulman's reply:

Well, that has happened in the past in Toronto—in fact a police officer who is no longer on the force has produced what is known as this officer's trained seals and the same jurors were there week after week. But this is an abuse that was corrected some three years ago. Sergeant Cruickshank of the Toronto police took over this function and this no longer can or does occur in Toronto.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in the face of that, let us hear Sergeant Cruickshank. Ed McGibbon is speaking:

This means that you can select anyone from the voters' list providing they have a "J" opposite their name?

Sgt. Cruickshank: That is correct, yes.

Ed McGibbon: And you cannot call them short of one year after they have served?

Cruickshank: That is correct. One full year.

McGibbon: After one year, you can call them indefinitely?

Cruickshank: Oh, yes. You can call them for once a year only.

McGibbon: Once a year only?

Cruickshank: That is correct.

McGibbon: As long as they are still on the voters' list?

Cruikshank: As long as they are still on the voters' list. That is correct.

McGibbon: Sergeant Cruikshank, correct me if I'm wrong. This means that once a person is appointed to the jury duty of a voters' list, providing they remain on the voters' list, can be called again as often as you, the court officer, choose to call them, providing you do not do it more than once a year?

Cruikshank: That is correct. That is correct.

Dr. Shulman: Yes, that is true. They can, and in fact they do. But the police officer has been instructed to check and to make certain that they are still on the voters' list.

McGibbon: Now, once a person's name appears on that voters' list with a "J" opposite—does this mean that forever after, providing that individual appears on the voters' list, he can be called for jury duty?

Dr. Cotnam: No, definitely. Each inquest comes up and a jury needs to be impanelled. The current up-to-date municipal voters' list should be utilized by a coroner's constable in selecting the jury. I think here perhaps you are referring to the possibility of professional jurors—whereby—the coroner's constable, particularly in an area like Metropolitan Toronto, after a period of time gets several hundred names and he keeps repeating the same jurors. We think that in an area this size, juries can be gotten quite readily, not using the same people repeatedly.

Then McGibbon queries Sergeant Cruikshank again:

There is just one other thing in this selection of jurymen—

If I may just interject here, Mr. Chairman. If there ever was a case of a group of people really being led up the garden path—they were subsequently going to be revealed to be incriminating themselves—this was the group of people. However, let me get back to Ed McGibbon and his skillful job:

There is just one other thing in this selection of jurymen. How is it that you know that the jurymen you select is still on the voters' list?

Cruikshank: Well, I have their home phone numbers. I will contact them by phone, ask them if everything is the same as the year before, if they are living in the same place and if they are still on the jury list. I know them fairly well and I think they are pretty honest men. I trust them.

McGibbon: Now, at any point does the court ever question your decision as to the selection of jurymen?

Cruikshank: No, never.

Now, I recall Dr. Cotnam's suggestion that it should be a joint responsibility with the coroners. McGibbon again:

McGibbon: Is it not the responsibility of the coroner to supervise the court officer?

Dr. Shulman: Oh, yes, and the instructions have been given to the police sergeant that the jury is to be chosen from the voters' list, not from any special list which he may have prepared.

Now, Mr. Chairman, against that background—words from the officials involved, the coroners and the constable—let me now go to a few interviews with jurymen:

McGibbon: Do you own your own home?

Mr. George Brooks: Yes.

McGibbon: Are you on the voters' list?

Brooks: Yes.

McGibbon: And do you have a "J" beside your name on the list?

Brooks: Not that I know of.

McGibbon: Can you ever remember a time when you saw your name on the voters' list with a "J" beside it?

Brooks: Not to my knowledge.

McGibbon: Mr. Brooks, when did you last serve on a coroner's jury?

Brooks: On the 16th of this month.

McGibbon: Of this month? Have you often been a juror at an inquest?

Brooks: Oh, I have served possibly four times in the last four years. Three to four years.

McGibbon: How many times have you served all together, could you remember?

Brooks: Oh, that would be rather difficult. I would say that I served prior to the war and then after that I did not serve until five or six years ago. Five years ago, possibly.

McGibbon: So have you served—

Brooks: I would say I have served five—say five times in the last five years.

McGibbon: How is it that you have served so often as a juror, when many voters never get a call at all?

Brooks: Well, I believe the simple fact is that many people do not wish to serve on juries. These are always held in the evening and the average man, after a day's work, wishes to rest.

And a little later in the programme:

McGibbon: Does this not tend sometimes to create a situation where the same people are called over and over again?

Cruickshank: —

the sergeant, who is obligated to faithfully uphold his responsibilities according to The Coroners' Act:

Cruickshank: No, that has—may not happen. Sometimes, we will say this year, I have more inquests set in January for this year than I had last year. So I will have to go up to the city hall again and go over the voters' list and get quite a few names again to carry on until the other men come due to be called—

McGibbon: So you probably have some, if I may use the expression, veteran jury men on every jury and some new or novices—

Cruickshank: Oh, yes, there is—if you have three men that have been here before along with two new men, that helps the new man an awful lot.

Then Mr. McGibbon comes back with another juror.

McGibbon: Mr. Hodgson, how often do—have you served in the last, say, three years?

Hodgson: Three times.

McGibbon: Three times. Does this come up regularly each year for you?

Hodgson: Well, the first time was around the first of August, and then the next about the middle of August and the third around the end of August.

McGibbon: Do you feel that your name is on any specific list as a result of these regular August calls?

Hodgson: I think so.

And a little later:

McGibbon: Do you find yourself meeting up with the same jurors each year?

Hodgson: Well, only one chap, he was there two years.

McGibbon: Who was that?

Hodgson: The foreman of the jury, a fellow by the name of Levine.

McGibbon: He was on what, the last two?

Hodgson: No, he was on the first and the last.

McGibbon: I see. Is there anyone else who served on these juries with you each time?

Hodgson: Just my son.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. members do not want to listen to this clear violation of the law being revealed, I suggest they go out and have a smoke.

Mr. A. E. Reuter (Waterloo South): What is it?

Mr. MacDonald: Clear violation of the law.

Mr. Reuter: I cannot recognize it. Not the way—

Mr. MacDonald: Well, this is the usual trouble with a Tory. He cannot recognize the violation of the law when it stares him right in the face. I continue:

McGibbon: Is there a "J" opposite your name on the voters' list, do you know?

Hodgson: I could not tell you.

McGibbon: —any idea how—Sergeant Cruickshank came to call you in the first instance?

Hodgson: Well, he called my son, and I guess that my son told him I would be available if they wanted me, and he phoned me.

McGibbon: Had your son ever served on a jury with you?

Hodgson: He served on the three I did.

McGibbon: On the three? Did your son suggest that you be called or—

Hodgson: No, I could not tell you. All I did was get a phone call.

Another juror:

McGibbon: Mr. Henderson, how were you called?

Henderson: I was called by a police officer, who asked me if I would serve at a coroner's inquest. This officer is acquainted with a friend of mine whom he had asked to serve on the jury and he asked him if he knew of anyone else who was interested in sitting on a coroner's jury. My friend gave him my name and as a result he called me.

McGibbon: Do you remember how you were called?

Stone: We were called by a constable.

McGibbon: When you say "we", you are referring to whom?

Stone: To all the jury. The five jurors.

McGibbon: I see. Do you know how he happened to arrive at your name?

Stone: This particular constable lives on our street. I understand that this—that he is able to do this—that it does not matter whether he calls all on one street or all in a line—apparently it is quite in order to do this.

Now, Mr. McGibbon, on camera, said this:

"Toronto File," incidentally, has examined the voters' lists for the names of twenty jurors who have served on inquests in Metropolitan Toronto in recent months and has found six who were not eligible for jury duty. Some names could not be found on the voters' lists at all while others did not have the required "J" beside them. One of the six was a dentist even though The Jurors Act specifically excludes doctors and dentists for jury duty.

Maybe this will be a flagrant enough violation to even capture the attention of the backbenchers over here. To continue:

Section 31 of The Coroners Act provides, for example, that a summons to a juror may be served by personal service or by sending it registered mail; but as things now stand it does not work out that way.

And then they go back on to interviewing jurors:

McGibbon: Did you receive the summons calling you for jury duty?

Brooks: You mean the summons as a piece of paper?

McGibbon: Yes. Well, it is my understanding that summons are sent out.

Brooks: No, this is not sent out. The summons is usually in my experience—the summons is in the jury room when you go into the jury room prior to going into court.

McGibbon: So you are phoned and you go down to the court and you pick up your summons there at the court?

Brooks: That is correct.

And incidentally, a clear violation of the law.

McGibbon: Well, what happens when someone has been summoned and does not appear?

Brooks: Well, I have not got the faintest idea because there is really no summons issued. You are just requested to come down and the summons is given to you when you are there. There is no summons as such issued.

And then another instance:

McGibbon: How were you called? Do you remember the circumstances under which you were called?

O'Carroll: It was through a friend of mine.

McGibbon: How far in advance? How much notice were you given?

O'Carroll: About four days.

McGibbon: Did you ever receive an official summons to appear or was it simply the phone call?

O'Carroll: It was a phone call.

McGibbon: Did you ever receive a summons?

O'Carroll: No.

McGibbon: Not even when you arrived at the inquest?

O'Carroll: Yes, I did—

McGibbon: There was one waiting for you when you arrived there?

O'Carroll: Yes.

An hon. member: Is that O'Carroll or Carroll?

Mr. MacDonald: And then, finally, Mr. Chairman, and this is perhaps the most serious of all if one is seeking a cross-section of the views of citizens who are chosen for a jury, McGibbon explained on the programme:

More serious, perhaps, is the sanctity of the jury room when the jurors retire to consider their verdict at an inquest. In this regard, the courts have long held that a coroner's jury is no different from any other jury in our judicial system, and that no one is to talk to the jurors or influence them in any way.

It used to be, however, that some coroners would so direct the jury that they would even go into the jury room and help the jurors to write their verdict. I asked the supervising coroner for Ontario, Dr. Cotnam, whether this still goes on.

Cotnam: It is true that this practice was done in the past and I can say categorically that this is not done now and we instruct everyone accordingly.

McGibbon: You say this is not done now and you instruct everyone accordingly; can you say that you have stopped the practice?

Cotnam: Yes, I think the practice is pretty well stopped now. I am not aware of this happening. We'll say, since my appointment, and not only is the coroner not to go into the jury room and instruct the jury, but neither can anyone else. The police officer can't go in and give them any additional information nor can the Crown attorney go in. If the jury sends out through the officer that they want some additional information or to clear up a matter then they must be brought back into open court again, and they can state their problem and the coroner can instruct them accordingly.

And then we have a cut in of one of the jurors; our old friend Brooks.

Brooks: Well, no, if you want to clarify a point that you are not quite sure of, I mean if there is something in the evidence you're not quite clear about, you call the constable and you go to the court steno and you bring back the actual wording that you want.

McGibbon: I see. Well, now—

Brooks: I mean that if some point comes up and you are not actually sure about it, you ask the constable, the sergeant, who'll then go and get the necessary data for you.

Now McGibbon comes in for a little discussion with the sergeant—

Mr. G. A. Kerr (Halton): Let us have the commercial.

Mr. MacDonald: To continue:

McGibbon: Now you are totally responsible for a jury man.

Sergeant: That is correct, that is right.

McGibbon: I assume that you are responsible for them from the time they enter the court room till they come back.

You take them to the jury room.

Sergeant: That is correct.

McGibbon: And you are responsible for them. Now, who exactly is allowed in that jury room? With the jury?

Sergeant: No one at no time.

McGibbon: Under any and all circumstances?

Sergeant: That is correct.

McGibbon: Is the coroner himself not even allowed to go in?

Sergeant: No, he is not. No one.

McGibbon: What happens if somebody goes into the jury room?

Sergeant: Well, I can arrest them.

McGibbon: Has there ever been an occasion when you have perhaps needed to call the coroner into the jury room to discuss a point with him?

Brooks: Oh, yes.

McGibbon: And he will come in and discuss it with you?

Brooks: Oh, yes, he will. Yes.

McGibbon: Do they ever bring a witness to you when you are in the jury room?

Brooks: I have never had occasion to.

McGibbon: But you have had an occasion with the coroner.

Brooks: Yes.

Clearly in violation of the Act, Mr. Chairman.

McGibbon: Now, after the jury retired to the jury room, I understand in this case in which you served or the inquest at which you served, there was a request for additional information as to when the deceased had died. Do you remember the circumstances surrounding that particular request?

O'Carroll: There was a question asked like how long he had been dead. I mean how long he lived.

McGibbon: Fine. Now, who was it that answered that question for you?

O'Carroll: It was the doctor.

McGibbon: Was that the coroner?

O'Carroll: It was at the inquest.

McGibbon: And where did he answer that question?

O'Carroll: He answered it in the jury room.

Mr. Chairman, I could go on even further, but I want to conclude my remarks in the hope I can complete them by very shortly after six o'clock.

Mr. Chairman, the "Toronto File" programme of February 9 reveals that those sections of The Coroners Act which refer to the choice of jurors and the prescribed procedure for the conduct of a jury are regularly violated. Either the supervising coroners do not know what is going on, or else they, as well as The Attorney General's Department, are once again winking at a persistent violation of the law.

The transcript of the programme from which I have just quoted provides testimony of these violations; that testimony was made public four months ago to literally tens of thousands of people within the viewing distance of the CBC. What is being done by those responsible for seeing that the laws of the province are obeyed?

After seeing that programme, Mr. Chairman, the House will recall that I asked the hon. Attorney General whether the records of coroners' juries were publicly available. Obviously they are, or should be, but only after considerable jockeying back and forth between Crown Attorney Bull and repeated questions to the hon. Attorney General did I get permission to examine those records. I want to present to the House the results of that examination. I might add that the information which I have extracted from the files and from which I now present conclusions to the House, is available to both the press and to the hon. Attorney General.

What I have here, Mr. Chairman, are the lists of jurors in over 250 coroners' inquests over the past two years in the Metropolitan area. There are literally hundreds of names; there are five jurors per inquest, so you can figure it out for yourself; hundreds of names and they have been retabulated alphabetically so that you can refer to them very readily.

Examination of the alphabetical lists, Mr. Chairman, will show that most of the juries are composed of veterans who reappear annually. Sometimes they show up exactly on the same date, sometimes just a week or so after the lapse of one year required by the law. In most cases the familiar names turn up before the year has elapsed, and in this way, Mr. Attorney General, there were 51 infractions of the law between January 1962, and January 1964. These cases are marked with a red "X" over the dates on the alphabetical lists which I have available for inspection.

There is some evidence that this has been going on for years.

For example, one inquest report for 1960 had been misfiled into 1963. And, back in that year, at least for this one jury, there were three men—Albert Millar, Paul O'Brien and Arthur Virgo—who are still active in the current lists. All of these offences occurred at 86 Lombard Street, although the same tendency is noted in Scarborough and Weston. The inquests at 4199 Dundas Street West, Islington, and 5090 Yonge Street are in better order, though not without occasional irregularities.

In fact, Mr. Chairman, the record for attendance—this is a "lulu"—is held by Thomas Johnston of 19 Empress Avenue, Willowdale, who served six times between April, 1962 and July, 1964 when the law permits only one jury attendance per year. The record at 86 Lombard Street is held by Gordon W. Crawford of 263 Queensdale Avenue, who has served five times between May, 1962 and November, 1963, twice as a foreman.

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): You said July, 1964.

Mr. MacDonald: If I may correct it, five times between May, 1962 and November, 1963, twice as a foreman.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: The man before, the first one you mentioned, the one you said was a lulu.

Mr. MacDonald: Right.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: You said he served so many times from such and such a date until July of 1964. Well, we are not in July of 1964 yet, so you must be thinking of some other date.

Mr. MacDonald: I can get the correction on that.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: All right.

Mr. MacDonald: I can get a correction on that in about two minutes. You are right; it is April, 1962 and July, 1963. Examination of the sheets shows clearly that in a number of cases all five are veterans; in many cases three are veterans, with two new ones making their appearance. In my tabulations, the veterans are checked in red, on the left hand side of their names. Yet we had the testimony of Dr. Cotnam in the "Toronto File" programme that the requirements of the Act are being lived up to because, and I quote Dr. Cotnam, "we think that in an area this size, the Metropolitan area, juries can be gotten quite readily, without using the same people repeatedly."

It appears obvious, Mr. Chairman, that a roster for jury service has been kept for a number of years at 86 Lombard Street. The practice can be traced back to Sergeant J. W. Cruickshank's two predecessors, A. R. Andrews and E. J. Wickenden. It can be noted that when Sergeant Cruickshank was absent last September, presumably on leave, his stand-in, R. J. Holmes, was able to continue the practice without hindrance.

In view of the law, as laid down in The Coroners Act, and in view of the repeated assertions on "Toronto File" by both Dr. Cotnam and Dr. Shulman that the practice of professional jurors has been ended, what explanation can the hon. Attorney General give for this?

Let me give the House a few more details that have emerged from my research. Perusal of the juries reveals that on occasion all of the jurors come from one street, may in fact be close friends and neighbours. Exactly what this means, in terms of destroying the intent of the Act in seeking a balanced judgment from a cross-section of citizens, chosen at random, I shall leave for each hon. member's conjecture.

It is noteworthy that four streets in the east end of the city, between Monarch Park Avenue and Victoria Park Avenue, have provided a disproportionate number of jurors. The four streets from which the following list of jurors appear over the past two years are as follows:

Kingswood Road: 38, Harry Ellis; 420, John and Helen Brindley; 437, Elmer and George and Esther Haney; 439, Frederick and Margaret Gourlie; 441, William and Lawrence Seymour; 443, Walter McLeod; 445, James Herdman; 447, Ross and Grace Urquhart; 449, E. Thomas; 455, Sidney Sluman.

Northdale Boulevard: 65, William J. Wilson; 69, Donald H. Gorman; 75, John P. Hughes; 77, James A. Hodgson and Manfred Job; 79, John Rooney; 81, David Smith; 87, Ross F. Counter; 89, Ivor Ellis; 97, Arcadia Miladinov; 99 Albert Millar.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it should be noted Sergeant Cruickshank lives at 77 Northdale Boulevard, the street from which I have just listed these.

Oakcrest Avenue: 72, Martin Snow; 77, Frank Careless and William K. Allen; 83, Cyril Smith; 85, John C. Andrews; 86, James Smith; 92, Thomas E. Denny; 106, Beverley J. Ashfield.

Finally, on Queensdale Avenue: 16, Roland Ellis; 149, Cyril Greenham; 167, Reginald and Margaret Matthews; 263, Gordon W. Crawford.

Another interesting point appears from a study of the jury records. The law requires that a juror's name be listed on the municipal voters' list and be marked with a "J". The last voters' lists were issued in all municipalities in October, 1962. There are 15 persons who served on 1963 juries who had moved since they served in 1962. Until new lists are compiled their names could not be on the list at their new addresses for no new list will be completed until this fall.

It is significant to recall, in this connection, the comment of Dr. Shulman on "Toronto File" that the police officer has been instructed to check and make sure that they are still on the voters' list.

There are a number of cases where one person has brought his friend, his fellow lodger, his brother, his sister and other relatives. A checking of the addresses documents this. During the two-year period there were at least eight husband-and-wife teams.

In the face of all this evidence, Mr. Chairman, which merely documents more solidly what has been readily available since the "Toronto File" programme of February 9 this year, what explanation can the hon. Attorney General give for such a blatant disregard for the law? And when does his department intend to see that The Coroners Act is complied with?

Mr. Chairman: It is now 6.05 o'clock. I will leave the chair and resume at 8 o'clock.

It being 6.05 o'clock, p.m., the House took recess.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

MONDAY, MAY 4, 1964

Mr. Chairman: On vote 201.

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Chairman, before proceeding with the specific individual votes and estimates of the Attorney General, I think it only proper that I should deal, even if only briefly at this time with some of the points raised by the hon. member for Downsview (Mr. Singer) and the hon. member for York South (Mr. MacDonald) in their remarks this afternoon. I would take these points as I noted them at the time. I made some notes then, in reply, and had a brief opportunity during the recess to add some information which may be acceptable and helpful.

One of the first items the hon. member for Downsview mentioned, was the accounts paid to outside counsel and the principle of engaging outside counsel generally in matters with which The Department of the Attorney General has to deal. On the principle of the engagement of counsel, I would say this; that I make no apology for the policy of securing the best counsel where matters of considerable import are to be prosecuted, either in the criminal or in the civil courts. This is a policy which has obtained down through the years and I think one that has proven its worth and proven satisfactory.

The suggestion was made by the hon. member that such persons might be engaged as part of the Attorney General's office. Perhaps there is some merit in that idea, but if counsel of top calibre are available, and can be engaged occasionally on very important subjects, I would not entertain the idea that that was not a good policy to follow.

With respect to the matter of accounts, the hon. member suggested that it was only a matter of submitting an account and it was accepted and paid. I would assure him that this is far from the fact. This is not the rule.

This is not the practice that is followed. Accounts are submitted; they are very carefully scrutinized. They are often referred for reduction and reduction thereof insisted upon, and, in certain cases, they are taxed. I think the hon. member made some reference to the taxation system at Ottawa by the Minister of Justice. That is simply very similar to the procedure often followed with respect to accounts here, that the accounts are reviewed very carefully by the officers of The Department of the Attorney General and taxed down in this department, which is on all fours with the taxation procedures in The Department of Justice at Ottawa.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Chairman, could I perhaps ask the hon. Minister a question?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I wonder if you would be good enough to reserve it until I have finished and then perhaps we can come back to it?

I am going on to the point where the hon. member made some reference to the law reform commission.

I think I would refer the hon. member to the bill which is now before the House. I believe it has received second reading. There was an inquiry asked with respect to the scope of that commission and I would say that after consultation with most eminent members of both bench and bar, the commission was authorized, in the language of the Act, in section two as follows:

It is the function of the commission to inquire into and consider any matter relating to (a) reform of the law having regard to the statute law, the common law and judicial decisions; (b) the administration of justice; (c) judicial and quasi-judicial procedures under any Act and finally, or (d) any subject referred to it by the Attorney General.

The point is, that the commission has broad powers on its own initiative. Not under the direction of the Lieutenant-Governor in council, or the Attorney General, except only in the latter part of that section, where it says "any subject referred to it by the Attorney General." The commission may institute and direct legal research for the purpose of carrying out its functions and the commission shall report from time to time to the Attorney General. I am hopeful, of course, that this Act will become law at this session of this House.

The hon. member made some remarks with respect to legal aid and I think all hon. members of this House are aware that the committee on legal aid has been quite active. It is functioning, has held hearings through the province, has received, I understand, at its request, a very considerable number of briefs and presentations and its work is continuing. Questionnaires were sent out to labour bodies, ethnic groups, church groups and generally throughout the public of the whole province and I expect that committee will also be reporting shortly and we will be able to provide a type of legal aid which will be adequate and satisfactory. The matter, briefly, is now being pursued and studied in the fullest and most thorough way and, if we may have a little patience, I think we will find the answer.

I will not at this time take time to comment on the comparison of the public defender system with the legal aid system, but I think my hon. friend agrees with me that perhaps the public defender system, as it is employed in our neighbour country to the south, does not compare with even the legal aid system we now have, for which I give a great deal of credit to the members of my profession for instituting the system on their own, voluntarily.

The securities commission was remarked upon. My hon. friend remarked about the code of ethics which had been established with respect of which the law was silent, and inquired as to whether that code should be made law. I think he is perhaps aware—and this House should be aware now—that a committee was formed on securities legislation, to deal with these subjects. Among others: takeover bids, insider trading, proxy solicitation, disclosures to shareholders, primary distribution, and all other matters relating to trading and securities in Ontario. As to the personnel about which an inquiry was directed to me, I would say that the committee originally consisted of, I believe, Mr. W. B. Common, the deputy Minister; Mr. J. R. Kimber, the securities commission chairman; Mr. R. A. Davies and Mr. H. L. Mockridge, two very eminent lawyers, familiar in the securities field.

I believe that on February 14, 1964—I am now reading from a press release given out by my predecessor in this office (Mr. Cass):

The Attorney General today announced that this committee which was created to consider various aspects of security legislation in Ontario, has been enlarged to permit the widest scope of investigation. To ensure that this end is achieved new members have been appointed to this committee.

Then follows the names of five persons: Mr. J. S. Yoecker, QC, deputy Minister of The Provincial Secretary's Department, which department has the responsibility for the administration of The Corporations Act. Mr. T. A. M. Hutchison, FCA, a senior partner in the firm of Peat, Marwick, Mitchell and Company, chartered accountants; Mr. Hutchison is also secretary of the Institute of Chartered Accountants of Ontario. Mr. Charles Warren Goldring, a director of Fry and Company Limited, who are members of the Investment Dealers Association of Canada; Mr. Goldring is president of the Toronto Society of Financial Analysts. Professor H. Ian MacDonald, Bachelor of Commerce, Bachelor of Philosophy, M.A. and so on, assistant professor of political economy and dean of men at the University of Toronto; and Professor M. L. Friedland, who also holds various and similar titles, of the Osgoode Hall law school, legal adviser to the committee.

I inquired during recess as to how active the committee had been and I find it has held a meeting every week since November; that is, some 20 meetings or more, and that it proposes now to hold public hearings and is working very actively with a full-time legal adviser.

The hon. member for York South raised certain points and if I can get his attention I would now answer him. One of the first items which the hon. member raised was the matter of the used car situation. I think it surely should suffice if I say to this House in reply that, as he is aware, legislation has been drafted. It would perhaps have been in committee this morning had time permitted. It will be there tomorrow morning. It provides for not only registration, but for licensing and investigation. I think it is quite a thoroughgoing piece of legislation and trust it will become effective legislation in this House at this session. It should serve—and I fully anticipate that it will serve—to regulate, control and permit the investigation where necessary in this field of our commercial life.

I do not think I can say at this moment, and I would not say, that I am about to let the matter pass into limbo. But the hon. member said:

Has consideration been given to restoring to some people the losses or to prosecuting those who defrauded them?

That this will receive further consideration, is all I can say, and I say this sincerely. Up to the point where we now come, where legislation is being presented to the House, this phase of commercial life in our province has been subject only to the remedies which are provided for in our courts, civil and criminal, such as prosecution for fraud and action for recovery of money wrongfully obtained by misrepresentation and other things.

Those remedies up to this point have apparently been considered sufficient. Perhaps something may be done by going back and looking at the matter. But certainly from this point forward, I think we will be able to take care of this matter in a reasonable and effective way.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Is the hon. Attorney General expecting a report from Mr. Bray?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The hon. member asked about a report. Mr. Bray, I understand, made a report to my predecessor and it was out of that report that the legislation to which I refer has come. I have not, in the time I have had, been able to put my hand on a written report. But I know it was out of his report to the former Attorney General that this legislation now coming before the House was drafted and prepared.

The hon. member for York South had a great deal to say about coroners and about coroners' juries. I would, perhaps, be careful in saying this, but as I listened to him and to his reading of the presentation which was made over television, it seemed to me that while there were some infractions in the procedures which are laid down in the Act according to the sections which he gave, I must say, frankly, that, while I do not condone this in any way, they were not such as one might call a serious—even in the nature of a misdemeanour and certainly not criminal.

A coroner's court is an investigative tribunal, not one with an accused before it, but seeking to find out the facts by which some person came to his death; to find out whether it was malice, negligence or carelessness. Without saying this should be done, it is altogether possible that a juryman attending year after year after year might very well become a more competent juror. I do not say that he should breach the law, or anyone in charge of the court should do so—

Mr. MacDonald: Therefore, your law is wrong.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Perhaps the law is wrong, I do not know. But I would say that as the law stands it is to be observed. I can say to the hon. member that steps have been taken to see that it is strictly carried out in every respect.

Mr. MacDonald: When?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Now. Prior to now.

Mr. MacDonald: When?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: When, what?

Mr. MacDonald: Prior to now, when?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, it has been done prior to the time I am standing here speaking. Some weeks ago steps were taken to see that The Coroners Act is fully administered, strictly in accordance with its provisions. That this will be done, I can assure this House.

With respect to the Ontario Police Commission and the Ontario Provincial Police: I think perhaps I should say that it is significant, and I am sure the House is aware of this; that in Bill No. 99 as it was originally presented to this House, section 15 made a change that would make the commissioner of the Ontario Provincial Police directly responsible to the Attorney General. That section has been deleted from the bill as reprinted, as it has been before the committee and as it will come back to this House. I say that is significant. The law stands as it was, and the law at present is that subject to the direction of the Ontario Police Commission as approved by the Attorney General the commissioner has the general control and administration of the Ontario Provincial Police force and the employees connected therewith.

On this subject, I would say that I do believe that there will be an honest, conscientious compliance with that section. I think the intention of the government is very evident in the way that the legislation has been dealt with now. The government has a right to expect, and will require, that the commissioner of the Ontario Provincial Police co-operate with and, in the language of the section, be subject to the direction of the Ontario Police Commission as approved by the Attorney General. I am sure that result will be achieved. There is, without saying more, every evidence that that result is being achieved at this time.

I am sure that that co-operation will increase so that we will have what is intended—a commission having the control and administration of all police forces in this province; with the Ontario Provincial Police Commissioner co-operating to the fullest extent and accepting the advice and the direction of that commission. On matters of broad policy, where the decision of the Attorney General is required, then the direction, advice and approval of the Attorney General will be sought.

I would like to say this: I think it achieves what is the ideal, in that in the administration of particularly the Ontario Provincial Police Force which is the force of the Ontario police and a provincial force it should be as far removed as possible from any political influence in the matter of recruitment, promotion, building of quarters and things of that kind, so that there will be no contact with the political arm in that sense, but that through the commission which directs, assists and advises the Ontario Provincial Police commissioner, there will be a line of responsibility in matters of policy making, and matters of broad policy back through to the Attorney General, who is the responsible officer of government who must be responsible for the actions of that force in that type of thing.

Having said that much, the intention of the government is clear. The action that has been taken with respect to the recent legislation, I think, underlines the attitude of the government. I have every confidence that the policy, as I have enunciated it, will be achieved.

The hon. member for Downsview asked if it was the intention of the Attorney General to have the commission complete a further investigation into organized crime.

Mr. MacDonald: It was my query.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yours? I am sorry. The present report is an interim report. I am aware of that. Referring again to the legislation before the House in Bill No. 99, that section, now section 17, provides that the Lieutenant-Governor in council may direct the commission to investigate crime and matters relating to the enforcement of law. All I would say is this: That when, and only when, the government decides that that commission should go forward to investigate further matters of crime, then it will be directed to do so. That is the only answer I propose to give at this time. But I can assure the hon. member that the government is aware of its responsibility in this regard. It has the authority to do so, and has the commission there to carry on the investigation. To name it more definitely than that, I am not prepared to do on this occasion.

Then the hon. member for York South referred to club charters. I think I answered that partly at the time, but I was told I was naive. Perhaps I am. I accept the allegation, or imputation. But I did note in reading the article, which I had time to pick up during the recess and I am just going to refer to it very briefly, said first of all in brackets in this article:

McDermott and Feeley went into Don Jail in Toronto last June—

this is the article of March 26, 1964:

—to begin serving an 18-month sentence for conspiracy to obtain information illegally from police officers.

Then follows a paragraph:

Police in Toronto maintain that neither the Aram charter, nor the other one held by the two gamblers, the Cosmopolitan Hunting and Fishing Association, has ever been used for any purpose in Ontario.

Now this is what the Toronto police have discovered from their investigation. These are federal charters and the Secretary of State has not seen fit to repeal them. The police here say the charters have never been used. It is pointed out in this article that they could be used anywhere in Canada, since they are federal charters. I would say that it is one of the things I am very much interested in looking into further; but at this particular moment I can give my hon. friend no more complete answer than I have now done.

The hon. member almost, I thought, went to the point of charging the newspapers, television and radio people with being guilty of unlawful practices in reporting results of horse races.

Mr. MacDonald: That is what the police commission said. Just quoting back to you—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I do not think that the police report claimed that these persons were guilty of any criminal offence.

Mr. MacDonald: It said you should enforce the criminal code.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, on this point—and I have not had more than enough time to look up some law—I find that in one case involving Leishmann some years ago, a charge was laid. He was the publisher of, I believe it was a racing form or a paper of very similar name. The court interpreted the section, which is a section of the Criminal Code, very strictly and very closely and dismissed the charge. He was publishing it wide open. I do not prefer to believe that all these people are criminals. Perhaps they are, but certainly if we could get the evidence to prove that they are, they would certainly be prosecuted. But I do not believe that the crime report went that far. Without further evidence, I can say nothing more at this time. I do not believe, unless there is some further evidence to this effect, that some $45 million is being used to corrupt either politicians, our judiciary or our police force. I have a little more confidence in them than that.

Inquiry was made with respect to the Northern Ontario Natural Gas situation. I think it was the hon. member for Downsview who inquired, a day or so ago in this House, as to whether Mr. Farris had been convicted, if the report would be made public and what about further prosecutions.

Mr. Singer: The hon. Minister means York South.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: York South—I should be very careful to keep you two apart, I know.

I replied at that time to the question, stating that since the conviction was being appealed the report would not be made public at this time. I further replied that further charges were being considered, had been and were still being considered. I have nothing further to add to the answer I gave the House at that time.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): We now have one stage of the Farris case completed. There is an appeal and that may go on for some time. I take it the position of the hon. Minister is that there will be no publication of the report as long as that case is pending before the courts. Then let us assume that one is disposed of, and another charge is laid. Will that still further delay the publication of this report? On the procedure which the hon. Minister's predecessor followed, and he apparently also is following, is his report ever going to be made public?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I can only say to my hon. friend that the release of that report while the conviction is being appealed might be very unfair, in a number of respects, to persons named therein. Until the appeal is determined, I think it is the only proper and fair attitude to take.

Mr. Bryden: This is a new procedure.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Now I will answer the rest of the question. I did not say at the time the report would not be released until the appeal was completed. I merely said that the Farris conviction was being appealed, and the report would not be released at this time. I did further say, as I mentioned a moment ago, that further prosecutions and the matter of other charges had been considered and was still being considered. There the matter must rest for the moment. I will not say more.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I have just a couple of very brief points that I wanted to refer to the hon. Attorney General. When talking about outside lawyers, I made specific reference to a particular sessional paper. If the hon. Attorney General has not had a chance to examine it, or the two or three similar papers that were produced as a result of either questions of mine or questions addressed by the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Sopha) over the past several years, I would commend these to his immediate attention. These questions were specifically and carefully worded. One of the questions asked was, what was the amount of the bills submitted and what was the amount paid?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Is that on the order paper?

Mr. Singer: Yes. Over the past several years, this particular sessional paper is in reply. The question, in substance, was directed to the government in relation to every department. It is not on the order paper this year, but it was in previous years. It may be that the procedure is changed, but in the three or four years that that question was there, the answers were exactly the same.

What are the names of outside lawyers or legal firms employed, for what purpose were they employed, what was the amount of the bill they submitted and what was the amount paid? I can tell the hon. Attorney General that in each year those accounts ran to hundreds of thousands of dollars, and in not one instance can I recall than an account, which was submitted, was paid in any different amount than that amount that was submitted.

Now it may be that as a result of those questions that were put on the order paper in three or four successive years that the government has changed its policy and is having a closer look at those accounts. That is only a part of the point I made. The additional point I made and I think this is at least as important, probably more important: I can see no reason why the government should have to, every year as a matter of course, pay out hundreds of thousands of dollars in legal fees to outside lawyers. I can see no reason why there should not be a legal staff working for the government, under the control and direction of the hon. Attorney General, that cannot do this work.

On the odd occasion, in cases of outstanding importance, in cases of the most extreme difficulty, certainly no one is going to object to the government hiring the best counsel available. But if you read through any one of these sessional papers, Mr. Attorney General, I defy you to satisfy anyone, even yourself, that in these hundreds of instances of hiring outside lawyers, each one of which indicated that these cases were of extreme difficulty, could not have been handled by the departmental staff, if there was a departmental staff available.

I can recall a case just within the last few months. It involved my own office and a real estate transaction. A very simple one. We were acting for the vendor, and the government was the purchaser. For no reason that was apparent to me—even though a substantial sum of money was involved, it was a simple, ordinary real estate contract—it was found necessary for the government to hire outside solicitors.

I can see no excuse for this at all. It would seem to me that if the government takes competent lawyers into its own employ—and it will only get competent lawyers, by and large, if it pays them the going rate and does it in sufficient numbers—that it would save many hundreds of thousands of dollars a year.

Again I say that the information the hon. Attorney General gave to me, insofar as the fees are concerned, is not borne out by the sessional papers that were tabled, by the answers to those questions that were tabled. It may be that the system has changed in the last year, because I think the questions were asked over that previous period.

Now insofar as the law reforms—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Could I just say this? I thank the hon. member for drawing this to my attention and again I have to say, although I am reluctant to say it at this time, that since the question was asked I have not had time to get the full reply I should like to give him. But I thank you for drawing it to my attention and it will have my full study and consideration.

Mr. Singer: There are at least three returns made. My memory fails a little bit, but I know I asked the question at least twice. My hon. colleague from Sudbury asked it at least once and the result was substantially the same.

Insofar as the law reforms commission is concerned and the bill that is presently before the House, I agree with what the hon. Attorney General has said, but I was hoping that he would point the commission in some direction that he would indicate to them that maybe it would be helpful if a particular field of law was investigated. He has that power in the Act if he wants to exercise it, but I thought it might be helpful to the House if he suggested within the general, broad field—and I do not care which one he picks, there are so many of them—that the law reform commission is going to investigate something or other, and we can expect to have a report before the House the next time we meet after the end of this session. This is the sort of thing that I think would encourage many lawyers in the province; many people who have to deal with complications of the law, if we had reason to expect some serious law reform in a particular field within a reasonable time.

So far as the securities commission is concerned, I am interested to hear about this committee. I do not recall an announcement of the appointment of the committee having been made in the House. Was it made in the House? I do not recall it.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I believe it was made—

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): It was really discussed.

Mr. Singer: Well, in any event if there is—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: It is very active.

Mr. Singer: All right. There is such a committee sitting and certainly they have got an important task ahead of them. The importance of that task is heightened by the report of the commission headed by Chief Justice Dana Porter, where he and his commission have, exhaustively, in my opinion, examined some of the faults in our securities legislation and there could not be a better series of guideposts directed to this special committee than the hon. Attorney General refers to, than the 20-odd pages contained in the report of Chief Justice Dana Porter's commission, which point out where our securities legislation is lacking in direction and control.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I might amplify my remark about the law reform commission.

I think the hon. member is aware that a very able and active committee of the law society has been working on the field of creditors' securities and they have done some very excellent work, I believe over a period of some three years. This was with the approval the assistance, and the blessing and the direction of the Attorney General. We printed a draft bill, which I believe we have—

Mr. Singer: I have a copy of it right here in my desk.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: You have it. I have it. We have considered actually so far as to possibly introduce it to this House. We felt that another year's study might be helpful and the committee itself felt this would be a wise and good thing, and I believe there have been some discussions, public discussions on it here last weekend, which I regretted I was not able to attend. But that particular field has also been pursued in a very excellent way. I am not exactly sure how far we will go with that new bill but it is going to be studied further and something certainly will come from that. I think I could say this further, that the hon. member suggested that some direction might be given to the law reforms commission and I think I can assure him such direction will be given.

Mr. Singer: Well, I think this is fine. I am pleased to see this bill come forward. I do not know if The Attorney General's Department or the hon. Attorney General or his predecessors initiated this study. Whoever did, deserves a lot of credit.

This sort of study happened without the law reform bill having been passed and it is the sort of study that the bar association or the law society embarks on, on occasion, and is a very helpful adjunct to our whole field of administration of law. But apparently the government has decided that there is more that can be done in this regard and that is why the law reforms commission bill is before the House. I was hoping, and I would think that most members of the profession are hoping, that the government will point this commission in a certain direction, because the field is so large.

We certainly would hope that this commission will get to work soon, that it will have on it the most eminent people that you can find, the most qualified people that you can find, and that we could expect, say a year from now, there will be a report that we will have a chance to examine. That you will bring in legislation as a result of such a report.

The hon. Attorney General did comment on the remarks of the hon. member for York South concerning coroners. He did not comment on my remarks, and I was wondering if there is any study going on at all as to the importance of carrying on the present system. Now I agree with the hon. member for York South that if there are statutes on the books they should be enforced, but my remarks were in a different direction. I think that the time is long overdue that we examine the whole function of coroners and coroners' courts and inquests and all that sort of thing. And I think the series of crises that we have gone through indicate that more clearly than anything I can possibly say. I would have hoped the hon. Attorney General would have given some indication that this matter is at least under study or that there is some action going to be taken in this regard.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I must say that when the hon. member spoke about coroners, as I recall his remarks, I made a few notes. But in the first part he related the history of this court, which has, down through the years, performed a very valuable service in the investigation of deaths, to determine whether there is malice or negligence or carelessness of a criminal import.

In one breath he said "perhaps this court should be a court which makes a finding, an accusative finding" as I recall his remarks, and whether the courts should be empowered to say this person is guilty of a crime in the sense of, although the hon. member did not use the word, a grand jury. Then he went on to say "has this court outlived its usefulness altogether and should it be revised, should its functions be taken away?" and so on.

Coroners' inquests have a long, long history behind them. That is no reason, perhaps, to say it is an unmixed blessing today, or that it is perfect in any sense.

Mr. Singer: It is far from perfect. That is what I was trying to say.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Just because there was some difference, perhaps; just because some of the procedures that it is supposed to follow were not followed; just because there has been some difference in the opinion of certain coroners as to what it should do, does not, in my mind, immediately condemn the court entirely. I would accept the hon. member's remarks and be quite prepared to consider the functions and the procedures of the court. Perhaps on another day I may make some recommendation with respect to this where indicated. But a coroner's inquest, properly carried out, is an investigative tribunal which does that function very well if it is thoroughly done.

Mr. Singer: It said 1921 in that report I quoted.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: They still do it well today.

Mr. Singer: Not with doctors running it.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Perhaps that is a point that is worthy of consideration.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, some of the comments the hon. Attorney General made can more appropriately be dealt with under specific estimates. I propose to do it in that fashion because I think it is the tidiest. But there are two or three that, I think, appropriately come under the main office. I think we may as well clear them away now.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Shall we go ahead with 201?

Mr. MacDonald: Vote 201 is the main office, Mr. Chairman. I do not know, Mr. Chairman, whether you can get some of the hon. gentlemen over here to treat their responsibilities in this House seriously, or whether they want to continue to act like teen-agers.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I want to come back to two of the points in which, with respect, the hon. Attorney General has rather unfairly twisted what I have had to say.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I am sorry if I did that. It was certainly unintentional.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, if it was unintentional, just let me show the hon. Attorney General where it was twisted. He said to me: "You are, in effect, saying that the news outlets are criminals."

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes.

Mr. MacDonald: All right. Let me, Mr. Chairman, read recommendation 16 of the Ontario Police Commission.

That the radio and television stations regularly transmitting racing results be prosecuted under Section 177(L)(1) of the Criminal Code. There can be no doubt that such information can have value only to off-track bettors and bookmakers and is therefore clearly within the wording of the section as "intending to assist in bookmaking, pool selling, betting and wagering."

In other words, Mr. Chairman, I would respectfully suggest that the hon. Attorney General does not need to accuse me of saying that these people are guilty. His agency, appointed by this government, has suggested to him that he should prosecute them because their actions can only assist in bookmaking.

If the hon. Attorney General thought I was saying that he was twisting the thing, I submit that this is precisely what the import of his statement was. And I think there is an obligation on the hon. Attorney General to state now whether he is going to prosecute. Because I submit these broadcasts can only assist illegal betting through the bookmaker. This is the only conceivable value it can be.

Now, another point on which the hon. Attorney General was a bit unfair. I just want to clarify this. I pointed out that in the studies in the United States, a fifth of the illegal betting is estimated by the most reputable and authoritative research people—the Senate investigating committee, that has been working on this for years. They have stated that one-fifth of the money that goes into illegal betting goes into the treasury of the underworld, and that one-half of that amount is used for protection money. What I said is, if that pattern applies in Ontario, then $45 million is being used as protection money. Obviously, I do not know for certain whether it is. The hon. Attorney General does not know whether it is. I would hate to believe that $45 million was being used for that purpose. But even if it was only $5 million that was being used to corrupt as protection money—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, if I have to continue to say it over and over, then conceivably these people will stop talking so they can understand what I am saying. I said, if the American—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. MacDonald: Do I have the floor, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Chairman: Order! I would ask the members to allow the speaker to continue without interruptions so we can carry on the business of the House.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I just want to say this: that the scandalous procedure we have had in this House this afternoon just proves that the fresh start that was made by this hon. Prime Minister in coming to grips with some of these problems and rescuing the Tory Party from the moral myopia in which they ignored violation of the law—

Several hon. members: Nonsense!

An hon. member: Get to the point. What vote are we on? What has that to do with the main office?

Mr. Chairman: Order! Order! I would ask the member to speak to the vote.

Mr. MacDonald: I am speaking, Mr. Chairman, on the main office.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. MacDonald: Exactly. On law enforcement in this province. It is rather interesting that he starts, it is to get me sitting down. He listened to this mob over here this afternoon and never once raised his voice.

Mr. Chairman: Order! I wish, when the speaker is on his feet, that he would direct his statements to the Minister of the department at this time.

Mr. MacDonald: What I stated, Mr. Chairman, and obviously I have to repeat it because it is being misconstrued—

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. MacDonald: Have I the floor, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Chairman: Continue!

Mr. MacDonald: Thank you. It is that if the American pattern, which is studied by people who know about it, is being applied in Ontario, then that means that $45 million is being spent for protection money in this province.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: That is supposition.

Mr. MacDonald: Correct. It is supposition, Mr. Chairman. And nobody can disprove that it is not happening.

Mr. L. M. Reilly (Eglinton): Not only supposition. It is nonsense.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, sir, the Attorney General of a few years ago said that organized crime was nonsense. This is the problem with this government. It very slowly comes to grips with this threat. That is the reason why I used the term "naïveté" this afternoon, because you are playing with fire and you do not know it.

That is the reason why I want to suggest this to the hon. Attorney General. His comment was that "this government now has the power to direct the Ontario Police Commission to complete its investigation." But since the Ontario Police Commission has said clearly that their report is an interim report, and that they have not completed the job, can I ask the hon. Attorney General why they would conceivably withhold the direction that the job should be completed as soon as possible?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: First of all, the bill is not yet law. I said that when the bill was effective legislation, then the government would determine what further direction the commission should be given. That is all the answer I propose to make at this time on that subject.

With respect to the question as to whether the Attorney General is going to prosecute newspapers, radio and television—

Mr. MacDonald: Newspapers were not included. Just radio and television.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I was going to say that newspapers should not be included because they are specifically exempted by the section of the code. They can publish betting results until doomsday, or racing results rather, and the odds and so on. They are specifically exempted by section 177 of the code. The section is so worded that it, I think, would make it extremely difficult to get evidence that would make a charge stand up against radio or television doing the same thing as the newspapers.

Mr. Bryden: Well, Mr. Chairman—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: But that is just my opinion at this moment. It is very easy to say prosecute them but you have to have the evidence to make your charge stand up.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the commission which made this report happens to be a judge and if he has not some appreciation of what is required in prosecuting I do not know who has. If he has not got at least that measure of appreciation, I do not know why he continues to sit on the bench. He, as chairman of the police commission, made this proposal and all I am suggesting to the hon. Attorney General is that it cannot be dismissed out of hand, because nobody can deny that the results of these broadcasts regularly on the half hour during the day is to assist the whole organization of bookmaking. And it is idle for this government to deplore illegal gambling and to tolerate assistance which is open and flagrant in this fashion.

I am not making the proposal. It is a judge who is now back on the bench and exercising his responsibilities.

The only other two brief comments I want to make at the moment, Mr. Chairman, because this is the appropriate place to deal with them. I think, is that in the used car business—if, indeed, it is accurate that the legislation that this government has brought in as a result of a report that has already been made—it is clear that the investigation was a façade, that it was not necessary at all because anybody could have told you beforehand that what you needed to do was to licence and set up some sort of a tribunal to review complaints. I claim no omniscience on this issue but, before the investigating commission was established, I suggested that this was an answer.

This clearly proves that the establishment of the commission was just something to appease the public and I submit to the Chairman that if this investigation has submitted a report then this House is entitled to get a copy of that report. I specifically ask the hon. Attorney General now: Did the report in any way comment on the activities of established used car dealers, not fringe operators, and does the government propose to take any specific action with regard to established used car dealers, rather than just the fringe fly-by-night operators?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: They are all included in the bill, every car dealer, not just those who deal in used cars alone. Everyone in the business.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, Mr. Chairman, it simply means this, that this government and this Attorney General's department having failed its responsibilities for years in coping with flagrant fraud and fleecing of the public is now going to wipe the slate clean so that these boys get off with it completely.

That is just what it adds up to. I do not happen to have the editorial here from the Globe and Mail but there was one editorial which very firmly stated to Mr. Cass that there were two jobs to be done. One is to pass the laws, another one is that if there is widespread violation of the law, you just do not shrug your shoulders and say "This is for the individual to take action in the courts." It is your responsibility to do something in coping with widespread violation of the law, both civil and criminal.

This government tolerated it for years and then belatedly they came into the picture and now apparently they are going to do nothing further about it.

My final point—the hon. Attorney General is a new man in the office and I want to be fair with him—Mr. Chairman: If the hon. Attorney General wants to ponder a little bit further on the Northern Ontario Natural Gas situation, fine, but I reiterate once again, it is a scandal for which this government must assume responsibility unless it very quickly clarifies the situation with regard to Mr. Justice Landreville. Because if he is not guilty, the cloud should be lifted from his reputation. If he is guilty, he should be removed from the bench.

As long as this government tolerates a situation like this for another day, it is responsible. There is no point in getting up and pleading for respect for the law because you are not going to get respect. Why should people have respect for the law? Why should they have respect for our courts? And why should they have respect for the judiciary, when you sit and do nothing when there are charges like this being made about a man who is sitting on the bench?

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. MacDonald: Resolve the charges!

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, before you leave vote 201, would the hon. Attorney General elucidate the $5,000 figure put in his estimates for Royal commissions, item number four?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The item of $5,000 is a nominal amount actually in the accounts for the purpose of paying disbursements with respect to Royal commissions.

Mr. Bryden: I assume it may be increased significantly?

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Dovercourt): Mr. Chairman, could I ask about bail under this estimate?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: About the subject of bail?

Mr. Thompson: Yes.

An hon. member: Bail and jail.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I do not know whether that is under this estimate or not. I think that would come under vote 207.

Vote 201 agreed to.

Vote 202 agreed to.

Vote 203 agreed to.

Vote 204 agreed to.

Vote 205 agreed to.

On vote 206:

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, as we all know, an unfortunate event occurred at a place called Reesor's Siding a little over a year ago. Three men were killed and eight were injured by gun fire. As a result of that incident, over 100 men who were on strike at the time were prosecuted and each of them was fined, well, at any rate, not all of them were convicted but most of them were convicted and those who were convicted were fined $200 each. In connection with the same incident, there were some people who were described as "settlers" who were not on strike but who had been cutting timber in the bush. Three men were charged in the first instance with non-capital murder and that charge was subsequently reduced to possession of offensive weapons. These charges were laid in connection with the deaths of the three men that I mentioned and injury to several others. The fines in these cases were $100, on the charge of possession of offensive weapons. In view of the fact that three men were killed and several were injured as a result of the possession and use of these offensive weapons, it seemed rather a light fine. It seemed that The Attorney General's Department considered it rather a light fine because at the time it indicated that it was going to appeal. But then we learned through the press on March 28, 1964, that:

The Ontario Court of Appeal ruled Thursday that The Attorney General's Department waited too long to appeal $100 fines levied against three Kapuskasing bushworkers last October. The court refused an application by the department for an extension of time in which an appeal could be filed. The department felt the penalty imposed was not severe enough.

I would like to find out what possible reason there could be for the failure of The Attorney General's Department which is fully familiar with the provisions of the criminal law and with the provisions regarding appeals in such cases, to apply for leave to appeal in time.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: All I am able to answer the hon. member for Woodbine at the moment, is that I know that the decision of the court he refers to was on a motion to extend the time for leave to appeal and the court refused. I am not able to answer at the moment why the appeal had not been filed within the ordinary time allowed. But I would be glad to get further information on that, given the opportunity to do so.

Mr. Bryden: Well, Mr. Chairman, I would suggest to the Attorney General that while he is looking into the matter he might inquire into the handling of this whole affair from beginning to end. It is incredible that the only charge laid when three men were killed was a charge of possession of offensive weapons.

Let me put it this way: initially the charge was non-capital murder, but this was reduced by a grand jury, as I understand the procedure, which held that there was not sufficient evidence for a more serious charge. Now, I want to know why the grand jury did not have the evidence before it.

It would seem to me there was bungling of this case from beginning to end. In fact it is very hard for the layman, and particularly the layman affected in that part of the country, to believe that The Attorney General's Department and the authority charged with the administration of justice had their hearts in this case from the very beginning.

Quite true, in regard to the unarmed workers, who were fired upon and who were charged with unlawful assembly, I believe the case against them was proceeded with with utmost despatch and I am not suggesting they should have got off. If they broke the law they should have paid the penalty and they were, on the basis of the evidence, fined $200.

But they were the people who were on the receiving end of the gunfire. They did not fire the guns, they did not even have guns. Then how was it that in the case of the people who were on the firing end, adequate evidence could not be collected, first of all, to sustain the laying of a charge which would seem to be in keeping with the nature of the offence? Then, after even the reduced offence was dealt with in the most lenient manner, how was it that the department could not take action to place an appeal in the normal course of events?

I am suggesting to the hon. Attorney General that the people who are affected cannot help but think, on the basis of any evidence they have before them now—and on the basis of any information from this department or any other government source, they are entitled to think—that there was no serious effort to make these charges stick or even to see that the accused were faced with proper charges in court.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I do not know what the hon. member might expect in the way of an answer to his diatribe, if I may call it that. Here was a situation of two milling crowds of very opposed ideas, meeting at night and shots are fired and three are killed.

It is deplorable, of course! Terrible, of course!

There were some policemen in the area, and they were on the scene. But it is one thing to say they should have been found guilty, they should have been charged with murder, and to get the evidence to prove it. The justice who attended at the assize was Mr. Justice McRuer—Chief Justice McRuer—a most capable, respected, eminent and able judge.

Now we come to the matter of evidence. I am not prepared to say, or even to suggest, that every effort was not made—I think it was made, to find out who fired the shots. But in those circumstances apparently it was not possible to do so. A charge of non-capital murder was laid and the men charged went before their own peers and equals, the grand jury, and all the evidence that was available was placed before that type of court and they said there is no bill on that charge.

This is the administration of justice. To say that there was not an effort made to get the evidence is something that I cannot stand here and substantiate nor deny, because I am not aware of any such situation. For the hon. member to stand up and say that I think is very unfair. If he has proof that no effort was made to find the evidence, let him say so. So far as the situation is concerned, I have told him how it was dealt with and I have no criticism to offer for the way the administration of justice was carried out.

Mr. Bryden: I want to make it clear, since the hon. Attorney General brings in the courts, I did not say anything in any way casting any reflection on the courts. I am quite satisfied that the courts acted on the basis of the evidence presented to them. I have no doubt about that at all. So perhaps we can keep that red herring out of the picture altogether and just get down to what is before us here tonight, and that is The Department of the Attorney General.

I have been told by representatives of the Lumber and Sawmill Workers Union—I believe the government has been, too—that there were people who had material information to give to the grand jury who were never called before it although they were ready to go. Now I think there should be an explanation of that.

Perhaps the hon. Attorney General could get away with his answer with regard to the case presented to the grand jury, but I do not see how he can possibly get away with this. How on earth can he explain the failure to apply for leave to appeal within the required time? It seems to me that the entire mulling of the case requires a very careful investigation of the way it was handled from the very beginning.

I would like to know—since I have raised the matter, I would like to carry it a little further—I would like to go back to the time of the event, I would like to refer to an item that appeared in the Northern Daily News of Kirkland Lake. It was headed “Kapus-kasing Tragedy—A Reproach to All.”

Mr. A. H. Cowling (High Park): What is the date on that?

Mr. Bryden: This was at the time, it was February 13. It was just after the unfortunate incident at Reesor's Siding.

Mr. Cowling: In 1963?

Mr. Bryden: February 13, 1963. It is a little over a year ago:

So senseless was the slaughter a man can only experience a terrifying sensation of being back in the dark ages. He has trouble believing it actually occurred in this supposedly enlightened day.

Out of the shocked reaction there is certain to come a tide of criticism of the provincial government and the Ontario Provincial Police charged with preventing violence and bloodshed in a situation that has threatened to burst daily into flame during the past month.

That it could have been prevented seems obvious.

Everyone in the province, including Premier Robarts, unless he has had his ears stuffed with pulpwood, knew the settlers were armed and ready to shoot in defence of their right to transport pulpwood to the mills.

Yet an OPP on duty where the outbreak finally came is quoted as saying afterwards he didn't know the settlers had guns. If he didn't know then he must have been the only adult in the province who was unaware of the fact. People 500 miles from the scene could have told him about the guns.

Most dreadful feature of the case, apart from the government and police inaction that permitted the bloodshed to occur, is lack of reasoning behind the settlers' action.

Then it goes on to deal with the settlers. I will not bother reading that particular portion. A little later it says:

The only poor, miserable grain of comfort in the sorry situation lies in the fact it wasn't the strikers who did the shooting. Had that been the case the whole province would be aflame with headlines about their viciousness. We would be lucky if killings were not followed up by lynchings.

Now that it is too late we presume the settlers will be disarmed, police reinforcements rushed in by the hundreds and a tight lid clamped on the region.

But if the whole grisly affair doesn't rock the government and prompt an overhaul of The Attorney General's Department and the Ontario Provincial Police, then the whole lot of us can be pre-judged guilty of setting the stage for the next act of violence.

That is the Northern Daily News of Kirkland Lake. That editorial was written before any charges were laid. It was just after the event. It suggested at an even earlier stage that there was something gravely wrong in the activities of the Ontario Provincial Police. They were not on top of the situation. From what I have heard—I was not there—in talking to people who were there, and confirmed by this comment from a newspaper which admittedly is not in the immediate area but is in northern Ontario, everybody knew that real trouble was brewing, that these men had guns and that if they had guns there was a danger they would use them. The Attorney General's Department and the provincial police did not take the sort of decisive action that was required in the situation. Then, when following their lack of action, actual shootings occurred and men were killed, there was still a failure, in my submission—or at least grounds to believe that there was a failure—to follow up and take proper action under the law. The thing has been handled in a slipshod manner from beginning to end. I will read another editorial comment on this from the Toronto Globe and Mail, a newspaper which I do not think this government would consider to be an irresponsible newspaper. This was on October 19, 1963.

The people of Ontario have not yet received a satisfactory explanation why only 25 police reinforcements were sent to the area when violence threatened, involving 1,000 independent lumber cutters and 3,500 strikers. There were these recorded warnings: A union leader was quoted as speaking of raids by hundreds of men. An independent trucker told of being dragged from his vehicle as four Ontario Provincial Police stood by. The Mayor of Kapuskasing warned that the settlers were going into the bush with guns and were desperate enough to shoot. Two clergymen called for an increase in the number of police. An independent logging jobber suggested the situation was so ugly that consideration should be given to bringing in the militia. Independent truckers complained of threatening phone calls.

Yet police were not dispatched in sufficient numbers to keep the peace until three strikers had been shot and killed and nine others injured.

Three independent bush workers have been fined $100 each for their part in the incident, in which hundreds of striking union members raided the camps of 20 independents. One hundred and thirty-eight of the strikers have been fined $200 each. The 20 settlers were originally charged with non-capital murder, but the major charge was dropped after a grand jury examined the case. Mr. Laforce says—that is Joe LaForce who was then president of one of the locals of the Lumber and Sawmill Workers Union:

Mr. Laforce says that the result of the grand jury hearing "makes a mockery out of justice in this part of Ontario," and that it indicates the Ontario Provincial Police, by failing to gather sufficient evidence, is not upholding the laws of the province.

Opinions on the court's decisions may, of course, vary. But one thing is clear. Law and order broke down at Reesor Siding one day in February. The public is entitled to know why.

Mr. Chairman, that editorial arose in connection with a request made to the government by Mr. Laforce, on behalf of the Lumber and Sawmill Workers Union, that a Royal commission should be appointed to inquire into the whole matter. I am going to ask the government why it is not prepared to appoint a Royal commission.

I would submit to the hon. Attorney General that, on the face of it, there are too many unanswered questions. There are adequate grounds for investigation at every stage of this proceeding into the law enforcement before the overt violence occurred; into the way in which the charges against these people were handled; into the failure to launch an appeal from the obviously ridiculous penalties that were imposed by the court. All of these matters should be inquired into.

The people have a right to know. Particularly the people in the area have a right to know what happened. If there was no breakdown in law enforcement, then that fact should be clearly established. If there was a breakdown, something should be done to make sure it will not happen again.

I would like to point out to the hon. Attorney General and the government that there are negotiations in this industry coming up again this year. There was a most unfortunate occurrence as we all know, last year. The whole strike was mishandled by the government and by The Department of Labour from beginning to end. As a result, things finally blew up in violence, serious and regrettable violence, and the mood of the people now is a lot worse than it was then because of the events that have transpired.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): That is not true.

Mr. Bryden: It is true. The mood of the people is a lot worse than it was because of the events that have transpired. I am suggesting to the hon. Attorney General that if he is concerned about maintaining law and order in this province, and in that specific part of it, the air should be cleared now before those negotiations proceed. If there is another strike there, heaven help us. I do not know what might happen. But let us not run the risk of it happening. Let us get this situation cleared up now.

Surely the hon. Attorney General cannot tell us that this matter has been satisfactorily explained. From beginning to end, there are unanswered questions as to what happened and why action was not taken adequately at the various stages along the way. I am suggesting to him that this should be looked into at all stages, including the activities of his own department, by some independent person. I am suggesting further that the scope of the inquiry should be broadened to look into the whole causes of the discontent in that area of the province to determine why these people have been driven to the sort of situation where man has been pitted against man to the point where even—

Mr. Chairman: Order! The member has asked two questions, one further question and then one question in connection with the appointment of a Royal commission. I feel that the Minister should be allowed to answer those two questions.

Mr. Bryden: If he wishes.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I have some information for the hon. member. I think there is no doubt it was a deplorable thing which everybody, without question, deplores. It was a tragedy. We can all agree with the hon. member on that. But I would say it is so easy to be wise after the event.

My information is that there were 12 constables at the scene where this took place. They did their best in the circumstances to prevent any such thing as this. But who is to say, if there had been ten times the number there, that this could have been prevented? There were many who implored that no constables be sent there. Who is to say what was the wise action to follow?

As to the investigation, there was sent immediately to the scene a staff inspector, the most senior man, and two inspectors of the Criminal Investigation Branch of the Ontario Provincial Police. All persons who could possibly be found who knew anything about it—more than 100—were interviewed, some in French, some in English or whatever the language they spoke. The investigation and the criminal prosecution was under the direction of Mr. Colbeck, one of the most experienced, mostly highly respected and regarded Crown attorneys in the province. He was in charge of it. I have told you about the justice who sat on the bench.

Now, if the hon. member is still referring to the question of why more evidence was not found, I just cannot give him any more in the way of an answer. I think it was a situation in which, out of the night, there came this shooting. It was just impossible to bring it home to the persons who pulled the triggers. I do not know any other answer that one can possibly give.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I am quite prepared to agree with the hon. Attorney General that it is always easy to be wise after the event. There is also an old saying that justice not only must be done, but it must be seen to be done. I am trying to tell the hon. Attorney General, and he should surely know anyway, that there are a large number of people involved who, at the present time, are not satisfied that justice was done or that everything requisite was done to ensure that justice would be done.

Is it not a fact that the government had a request several months ago from the Lumber and Sawmill Workers Union—which is one of the major parties involved in this whole affair in Northern Ontario and will continue to be involved, no doubt for many years, in labour negotiations and labour disputes of one kind and another—that that union told the government in no uncertain terms that they were not satisfied with the way the thing was handled and that they wanted a Royal commission?

I am suggesting to the hon. Minister that there are enough unanswered questions that they have a right to feel dissatisfied; that they have a right to ask for the answers to those questions. Their request is not frivolous. If it were a frivolous request, okay. But there is certainly enough doubt about the whole matter that it ought to be inquired into so that these people will be satisfied that everything possible was done, if indeed it was done. If it was not done, then something should then be done to rectify the situation. But no sense of confidence in the law enforcement agencies of the province is going to be produced as long as this situation continues unresolved. Does the government simply say: "We did the best we could," or "As far as we know the people concerned did the best they could; and we have nothing more to say about it"? I think it is reasonable to suggest that this party, an important party representing a large number of men including the men who were killed, that its request was a reasonable one. It is reasonable therefore, indeed it is essential, that the request be granted in order to clear the air for future negotiations.

I am going to suggest also that the subject of the inquiry should be broader than just this one incident, because this incident developed out of a long history of discontent in the industry, of discontent of working men who believed that they were being dealt with unfairly. I think that the inquiry should cover the whole matter of the application of The Labour Relations Act to this particular industry. There are difficulties into which I shall not go because they more properly belong under other estimates, but they are there and they should be inquired into.

There should be an inquiry into the whole policy with regard to the issuance of timber-cutting licenses—that is a matter which we can go into in further detail when the estimates of Lands and Forests come before us—but all of these matters should be looked into. This is still an explosive situation and I think the government should do everything possible to clear the air, especially with a new round of negotiations coming up. Let us hope that the negotiations are concluded amicably without any disputes at all, but we all know that in this type of industry disputes under the best of circumstances are difficult to deal with. If there is no attempt to clear the air with regard to the last series of events, then I feel very alarmed at the prospects in the event that there is a breakdown of negotiations in the coming year.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, there are two or three items I want to raise under this broad estimate of the administration of justice, but I just want to add a brief footnote to what my hon. colleague has said with regard to this.

There was an interjection from one of the hon. government members when it was said that the lumber and sawmill union had asked for a Royal commission. Mr. Chairman, may I draw to the attention of the hon. Attorney General it is not only the union which has asked for a Royal commission. As a matter of fact the municipalities and many other bodies in the area felt that there should be a Royal commission to resolve basic conflicts out of which another event like this can rise. Namely, the fact that the companies have on the one hand workers who are their own employees in the union, and they have also timber being cut on settlers' permits. They are in a position where they can play one off against another—a perfect setup for another explosion.

The second brief comment I want to make is, as my hon. colleague said, not only that justice should be done but that justice should appear to be done. The incredible thing in this instance is that even The Department of the Attorney General was not satisfied that justice did appear to be done, so they decided to appeal; but they muffed the appeal. This was the final bit of mishandling in what many people believe was not a well handled affair from the outset.

However, Mr. Chairman, I want to go on to a few other items under the administration of justice. During the past two or three weeks the hon. Attorney General has received, I am informed, repeated—

Mr. Chairman: We are on vote 206; 207 is the administration of justice.

Mr. MacDonald: I am sorry.

Vote 206 agreed to.

On vote 207:

Mr. MacDonald: During the last few weeks, Mr. Chairman, the hon. Attorney General has received representations from a number of people in the area of Brockville with regard to the unsuitability of the magistrate who is now presiding in the courts in that area. Last Friday's Globe and Mail carried a story, the first paragraph of which reads:

The Augusta township area school board has asked The Ontario Attorney General's Department to dismiss Magistrate Gordon Jermyn as a result of remarks he made in a recent case.

I have a letter from a person in the area who points out that a petition has been sent to the hon. Attorney General. It was signed by the reeve of Augusta township, by a minister of the United Church, by several school teachers and at least two prominent businessmen.

They have only approached some people in the area, they have not had time to get as exhaustive a petition as obviously would be available. This correspondent of mine stated that he had contacted the mayor of the city of Brockville who indicated that he had already, in his capacity of mayor, forwarded a protest to the hon. Attorney General; and that the reeve of Augusta township informed him that as early as January, 1964, the county councils of Leeds and Grenville placed an order on the books complaining about Magistrate Jermyn's unreasonable judgments.

As I have been given the story, there has been a growing sense of public indignation with regard to the judgments of this magistrate, but it apparently has reached an explosive point recently in his handling of a case concerning a school teacher who strapped a child and then was assaulted by the mother, the father, an older brother of the child and some friends of the family. In the course of the representations that were made—or rather in the course of the trial—the magistrate made this kind of a comment, to give you an example of the kind of man that the petitioners claim him to be. As reported in the Brockville paper, Magistrate Jermyn is quoted as saying:

If I did not get an explanation from him [the teacher] I would probably have done what they did. He should not have strapped the girl.

However, I agree with the Crown that all went out with a concerted effort to clobber him and they did.

In other words, here is a magistrate who is not dealing with the charge before him, a charge of assault, but is presuming to deal with what happened earlier in the school room. Indeed he not only presumed, he went so far as to say at one point in Johns-ton's testimony—that is the teacher's testimony—and I quote:

I give you two to one I could walk into class and keep better order than this man can.

Now obviously, Mr. Chairman, this person is simply not suitable to be sitting on the bench. This is only the last case of an accumulation of which I have in my files. I do not want to take the time to put on the record the examples of this kind of comment and extremely bad judgment in assessing cases that are brought before him. In fact, I would finally put it in the quiet tones of the editorial of the Brockville Recorder. On April 23 they said this:

From time to time this newspaper receives letters expressing concern about the magistrates' courts in this area. One such letter appears in other columns on this page.

Court decisions bring mixed reactions from the general public. The conduct of the court sometimes causes concern in the degree of connection with any particular case. It has not necessarily a bearing on the resulting public opinion. Courts are not above public opinion.

Recent reaction to the magistrates' courts in this area, particularly the conduct of cases reveal aroused public opinion. People who are never likely to become involved with the law personally, but people who are interested in the dignity of the court and respect for the law have been upset by the lack of judgment apparent in some decisions and in the conduct of the courts. These people feel that the law and all officials concerned with it exist to serve the citizens with as much dignity and fairness as possible.

And that includes the witnesses as well as the accused. The magistrates' courts in this area, Brockville, Prescott, and Kemptville, are open to criticism. Not the same magistrate serves all of them, but all leave much to be desired in both consistency in judgment and the conduct of the court. When Crown witnesses are abused, when decisions are given which flout the evidence, when trial sites are traversed to provide privilege to persons wishing to avoid publicity, one can only have the feeling that the courts have deteriorated.

As the letter writer asked, to whom are these magistrates responsible for their behaviour? They are accountable to the public in the end, but insofar as the people are represented by the government, this newspaper has commented before that there is need for closer scrutiny of our courts by The Attorney General's Department with perhaps the creation of an office of magistrate general, staffed by people who can assist in the conduct in magistrates' courts across the province. Some magistrates may not make the grade with even the assistance, but only in this manner are we going to get any assistance in the conduct of our courts and in decisions. Not enough attention is paid to magistrates' courts by The Attorney General's Department.

Now I come back to the question that was asked in this letter and quoted in the editorial. To whom are these magistrates accountable for their behaviour? I put that question to the hon. Attorney General and ask what is the intention of his department in this case?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I will reply to the first part of the question. I would say the hon. member will appreciate this incident is recent and material in the nature of complaints has just been received. I will say this, that it is being considered and is being studied.

As to what may be done, The Magistrates Act, which is Chapter 226 of the Revised Statutes of Ontario, gives the answer. It is rather brief and I can read it. Section 3 of that Act is as follows:

Except as provided in section 2—which does not really have any bearing:

—magistrates shall hold office during pleasure.

And then subsection 2:

A magistrate who has held office for two years may be removed from office before attaining retirement age only for misbehaviour or for inability to perform his duties properly and only if

(i) the circumstances respecting the misbehaviour or inability are first inquired into, and

(ii) the magistrate is given reasonable notice of the time and place appointed for the inquiry and is afforded an opportunity of himself or his counsel being heard and of cross-examining witnesses and producing evidence on his own behalf.

A magistrate, I may say, is appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in council. Then the subsection goes on:

The Lieutenant-Governor in council, for the purpose of making an inquiry under subsection 2, may appoint one or more judges of the Supreme Court to make such inquiry and to report thereon, and the judge so appointed has all the powers that may be conferred upon a commissioner under The Public Inquiries Act.

Then I might read this further subsection:

Where a magistrate is removed from office under this section, the order affecting the removal and all reports, evidence and correspondence relating thereto shall be laid before the assembly by the Attorney General within the first 15 days of the next ensuing session.

So, as I say, the matter has just come to the attention of my department, it is being considered, and I have outlined the procedure which would be followed if it were felt necessary to decide if a magistrate should be removed. The decision would not be the Attorney General's, it would not be the government's; it would be a decision held after an inquiry before judges of the Supreme Court appointed for that purpose.

Mr. MacDonald: It is the hon. Attorney General's decision to appoint such an inquiry?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: It would be my responsibility to recommend to the Lieutenant-Governor in council.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, while we are dealing with the conduct of magistrates, is it correct that another magistrate in the southern part of the province has voluntarily resigned recently for conduct unbecoming a magistrate?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Recently?

Mr. MacDonald: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I do recall the resignation of a magistrate coming to my desk some four weeks ago or thereabouts and his resignation was accepted.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, a year or so ago there was a rather amusing little episode when a paper in Timiskaming riding carried a story from a meeting of the Progressive-Conservative Association to the effect that it had recommended a certain person to be appointed as sheriff. I queried the hon. Attorney General's predecessor as to whether or not this was normal procedure—that recommendations for appointments came from the local Conservative association. I repeat—it was a little amusing and we let the matter rest there.

Subsequently there has been an appointment as sheriff of one Robert McArthur. I am informed, reliably, that Mr. McArthur owns and controls the McArthur Mining Machinery Company, which has lost some of its property to the town of Cobalt for non-payment of taxes, and that he and his company have been sued in divisional and district courts. Indeed, as of two or three months ago, there were two suits still outstanding. On one occasion it was for non-payment of wages in 1962 under The Servants and Masters Act. Further, back in 1940 or 1941 this same gentleman was charged with highgrading but there was no conviction in the particular case.

Is this accurate, Mr. Chairman, and if so may I ask the hon. Attorney General how he can justify the appointment of such a person as sheriff?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I must confess I missed some of the hon. member's remarks. The hon. member said, "Is this accurate?" Does he mean the report that he read?

Mr. MacDonald: I mean these stories that I am giving about the record of this man, and if so, how can the hon. Attorney General justify the appointment of such a man as sheriff?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: First of all, I do not know that the reports are accurate. I have never heard of it before. I have never heard a word of it before.

Mr. MacDonald: Was the appointment made on the recommendation of the local association?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Unless some of my staff can tell me, I cannot tell the hon. member that. I do not know, but I can find out.

Mr. MacDonald: I guess it is highly appropriate that the hon. Attorney General should smile when he gives that reply.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No, it is not, that is my reply. I do not know. I have never heard of the man. The matter may have come across my desk, but I do not recall the name. I know nothing of this and I would not answer the hon. member otherwise.

Mr. MacDonald: I would appreciate it, Mr. Chairman, if the hon. Attorney General would, when he has looked into the matter—and perhaps that may not be until after the session—confirm whether or not what I have put on the record is accurate in terms of the record of this man who was appointed as sheriff. If so, I want to suggest to him now that it is not a proper appointment.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I do not intend to delay my reply. I only smiled because I said

I could find out. I meant I will find out. I know nothing of this matter at this moment. Yet it may have come across my desk and may have received my signature. But I will find out. I do not think it was my appointment.

Mr. MacDonald: No, no, it was before this Attorney General's time.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well then, I know nothing of it.

Mr. MacDonald: It was the department that made the appointment.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: What about the fellow who stole the $140,000?

Mr. MacDonald: He was not appointed as sheriff.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: He held a high office in the hon. member's party.

Mr. MacDonald: Look, Mr. Chairman, what relevancy has this got?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: It is just as relevant as what the hon. member was talking about.

Mr. MacDonald: What relevancy, Mr. Chairman, has this? I have cited incidents in the records of this man. I have asked for confirmation, and if so, why was he appointed as sheriff, and this has absolutely no relevance at all. This is another little old Tory principle, that two wrongs make a right.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I have received a communication from a man who was chosen for a grand jury in the Parry Sound area within recent months, this year. He was foreman of the grand jury and—

An hon. member: Is it signed?

Mr. MacDonald: Yes, it is signed. The grand jury was given a number of functions. One of them was to look into—as grand juries often do—the buildings locally. It was given a third responsibility, related as follows in a communication which I have received:

It was our duty to check the prisoners held in the jail to make certain that no one was being held without knowing the charges against him and without having been brought to trial. The judge proceeded to point out that for certain legal reasons which he could not tell us, we would not be allowed to go to the place where prisoners were lodged. This is the particular matter that concerned me. He said he would send the sheriff to examine the prisoners and he would report back to us.

As we waited for the sheriff to report on the prisoners we were told he would not be reporting to us. We then proceeded to the courtroom. There we were told by the judge that we would have to accept the sheriff's word that no person was being held without knowing the charge or without being brought to trial.

One grand juror said he had been on the grand jury before and on that occasion the foreman had gone to the prisoners and asked them individually about the charges and the trials. He told us this in our private room, not in the courthouse.

As a member of the jury I did not know whether any prisoner was being improperly held. The point disturbed me and has ever since, so I wanted to ask someone, such as yourself, if the procedures that I have outlined were proper.

Mr. Chairman, I do not happen to be familiar with the normal procedures in connection with the grand jury. However, when a specific responsibility is given to a grand jury, what explanation can the hon. Attorney General give for refusing to permit it to carry out its responsibility—for saying that it must be done by the sheriff, and then subsequently saying that the sheriff is not going to report back?

Now I must say as a layman I have had growing questions in my mind with regard to the whole functions of grand juries. I have heard Minister after Minister get up when we would face them with the recommendations of a grand jury and dismiss them as being irresponsible. We had this as a matter of fact the other day, from the hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond) with regard to a recent grand jury report on 999 Queen Street. It raises the whole question as to the function of a grand jury and whether or not it is an outmoded function.

But presumably it is now the law, it operates in accordance with prescribed procedures. Is it the right of the judge, in this instance, to tell the jurors that they cannot get the facts for reasons that he will not explain? To say the sheriff will get it and then the sheriff does not report back? What is the hon. Attorney General's comment on this whole business?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: First of all, I rather think there are some inaccuracies in the report you received.

Second, I would say that if the gentleman who took the trouble to write to you would care to write to me, I would investigate all that he says.

Mr. MacDonald: All that is irrelevant. He was foreman of the jury.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I do not deny his right to write to any hon. member of this House, but I say if he would write to me I will be glad to investigate.

Mr. MacDonald: That is very condescending.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: But I say this also: I presume this was the Supreme Court and that a Supreme Court judge was sitting. It is the duty and function of the grand jury, after dealing with the bills which are brought it or the indictments which are brought before it, to inspect public buildings. Quite often a Supreme Court judge will say that this has been done within the past six months or a certain period of time, it will not be necessary to do it again. This is on buildings such as hospitals, jails and other public buildings, including the courthouse itself. If it were actually said that you cannot see the prisoners in the jail, I would like to know this.

Mr. MacDonald: That was said.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: If this was said, there is this still to be said: The sheriff is the responsible officer reporting to that judge of the Supreme Court. The Crown attorney of the district is an officer of the court, and I suggest and point out to the House that his duty is not only as a prosecuting officer, but as an officer to see that justice is done and properly administered, for the benefit of the accused or any citizen or any prisoners as well as for the Crown. He stands there and reports to the judge.

I seriously doubt if what has been reported to my hon. friend is correct. I think the short answer is that if this may be reported to me it will have the utmost thorough investigation.

Mr. MacDonald: Just a minute now, Mr. Chairman. This man happens to be a school teacher who is a reputable member in the community. He was foreman of the jury. May I ask the hon. Attorney General what aspect is he denying as being accurate?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I doubt that the judge forbade him to go to the jail, to see the prisoners.

Mr. MacDonald: I am very glad to get this on the record, because I have quoted directly from his letter. He is a responsible person in the community. He was foreman of the jury and I am quoting exactly what he said and it is in the record.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Right!

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, a person who is over 21, of sane mind and is a reputable person in the community chosen as foreman of the jury, is not going to make a mistake on this kind of factual situation. However, Mr. Chairman, I leave it with the hon. Attorney General to look into the matter.

Mr. Thompson: Under vote 207, Mr. Chairman, I understood the hon. Attorney General to say that I could raise the question of bail. Am I right? Thank you.

I noticed, and I am quoting from papers because I am not a lawyer myself, something that concerns me because of some people who come to me in my own riding and also from the newspaper reports. I am quoting from the Globe and Mail of Saturday, February 8. I notice a headline:

BAIL'S MERIT OUTLIVED, LAW PROFESSOR SAYS

Bail for accused persons has outlived its usefulness, Martin L. Friedland, an assistant professor at Osgoode Hall Law School, said yesterday.

I could go on, but I think perhaps the hon. Attorney General is well acquainted with the arguments that were raised. I noticed an item before that in the Globe and Mail, on February 14, 1963, and I expect that the hon. Attorney General is also acquainted with the article by Ruth Worth in which she suggests: "For the rich bail; for the poor?"

Then, sir, if I could raise my last point taken from your own government members, I would refer to the speech by the hon. member for Lakeshore (Mr. Eagleson) on March 20, 1964. He suggested, and I quote his remarks:

Another matter that should be looked into with a great deal of thought at this time, is the matter of bail in our province. As the law presently stands, an indigent accused often finds himself languishing in jail, whereas the person who has been more successful or fortunate enough to have friends to raise the bail, finds himself free.

I am sure that the hon. Attorney General also has read those remarks. I wonder, sir, if having looked at this, and I realize that this is a portfolio that he is just taking over, but could he comment in connection with what his plans might be or what he is going to do in connection with bail?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I can only answer part of the question. I am aware of the articles to which the hon. member referred. I am aware of the discussion which arose at the midwinter meeting of the bar association, and the matter of bail was discussed there as the article reported. As to what my department is going to do, I have no answer at this time.

It is a matter that, again, has come to my attention in the brief time I have had this portfolio and I have not got a programme at this moment to report to the House. But it is definitely one that is deserving of consideration and it will receive it.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): Mr. Chairman, on this subject, I wonder if the hon. member would care to offer some suggestions to this problem? It is a problem that concerns my department a great deal, because it is obvious that there is a great deal of resentment on the part of many inmates who have been committed because they cannot pay their bail, cannot raise bail.

It concerns us a great deal, but obviously the hon. member must realize that it is not as simple as it sounds to the ordinary person when you phrase the question as simply as that: why should a person who cannot raise bail be committed, as against a person who has money and is able to raise the bail? The question is what happens to a person who would just refuse to pay his fine, for example, or to raise the bail when he is able to do so merely because he knows that nothing will happen to him if he does not?

Does he have any suggestion as to what the solution for this problem would be?

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, I would be glad to reply with suggestions that have been put forward.

I agree that it is a complex problem. Not being a lawyer I would just restate, sir, that it sometimes seems to me, when a man comes up for bail and he has a job, a wife and children but has not sufficient funds, depending again on the crime, it seems to me in some cases unjust that a man should be expected to have a large sum of money handy immediately in order to be released. Looking at that kind of man in that situation it would seem that perhaps bail may not be required.

I would ask the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions to look at some of the suggestions that have been made—for example in this article by Ruth Worth. These are some examples of what is done in the United States through licensing of professional bondsmen who charge a percentage of the bail. I understand from some of my legal colleagues that this is a particular approach they look on with some concern. But there are other suggestions—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Do you agree with that?

Mr. Thompson: As I say, I would think that something must be done.

I say again I am not a lawyer, but time after time we have seen a situation where some man has been held in jail for a long time because he could not raise bail. I appreciate, as the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions has suggested, it is a complex question. The government, in order to deal with it, must look at all points of view and I would not stand here at this point other than raising it to you—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I would like to get the benefit of your experience.

Mr. Thompson: I would suggest, sir, if I could, to the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions that for him, like me, it might be helpful advice to read the several—he has read it?—then he must realize that there are a number of alternative suggestions. Perhaps the hon. Minister could get together with the hon. Attorney General and come to a solution.

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): Mr. Chairman, I would just like to add a word on this. I think it has been obvious to most lawyers, especially around the city hall in this city, that the vast majority of charges, and the vast majority of individuals who come in conflict with the law, do not need bail. There are very few individuals who are going to run away because of the charges placed against them.

Again it depends upon the charge, of course. If it is a major offence like armed robbery or something of that type, naturally the authorities should be very difficult to deal with. They have to be tough with these people. But the vast majority of cases that come before the courts involve liquor or the impaired driver. It is ridiculous to hold an impaired driver in jail overnight; the police should put him in a taxi and send him home. Many of these men who are charged with being impaired have never been in trouble in their lives before; as far as the moral turpitude of their acts is concerned, they have not been involved in any type of theft.

These men do not need bail and I suggest that at least the courts should experiment with doing away with bail. Start with this type of offence to see how it works. Of course, if it is abused, then the experiment will have to stop. Maybe it would be something to experiment with. But from what experience I have had I would say that the vast majority of people who come in conflict with the law do not require bail.

This subject is brought up year in and year out. Now we have a new Attorney General and I hope he will take a new look at it. This should be obvious, I think, to any lawyer in Ontario. Fortunately the present Attorney General has had a vast amount of practical experience. From what I have learned of the new Attorney General, Mr. Chairman, I think he has got this practical experience and should be able to get a quick grasp of the question of bail. I hope that he will do something in the immediate future, because this goes on and on and yet so many experienced people ask why do they bother with the present bail system.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think perhaps it might be helpful if I should add to the remarks I made to the hon. member for Dovercourt, that the committee on legal aid is giving this very matter a great deal of study.

It is, in a sense, sir, very closely related to the matter of legal aid. I am advised that a good look is being taken at what is known as the Manhattan bail project, which was instituted in New York and which has worked very well. This involves having a prisoner released on his own recognizance or a very minimum bail or no bail at all. It gets him back to work and takes him off the country. Generally this sort of thing has worked extremely well. I would just like to reassure the hon. members of this House that this matter is, as I said in my earlier remarks, receiving consideration. I trust that something can be done and done before too long.

Mr. Thompson: This is again from experience in my aiding office in the evenings. I have encountered several situations where deserted wives have come to ask if something could be done about husbands residing in another province. I am thinking of one case, particularly, in Manitoba. You go through a certain procedure of writing letters to be told about a method of co-operation in trying to ascertain the whereabouts of the husband in another province. There is some laxity as shown in articles I have read. I am wondering, has there been an approach to tighten this up in any way, when men leave wives and families and move into another province?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: This is again a very difficult matter to deal with in a satisfactory way. The law and the means are available. We have reciprocal arrangements with all the provinces of Canada to pursue and bring back persons who fled in this way and who are subject to obligations which they fail to carry out and which they are trying to evade. We can enforce the orders which are made in Ontario in another province, but the type of person who seeks to evade the order is the type to keep on evading and running and making it extremely difficult to catch up with him and to enforce the order. Much is being done. I do not suggest that the most perfect effort has been put forward, but every effort that seems reasonable and within reasonable limits is being carried forward. We have reciprocal arrangements with all the provinces in this regard.

Mr. Thompson: Probably there are technical aspects to this question but I had a case in which there was a man with two children born in Canada. The family courts had ordered that he should not see the children, and then last Christmas he took the children to another country. I was told that nothing could be done about this, owing to certain technicalities. I should probably go further into it with the hon. Attorney General rather than to ask it on the floor of the House. But again there was the case of a husband leaving his family and provincial welfare being needed in the situation. I just question whether there is an adequate approach with other countries or if one is possible.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I must confess, I find it impossible to answer the question unless I know the facts a little more definitely—the type of order that was made, the court that made it and the terms of the order. I cannot say yes or no on the facts as presented. I do not think the hon. member could expect me to say anything more at this time. I would be glad if he would come and discuss it with me because it is a matter which we should like to pursue. It is a complex and difficult thing. Anyway, we can tighten it up and we would be glad to do it.

Mr. Trotter: Mr. Chairman, I would just like to mention at this point the low pay that assistant Crown attorneys receive here in Ontario. I think when a new Crown attorney is taken on he gets something in the neighbourhood of a little over $6,000. The unfortunate part about it is that these fellows are bright enough, they get good training in working in the Crown attorney's department, but then, of course, with that pay and the slow raises they get, they are not going to stay there too long. They go and do private practice. As a result, the taxpayer is paying for a post-graduate course.

Many of these men I feel would stay with the Crown attorney's department if they received a proper salary. They start around $6,200 and in due course they get around $8,000. A few of them, especially if they become Crown attorneys, do better than that. But they do not do too well and if we are going to have a proper administration of justice, Mr. Chairman, we are going to need trained personnel and a lot of that training is really experience.

So often here in Toronto you just get to know the assistant Crown attorneys and the first thing you know a new batch appears. The men who have been there for two or three years have gone on to better things in private practice and the department starts training a new batch all over again.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Why would the hon. member want to get to know the Crown attorneys?

Mr. Trotter: I think it is obvious when there are men who have had experience over the years that they get to know how the courts are handled. They get to know when a man maybe requires a defence. I have known assistant Crown attorneys who have taken a real interest in people who have come up against the law. They are people who are not normally of the criminal mind, but are almost a social welfare case. If they can get an assistant Crown attorney who can be helpful, they can often see to it that a man gets a suspended sentence, instead of just letting him drift on to jail.

These men are definitely a credit to the administration of justice. But it only comes with experience, because if a man is not experienced he might go too easy on a man who should be in jail. So again I would say it is the responsibility of an assistant Crown attorney to use his personal judgment. You do not get these things out of books.

In a great area, especially like Metropolitan Toronto, we have, as I have heard it referred to in this House, a sort of sausage-grinding machine turning out justice at the city hall. This is something that we have to put a stop to, and see to it that every individual gets a proper hearing.

It is true that we are trying to do something in this area about having more space for courts, because certainly at the present time at the city hall it is a disgrace; the cell block and the shortage of courts. This is, we hope, in the process of being repaired. But it will rest entirely with the hon. Attorney General, Mr. Chairman, to see to it that proper salaries are paid to assistant Crown attorneys so that we can retain good personnel.

An hon. member: What is a good salary?

Mr. Trotter: I am asked by one of the backbenchers from the Tory party what is considered a good salary. Certainly it would depend on what the average lawyer is making in private practice. It depends, of course, on the economy at the time. What has happened is that the wages paid by the hon. Attorney General's department have not kept pace with the general lowering of the value of the dollar.

In other words, $6,000 a number of years ago may have been a good salary, but today it is an extremely poor salary. We are not going to retain a man who has spent seven years in getting a higher education. We are not going to retain that type of individual at $6,500 a year.

An hon. member: How much would you pay him?

Mr. Trotter: I would venture to say that a man starting out as an assistant Crown attorney should be paid between $8,500 and $9,000. This gives some idea.

I know the hon. Attorney General has many problems facing him as a result of having just acquired the portfolio. It is for this reason that a number of hon. members in this House have probably not shouted as loud and long as we might have against the government, because many of these questions about the payment of lawyers, and the providing of bail have been brought up time and time again. I do hope that while the new Attorney General, sir, is enjoying his honeymoon, he will spend that time bringing forth new plans that we will hear next year.

There is one thing, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. Attorney General will find out—if he does not already know—and that is that there is a long list of lawyers throughout the province in private practice who do a lot of work for the hon. Attorney General's department. It is work that is farmed out. It is, in many ways, political patronage. I think it would be far better if more of that work was done directly by the hon. Attorney General's office. If they hired personnel and paid them a decent salary, the work would be done more efficiently and the department would have a far more satisfied staff.

I say the wage problem, the salary problem, affects not only assistant Crown attorneys but the lawyers retained or employed directly by the office of the hon. Attorney General here at Queen's Park. This whole question of salary should be re-examined.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I must say I agree with the remarks of the hon. member for Parkdale. I think I should tell him that there has been an upgrading of the salaries for assistant Crown attorneys as well as for Crown attorneys. I think I will just briefly say that the salary range now begins at $5,000 and ranges up to $13,000 annually for an assistant Crown attorney. This is a considerable increase over previous salary levels.

Mr. Trotter: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the hon. Attorney General could tell us how many years a man would have to be assistant Crown attorney before he would get $13,000? I realize the salary goes fairly high, but so few get it and take so long to get there that $5,000 is more typical than $13,000.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: It is not just a matter of time. It depends on the area, the nature of the work and the extent of it and so on. But I can assure the hon. member that the salary range has been increased. It was one of the things that the department took into account and has provided for.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Mr. Chairman, I understand that the hon. Attorney General has some responsibility for assisting the directors of the humane society in the administration of the regulations pertaining to them across the province. There is a matter of some importance that I would like to bring to his attention. I think he would benefit if he would look into the matter in the months ahead and perhaps take some steps to correct it.

As you no doubt know, there is a large and lucrative practice in the province in the collection of dogs for experimental purposes. None of us who have seen the advances in medical science over the past few years would for a moment suggest that these experimental animals be denied to the laboratories that require them.

On the other hand, quite a traffic has developed in this connection, which the humane society and other associated authorities have great difficulty in controlling. I would suggest to the hon. Attorney General that it would make a very effective control if he would see fit to bring in some legislation that would license the various groups and individuals who in fact have developed this into a business.

As it presently stands, where their facilities do not come up to minimum standards they are brought before the courts and fined. In many cases the maximum fine permitted is really, as in so many cases, simply considered as license to continue. The authorities and officials of the humane society are very interested in the government—and I believe it is the hon. Attorney General who would act in this capacity—implementing some system whereby the people who supply these animals for experimental purposes would be inspected and licensed. The hon. Attorney General may correct me if this does not fall within his jurisdiction, but my information is that it would. I would ask him to look into it.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think I would have to say that what the hon. member is talking about at this moment does not fall within the jurisdiction of my department. That is not to say that, perhaps, some action might be taken or some legislation framed. But I think the only responsibility that our prosecuting force, or the police, might have in connection with animals, or the humane society as they deal with animals, would be the prosecution of offences for cruelty. I think the hon. member is aware we do prosecute in those cases.

Regarding the matter of registration, inspection and so on of the places which gather animals for scientific purposes, I do not think, at the moment at least, it is the responsibility of my department. It is not something that we do now, as far as I am aware. Maybe we should.

Mr. Nixon: I do not want to labour this, but I know when the matter comes up before the humane society, they often deal with the hon. Attorney General or someone in his department over this particular difficulty. The solution would be some sort of licensing procedure that might come under the responsibility of another department but would certainly ease this department.

Mr. Chairman: Is vote 207 agreed to?

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I do not consider it is the responsibility of the hon. Attorney General to review decisions made by magistrates except by inviting appeals in certain cases. At the same time, I think that this is an appropriate time to call attention to decisions that appear less than sound.

I am going to take this opportunity to bring to the attention of the House a decision which in my opinion leads working people to the conclusion that there is—at least this is a decision of a class that leads working people to the conclusion—one law for some people and another law for others.

I will merely read the press account of the case as it appeared in the Globe and Mail on December 13, 1963:

A charge of driving while his ability was impaired against John H. Addison, Liberal member of Parliament for York North, was dismissed yesterday by Magistrate R. C. Taylor.

Charles Stevenson and Norman Barnes, probationary detectives, said they had seen a sports car driven north on Church Street at 1:50 a.m. on November 17. The wheels spun on wet pavement, the car's speed was erratic, though not over 40 miles an hour—

I might interject, Mr. Chairman, that to the best of my knowledge, the speed limit for the full length of Church Street is 30 miles an hour. However:

—and it crossed the middle line of the street. They stopped it at Bloor Street and found Mr. Addison at the wheel.

Constable J. C. Woodcock said Mr. Addison smelt strongly of an alcoholic beverage. He swayed and stumbled when asked to walk heel to toe. His speech was slow and somewhat slurred, but he understood questions and answered them reasonably.

Mr. Addison said that he had been in charge of the committee rooms at the Royal Agricultural Winter Fair that night. He had four or five glasses of champagne between 11:30 p.m. and 12:30 a.m., followed by coffee and sandwiches. The wheels of his car spun because the machine was equipped with a limited-slip differential, he said.

James Cudney of Stoney Creek said he had sent his wife with Mr. and Mrs. Addison to be driven to North Toronto. She was eight months pregnant, he said. "I would certainly not have done that if Mr. Addison had not been in fit condition to drive." Mrs. Cudney told the court Mr. Addison's driving had not made her nervous.

Magistrate Taylor said he relied upon the Cudneys' evidence. He felt the probationary detectives had given the sports car's spinning wheels too much significance.

Mr. Nixon: He will know better next time.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, four or five glasses of champagne, according to the information I have, are the equivalent of four or five bottles—not glasses—bottles of beer; probably more, but at least that much.

A working man who was hauled into court and who testified or admitted that in the space of one hour he had drunk four or five bottles of beer or more, and about whom it was testified that he smelt strongly of alcoholic beverage, that he swayed and stumbled when he was asked to walk heel to toe, and that his speech was slow and somewhat slurred, would get somewhat different treatment with that sort of evidence against him. I am of the opinion, Mr. Chairman, that members of Parliament and members of the provincial Parliament and people in similar positions should be treated in magistrate's court in exactly the same way as any other citizen.

Vote 207 agreed to.

On vote 208:

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, there are two points that I want to raise on vote 208.

May I ask the hon. Attorney General how much money was spent during the past year on advertising for the department? For example, I have an ad here: "The Department of the Attorney General." It is divided into three sections: "Serving the Legislature"—"The Government of Ontario comprises a Cabinet of Ministers of the Crown nominated by the Prime Minister from among his supporters in the Legislature," and "The Attorney General is by tradition a senior member of the Cabinet," etc., etc. It is a simple, elementary grade approach to civics, describing the role of The Attorney General's Department. This particular ad happens to be in The Anglican, but I presume it is put in many other papers. My question is, how much money was spent for that kind of advertising in the past year?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: At the moment, I cannot put my finger on an allocation for advertising. I will see. It is probably back in one of the estimates we have passed.

Mr. MacDonald: Oh, well, I noticed public information here; I could not find anything else that would be appropriate for this.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: If the hon. member will give me a moment, I believe I may find it.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Does the hon. member object to the Anglicans having it?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The information I have is that the advertising—if this is what you might call it—is done by the hon. Provincial Secretary for various departments.

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary): Mr. Chairman, if I may be of assistance, that is part of the continuing programme that is done for informing newcomers to Canada of the functions of the various departments. I do not know specifically the reference to the Anglican paper, but that ad appeared mostly in the ethnic press in various languages, I believe.

Mr. MacDonald: When a church so integral a part of the establishment gets into the category of being ethnic, I can assure you that there is a little lack of discrimination creeping into the disposition of advertising on the part of this government.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: It is for newly arrived Anglicans.

Mr. MacDonald: It was part of the Family Compact 100 years or so ago. I want to suggest, Mr. Chairman—

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Everybody belongs to an ethnic group—even the hon. member.

Mr. MacDonald: I agree, except the native Indians. I suggest that if you want to subsidize all of the various papers, do it more openly than through the department of the hon. Provincial Secretary in this fashion.

However, Mr. Chairman, I want to come back to a few brief comments with regard to the coroner situation. The hon. Attorney General tended to dismiss, rather lightly, my documentation of violations of The Coroners Act this afternoon. He said that he felt they were not very serious. I want to suggest to the hon. Attorney General on vote 208, supervising coroner and general inspector of anatomy, that either the whole concept of the jury—that its members are to be chosen from the general run of the public so that you have a cross-section of the citizenry—

Mr. Cowling: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, is it vote 208 we are on?

Mr. Singer: That is right.

Mr. Cowling: My 208 says "public safety" here.

Mr. MacDonald: If the hon. member would only sit back and listen—

Mr. Cowling: We have had the public coroner—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order, order!

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, when I made my earlier reply to the hon. Attorney General's observations, I said I was leaving some things—and this is one of them—to the appropriate estimate, and this is where I am dealing with it. If the hon. members want to go home, then go home.

Mr. Cowling: We just want to stop hearing the hon. member talk about—

Mr. MacDonald: Well, go home.

Mr. Chairman: Order. Order. Continue.

Mr. MacDonald: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I appreciate your saying that I can continue.

Mr. A. E. Reuter (Waterloo South): Somebody has found another nickel.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Attorney General's description of most of the violations of the Act as being more or less technical violations and therefore not of a serious criminal nature, I suggest to him, violates the accepted basis of choice of a jury—the proposition is that in any kind of a jury you can have a "professional" group made up of experienced persons. I am not going to belabour the point with the hon. Attorney General, who is learned in the law, but this is in violation of the whole basic principle of the choice of a jury.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Would the hon. member permit me to say that this situation no longer pertains and that the Act is now being carried out correctly in every detail? I might have made a little bit light of what had happened. I will accept that, if that is what the hon. member wants to tell me. But I did say that the situation had been corrected, and that nothing of this sort was going to occur again.

Mr. MacDonald: May I ask if it has been corrected since the "Toronto File" programme?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Since when?

Mr. MacDonald: February 4, 1964.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I do not know whether it was since that, or before that, but certainly since then it has been corrected. Since then I know the Act is being carried out.

Mr. MacDonald: Very good. I am very glad to hear it is being carried out. But there was one other thing which I documented this afternoon that I want to suggest to the hon. gentleman is very important. That is what has been described, for example, as the sanctity of the jury room. The proposition that when a jury is sent out to make its decision that people who might be in a position to influence the decision, can confer with them, as was documented by jurors, seems to me to be a very serious violation of the Act. If it is now being enforced, this is good. But it was rather shocking that this kind of thing should have gone on for years, either unbeknown to the people who should have known it or tolerated by the people who knew of it, until it was exposed in the fashion that it was.

However, the specific question I want to put to the hon. Attorney General is this: Are all of the very serious charges that were made by Dr. Shulman with regard to the influence of The Attorney General's Department, in regard to the influence of the medical profession, and so on, now a closed chapter? Is it all swept under the rug, so to speak? Is no public investigation going to be made of it? That is my first question.

My second question is: What is the opinion of the department now with regard to the future of the post of chief coroner? Is the hon. Minister waiting until public indignation dies down and then, once again, launch an attack on Dr. Shulman? There were some very, very sharp comments made by such people in the department with regard to Dr. Shulman. Is this post going to be retained? It seems to me that the House is entitled to some information from the hon. Attorney General.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: First of all, if the hon. member's remarks are directed at me, he said "are you once again going to launch an attack." I never launched any attack.

Mr. MacDonald: The department.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The department. I do not believe I can say, either, that the department launched an attack on Dr. Shulman. Dr. Shulman made certain complaints and was quite vocal about them. Perhaps he was quite right in saying the things he said. They were investigated by the department, and so far as my investigations have gone, it appeared that most of his complaints were on matters of questions of law, questions of the legality of procedures. When they were investigated in great measure they were found by the law officers of The Department of the Attorney General to not be an infringement of law.

But as for any suggestion that there is going to be an attack brought back on Dr. Shulman, I think this is not really worthy of the hon. member who suggested it. It certainly is farthest, I think, from the mind of anyone in The Department of the Attorney General. Dr. Shulman, as far as I know, is doing a good job. I trust he will continue to do so.

Mr. MacDonald: The post is going to be retained then, I take it.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I have no other thought in my mind.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I want to make my annual plea that the $443,000 that we are asked to vote for emergency measures be put to a better use.

Over the years I have tried to get from a series of Attorneys General a statement of what the policy is on emergency measures. One time we had a policy of evacuating everybody to Bruce county. That was abandoned in favour of building shelters. That was abandoned in favour of, well, almost nothing. Now it appears that we are back, at least, to designating escape routes that apparently lead to nowhere. I brought this forward for the edification of the hon. Attorney General. I know he is new at his job. He might be interested in the series of discussions that took place in the city of Toronto concerning the expenditure of some of the monies that were voted for emergency measures.

In a story dated April 10 this year, the Toronto Telegram under the heading "No Shelter? This Way Out" has this to say:

The first civil defence emergency route signs in Canada will be erected throughout Metro during the next few weeks, Metro emergency measures chairman Alderman George Ben announced today.

Even though that was a few weeks ago, I have not seen any of those signs yet, so I presume that the few weeks has not expired.

Painted a bright reflective blue and yellow, the 1,052 metal signs will be erected along fourteen routes, including Yonge Street, Avenue Road, Lakeshore Road, Bloor Street and 401. When a disaster hits, or an air raid warning sounds, these are the routes on which vehicles will feed out of the city into rural areas where emergency accommodation and supplies are stored.

And I thought we should hear from the hon. Attorney General, or from someone over there, as to where these emergency accommodation arrangements have been made and supplies stored. How often are they checked? How many dollars have we spent to set these areas aside and to store up all of these emergency supplies? Chairman Ben goes on to say that:

Civil defence is as important today if not more so than ever. If terrorist bombs start blowing up mail boxes here, as they did in Quebec, our EMO will spring into action. And if we ever get an earthquake or another Hurricane Hazel, our forces would be the backbone of rescue work.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Is the hon. member laughing?

Mr. Singer: I am laughing at the ludicrous approach that he takes. He is the man in Metro charged with the responsibility of running this. He is the man in Metro that is helping waste this $443,000 of the province's money. He goes on to say:

EMO is like a sprinkler system in a building. You never think about it until a fire hits.

Alderman Ben said:

Metro EMO will stress a public information programme this year: movies, lectures, newspaper, radio and TV advertising plus special public demonstrations. We have the finest EMO force in Canada today but the public must know so that apathy does not take over.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: That is my boy, George.

Mr. Singer: I thought this was a very good quote:

When nuclear war over the Cuban situation became a very real thing in 1962, our emergency measures offices were flooded with calls from people wanting to know what to do. "Well, now is the time to learn," he said.

Then there was a little bit of trouble over the signs. By the time this story got into the morning newspapers on Saturday, April 11, the Globe and Mail ran a story saying that:

Metro EMO organization may find itself left holding the bag, a big bag containing $4,000 worth of emergency road signs. Purchased by EMO the 1,052 signs—and I think that they are the same 1,052 that were referred to in the evening clipping:

—designed to direct survivors of a national disaster nuclear attack to fourteen escape routes out of Metro were to be installed at 268 key intersections. The triangular blue and yellow signs were delivered a few months ago and have been in storage at a police sub-basement on Eglinton Avenue West awaiting installation.

I think the police commission could well have a look at this because valuable space is taken up with these signs. I gather they are still there.

Mr. Pollard, the EMO director, said yesterday that EMO does not currently have the money, estimated at $20,000, to install the signs. He said he hoped the municipalities whose roads form a part of these routes would put the signs up.

However, with the exception of North York, this idea was received coolly by the municipalities involved.

"We are meeting a little resistance," said Alderman Ben, chairman of EMO.

Metro traffic engineer, Sam Cass, said in an interview that if Mr. Pollard's proposal were accepted, his department would probably be responsible for installing the majority of the signs as most of the routes follow Metro roads.

Up to this point, of course, as the Attorney General has observed, there is nothing to indicate where these routes are going to lead to, where the emergency storage of people is going to be or where the food is going to be after they get there. But this does not deter our fearless EMO group down at Metro.

He said the request was a little late because his department's budget had been fixed this year. It is doubtful, he said, if money could be found this year unless he receives a direct order from Metro council.

But Mr. Ben, you will remember, was concerned that in 1964 we should be aware of what would have happened if the Cuban situation had exploded in 1962. But in 1964 we have not got enough money to put up the signs that would have led people to these places that would have solved the situation in 1962.

"If Mr. Pollard wants them put up he will have to send a letter to the council," said Roland Anderson, Scarborough traffic co-ordinator. He said erecting signs was a costly and time-consuming job in suburban areas because posts must be erected for most of the signs and a search made for underground utilities.

"Even if the Scarborough council were to approve the expenditure it is doubtful if the work could start before the summer," said Mr. Anderson.

Mr. Anderson has not quite appreciated, obviously, the seriousness of what happened in 1962 in the Cuban crisis. But here is a ray of hope:

However, North York's traffic co-ordinator, Sidney Cole, said he felt the work could be absorbed with the staff's regular routine.

Mr. Pollard said he was encouraged by this response to the signs by members of yesterday's meeting. He said he would call a meeting in the near future with municipal traffic co-ordinators to iron out difficulties, adding that he hoped to see the signs start appearing on street corners in the next few weeks.

Mr. Cowling: Does the hon. member not think they should be painted blue and white?

Mr. Singer: Oh, I think that is a fine colour, but I am just wondering whether the space in the police station where they are stored could not be put to better use and I think that the police commission should get at that investigation right away.

Last year's EMO budget, Mr. Pollard said, provided funds to erect the signs but the provision was dropped when the project was not advanced.

Police Inspector George Madison told the EMO meeting the traffic on the 14 routes known as blue routes—that is for the hon. member for High Park: —would be one-way heading out of Toronto.

Just how that is going to work I do not know, because now, as we are getting into the spring season, even last weekend, on any of these 14 routes it was difficult to get traffic moving to handle normal weekend traffic without delays. No one has quite figured out the direction of traffic in the event of such an emergency, but if we get the signs up I think everything is going to be fine.

He said there would be no priorities to persons using the roads. If there was sufficient warning of a nuclear attack, buses would be sent for persons without cars.

The inspector said later that in the event of an attack—and the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions will be interested in this:

—that in the event of an attack the prisoners would be released from the jails but the prisoners would have to find their own way out of Toronto.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Singer: Once again:

Most of the routes run north and south between Highway 27 and Etobicoke and Little's Road in Scarborough—

Then it describes a few of the routes. Well, the Tely got back into the act that afternoon and it was not quite in accord with what it had the evening before, I guess they read the Globe and Mail story. There seemed to be a little confusion and it then had a story in the Saturday afternoon edition:

EMO CRISIS OVER DISASTER SIGNS

Metro Emergency Organization has $4,000 worth of signs but no money to erect them. The 1,052 signs designed to direct survivors of a natural disaster or nuclear attack to 14 escape routes were to be installed at 268 intersections. Mr. Pollard said he hoped each municipality would erect a sign and with the exception of North York, the plan was meeting resistance.

The estimated cost of installation is $20,000. The committee was told how the 14 emergency dispersal routes would be used to carry one-way traffic out of Metro, but those without cars would have to stay.

An hon. member: The poor people!

An hon. member: What about buses?

Mr. Singer: We have forgotten about the buses. That was Alderman Thomas Wardle who said that. Then finally, to cap the history of the remarks of the chairman:

"The sinners run and the saintly stay," quipped chairman Beck.

Well, Mr. Chairman, when the reports of these meetings of EMO and the expenditure of our provincial dollars that are so badly needed in so many other fields is dealt with in this way by public authorities, it really is ludicrous to put into these estimates year after year sums of money that apparently are doing no good.

We have a lovely group of blue signs painted, I suppose in the colours directed by the hon. member for High Park, taking up valuable space in the basement of a police station. We have great problems about what we are going to do with people who are going to be evacuated—goodness knows where, there are no areas into which to have them evacuated. The predecessor of the hon. Attorney General, or it may have been the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests (Mr. Roberts), assured us very seriously a year or two ago that they had abandoned the idea of evacuating everybody, we were going to have shelters. Then somebody produced all sorts of blueprints and we were going to have shelters all over the place. Apparently we have stopped building shelters and we are back to evacuation.

The whole thing is a bunch of nonsense and I think it is high time that the government started to cut down on some of this useless expenditure. If the government is at all serious about emergency measures let us have a programme that really means something and is going to do something to help the people, but this vote of $443,000 is a ridiculous and wasteful government expenditure.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Chairman, I might fill in the Toronto Daily Star of the same day. I will do that eventually, but I do want to add a voice pleading that some sense be brought into this programme or that it be abandoned.

At the present time the general plan, at least it was when I had some close connection with it, is that in the cities, when the warning came, the EMO organization would take its equipment and clang out 20, 30 or 40 miles into the country or some place and then be ready to come back in to rescue the poor people who might have survived there.

So you have all the cities doing this, going out in the hope that they will get back in again. Now surely—I have raised this before and I do not know whether it is done yet or not, I do not think so—but surely if we are sensible about this we would have the Toronto EMO people trained to go into Hamilton and Oshawa and Barrie maybe. We would have the Hamilton and Oshawa and Barrie people trained to come into Toronto. That way we do not have to go through all this business of rushing out and coming back again.

One thing is dead certain, if we have an enemy who is interested in creating devastation by means of nuclear weapons, he is going to fix a time when EMO just cannot get out. He is not going to pick a time when traffic is at a minimum on the roadway. He is going to pick the rush hour, morning or night, or the weekend that we heard the hon. member for Downsview talk about, when the roads are jammed, when maximum damage can be done and when the whole traffic organization and transport organization can be dealt the greatest blow. So it just seems senseless that we should continue this kind of playing around with problems which just cannot be answered in this particular way.

Now we did have one crisis where EMO might have played an important part. Where these signs are to go, I just do not know, because I think most people who have any chance of getting out of Metro Toronto, or any other city, know the route out of the city. My guess is that the beautiful signs—blue and white are they?—the hon. member for High Park is going to have them. Those signs will only tend to confuse the issue and people will be trying to follow those signs and they would not know where to go.

On April 11, 1964, the date quoted before, the Toronto Daily Star said this in speaking of the one instance when there was real danger on this continent when the confrontation came between Russia and United States over Cuba, and we get this:

Metro's Emergency Measures Organization received no guidance from Ottawa during the Cuban missile crisis in October, 1962, EMO director Col. J. H. Pollard said yesterday. In an interview following a briefing with the local political leaders on Metro's disaster plan, Col. Pollard said, "Nothing rolled up there in Ottawa."

That was in 1962. Things were not rolling very well then under Mr. Diefenbaker, were they?

Said Col. Pollard:

There was nothing visible to us. Meetings were not called, nothing. We nearly—and this is the crowning achievement of our EMO in Metro:

—we nearly decided on our own to move fire equipment out of Metro to dispersal sites.

So the crisis was here. We had no direction from Ottawa. We had no direction from any provincial authority and the local people almost decided to move the fire equipment out of the city, so it would be out there 30 or 40 miles to fight the fires in Metro. It is time we quit this foolishness.

Mr. R. Gisborn (Wentworth East): Mr. Chairman, I would solicit comment from the hon. Attorney General in regard to what has been considered a serious situation by some municipalities and individuals. That is the very serious concern about the inadequacy of ambulance service and facilities in many areas of the province. I am sure that the previous Attorney General and his department had been made aware of the problem quite forcibly by municipalities, in the Orillia area and the London area, from the Association of Ambulance Operators and from medical people and doctors across the province. I feel that there should be some attention given to this concern and I wonder if the hon. Attorney General would inform the House as to the policy of the government in regard to the very serious requests in this regard.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I could say this, in reply to the hon. member, that with respect to the ambulance matter, the committee has been studying it with the municipalities, I understand over some two years. A number of meetings have been held and a report is in process of being prepared and will shortly be available for implementation. That is all I can give the hon. member at the moment.

I would like to return to the matter of the Emergency Measures Organization. I would point this out. While there is room for difference of opinion, perhaps there is room for some levity. Let us hope we can always treat this subject with levity and might never need to treat it seriously. Nonetheless, the matter of the Emergency Measures Organization and the safety of the country against the type of attack for which the organization was first designed, is a federal plan, a scheme of the federal government to which it contributes very heavily in funds and direction for the organization.

Generally, the federal contribution is 75 per cent. The breakdown which I have indicates that, and indicates that in the municipal projects the municipality contributes ten per cent, Ontario 15, and the Dominion government 75 per cent. Just to go down to the foot of the page, our contribution as shown in the estimates is $443,000. Against that is the federal contribution of $1,809,870. The organization now has under federal direction and in co-operation with the federal government, 49 area groups. These consist of counties, areas or single municipalities with the province, the federal government, the municipality, the county or the area participating. The number of municipalities involved in those 49 area groups is 755. The total population embraced by them all is approximately six million out of the population of this province.

So we are in the position of endeavouring to co-operate with what is really a federal responsibility and to which large federal contributions are made and to which direction is given by the federal government. I think

I might add this, that there has been a considerable pointing of effort and planning now in emergency measures, to such things as disasters of fire, flood, earthquake and so on. I think this is sensible and I believe that while we are not the only province, or the only country concerned with this situation, as hon. members well know, I hardly hear anyone suggesting it should be abandoned entirely. Certainly this is not the view of the federal government with which we are asked to co-operate.

Mr. Thompson: I would say this to the hon. Attorney General through you, Mr. Chairman, that we have listened to a variety of points of view on this estimate of almost half a million dollars in the past, before you were in the House. We had at one time, sir, Mr. William Nickle. I would refer to him as the general in charge of this situation. He explained to us that there was an organization in every municipality. Then, sir, when he was going into this, the hon. Leslie Frost came in and said he felt this was a situation for the military. Then, sir, in order to clarify the thing for us, we went up in the bus to Camp Borden. This was before your time, of course.

When we got to Camp Borden there were deputy Ministers present. Somewhere in that Camp Borden area there was a place for the Cabinet and for the head of the government. It did not include us, but we have no particular brief about that because I do not think any of us would ever get to Camp Borden if there were to be a disaster. It is quite a way to there. But, however, sir, I remember we saw the military action on this. Because I will not be embarrassing any particular officer now, because it is in the past, I can say that I remember one officer. We had been taken in to listen to him. We learned that some place near the area of the hon. Minister of Mines that there was fallout sweeping across. The officer was showing us how they were on the alert and warning the North Bay people or Port Arthur. He was phoning and he looked sort of embarrassed and apparently he was—

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): We have a fine building up there.

Mr. Thompson: I will tell you what happened. Do you know, sir, with all respect, that we finally heard him say, "What, he's out to lunch?"

Our point is, and I am sure it is the point of all of us, that here is $250,000—sorry, $500,000—and we would suggest we have never had a clear-cut programme—

Mr. L. Letherby (Simcoe East): We have had some signs though.

Mr. Thompson: We have had some signs. But I think we should take both things seriously: the fact that should some calamity happen—and it is not just war we are thinking of, and please God none of these things will happen—that is one thing, and the second thing is that $500,000.

Could the hon. Attorney General tell us, or will he bring it in for us as soon as he can, what really is his programme? He says it is the federal government programme—does that mean the militia? What is the $500,000 of the provincial government's money going to? Could I ask also, does the hon. Attorney General have anything to do with the signs? If the hon. Attorney General is asking us to approve $500,000, could he tell us how this is going to be spent?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I can say this to the hon. member. Mr. Hurst, who has been appointed the acting director of the Emergency Measures Organization, has made a report. I do not have it with me here, but I can give it to the House within this week, when I have an opportunity to do so.

Mr. H. Worton (Wellington South): Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. Attorney General: I understand that some of the emergency measures organizations wish to buy their own properties. Has his department set a policy on this yet?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I have no answer on that question.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, I ask the question: is there any supervision at all at the provincial level as to how these monies are spent? Who buys what? Do we have any report on this?

Mr. Letherby: No, not at the moment.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I have a breakdown of the matter which may, I think, serve to satisfy the hon. member. The total of $443,00 is broken down in the following way, that is, into some ten different projects.

The first one is the municipal projects to which, I might say as I go along, the municipalities paying 10 per cent will contribute $136,468. The province's share on those projects is $204,704. I have, although I will not bother reading it, the contribution of the federal government to those projects, those municipal projects.

Then there are those which are purely provincial and which are divided simply between the province and the federal government. The contribution of the province is $95,823, that is 25 per cent, and three times that is contributed by the federal government.

Then there is the mutual aid, fire, radio, which is a three-way project, contributed to by the municipalities, 70 per cent; the province's share is 15 per cent, amounting to $12,909; and the federal government the same, 15 per cent.

The next item is radiation defence equipment, which is purely provincial and that contribution is $41,586. The province pays the whole percentage there.

On the proposed expenditure for the year ending March 31, 1965, covering planning and operations of the programmes on which the province and the federal governments split at 25 per cent to Ontario, 75 per cent to Ottawa, our contribution is $111,125.

On the existing municipal projects, to which the municipalities pay ten per cent and the province 15, the contribution of the province is $264,855 and the federal share is 75 per cent, running up to $1,324,000.

On mutual aid, fire, radio network, the province's percentage, being 15 per cent, is $10,000. On additional fire apparatus—that is the assistance to certain municipalities with fire apparatus—the province's contribution is $27,000. In health, police and fire services, of which the province's share is 25 per cent shared with the federal government's 75 per cent, the province pays $24,250.

On assistance to other government departments, the province pays 25 per cent and our share is $5,000. The federal government pays 15 per cent.

That makes a total of $443,000.

Mr. Young: May I ask, Mr. Chairman: This assistance to other departments, does this mean assistance in training, perhaps of police and firemen in small municipalities, is this what this means?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Assistance to other government departments?

Mr. Young: To other government departments, yes.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: That is a comparatively small item, $5,000. I do not know whether I can give the hon. member further details on that, but I could think of various ways in which the Emergency Measures Organization using money voted in The Department of the Attorney General, might be of assistance, at least to that extent, that is, $5,000 to other departments of the government. I cannot furnish any further details.

Mr. Young: It just seems that if the Emergency Measures Organization is going to be effective and efficient it should be tied in very closely with fire and police departments, perhaps stressing training there, rather than having a separate organization. This might have some effect, I do not know.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: May I just say it does tie in very closely with the previous item—health, police and fire services—the item of $24,250. Then there is the other one, the additional fire apparatus at $27,000; and mutual aid, fire, radio network, $10,000. There is a very close tie-in with police and fire in these organizations in the county, city and outside areas, and so on.

Mr. Young: Could I ask, Mr. Chairman, through you—

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: In the city of Fort William the Emergency Measures Organization is handled by the fire chief—he is the chairman—which shows a very definite tie-in.

Mr. Young: Could I ask one further question then, Mr. Charman? Could the hon. Attorney General tell us what proportion of the money which is being spent on EMO at the present time goes for salaries of officials, directors of local organizations, and so on?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes, I can tell the hon. member. The breakdown of the $443,000 on that basis shows salaries, $87,000, and that includes contributions to salaries of other officials outside the department. Travel is $10,000. Maintenance is $30,000. Public information courses and conferences, $14,000. And municipal projects $302,000. That makes a total of $443,000.

Mr. Young: I am sorry, I am afraid the—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The $87,000 was for salaries.

Mr. Young: Yes, but I am wondering about the overall total, because a good part of that municipal grant would go towards salaries of the directors in the field and that sort of thing?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The hon. member would like, I take it, a breakdown of the $302,000?

Mr. Young: If the hon. Attorney General has it, yes.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I would have to get that for the hon. member. I do not have it.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Attorney General mentioned Mr. Hurst, who is the acting director. There was a Mr. Tyrrell, who I understood was the deputy Minister in charge of the Emergency Measures Organization. Is that gentleman no longer in that position?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think that is right, he is no longer there.

Mr. Singer: He is no longer in that position. Mr. Hurst is the man now acting in charge of all emergency measures? That is the Mr. Hurst who was the fire marshal?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: He still does his job as well.

Mr. Singer: Oh, he is fire marshal and acting director? Fine!

To go back to these signs, and to be quite serious about it, somebody apparently bought and paid for 1,052 blue and white signs that are now languishing in a police station basement. Was there approval sought? Does the province not have anything to say about the expenditure of the money in connection with these signs? Would it not have been reasonable and logical if somebody was going to buy signs, to designate "escape routes," or call them what you will, that somebody had to determine where these "escape routes" were going to lead to?

This has been held over year after year after year and it would seem to me that we are spending half a million dollars of the public money needlessly. Some of the estimates as the hon. Attorney General mentions are most important, common wavelengths for police vehicles, fire vehicles and that sort of thing, that sort of expenditure is well worthwhile—but when you get this nonsensical expenditure, obviously made by people for the purpose of carrying them on in jobs that perform no function, like storing 1,052 blue and white signs in the police station basement, then we are just throwing public money down the drain.

I would have thought that before anybody, even the Metro EMO group, would embark on this sort of thing, that somebody would control it. Or even if it escapes immediate control and somebody made a mistake, that the hon. Attorney General, as the responsible Minister, now having noted it, would make sure that this could not happen again.

We hear from Minister after Minister: "If I only had enough money I would be able to do so much more." Now here is a place where the Minister could save and stop wasting perhaps a couple of hundred of thousand dollars and put it to much better use. I would hope, sir, that the Minister would seize upon this opportunity. This is one avenue of putting more money to better use.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Were those signs bought by Metro?

Mr. Singer: They were bought by Metro and EMO. Undoubtedly provincial money paid part of the cost.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Paid part of it. And federal?

Mr. Singer: And federal. We are not in the House of Commons. We are in the provincial Legislature. We can only complain to the Minister.

Mr. Worton: Mr. Chairman, to get back to the original question: the one I was complaining about was the Wellington Emergency Measures Organization, who have money to buy their own headquarters but, I understand, they cannot get approval from The Attorney General's Department. Is this true or—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I am sorry; I did not hear you.

Mr. Worton: They have the financing to buy their own headquarters and yet your department will not give an okay to them to purchase their own building.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I am still unable to get the first part of the hon. member's question.

Mr. Worton: Sir, as I understand it the Wellington county Emergency Measures Organization have the finances to purchase a headquarters building for their EMO organization. Before they can buy it, they have to get approval from the hon. Attorney General's office.

This has been asked for, sir, and it has not been forthcoming. This is what I wanted to ask earlier, or at least the point I wanted to get across earlier.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, I cannot answer the hon. member. Is it the municipalities that have made application or the Emergency Measures Organization?

Mr. Worton: The Emergency Measures Organization of Wellington county.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: And you say application has been made?

Mr. Worton: Yes. In fact, I spoke to your predecessor myself, sir. Evidently there was nothing forthcoming and there is still nothing forthcoming.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I can only promise to look into the matter.

Mr. J. F. Edwards (Perth): Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a few words on the EMO. I think the hon. Minister will find out that Perth county, Stratford and Listowel have been most active on EMO for a number of years. As far as the Wellington county organization is concerned, where I live in the town of Palmerston—a part of Perth riding—the EMO is served by the intimate relations they have to phone connections, fires, tornadoes, anything that happens. I just want to say thank you to the citizens of the municipality for furthering these organizations, who look after the people. This has been going on up in Perth county for years. Just last year at our district EMO meeting at Seaforth, Mr. MacFayden, who is the co-ordinator for Perth county at Stratford, was one of our guest speakers. He described public utilities and all the other services that are in the municipality and which are tied in by the EMO. I think the department is doing a good job in sponsoring and assisting these organizations with approved grants.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I would like to return briefly to the coroner's office to refer to an incident of not too long ago. It is reported in the Globe and Mail of March 25th of this year. I will read two paragraphs of the story. It is datelined Pembroke:

Dr. H. B. Cotnam, Ontario's supervising coroner, yesterday attended an inquest at which his father, Dr. I. D. Cotnam, 81, was absolved of any blame in the death of one of his patients.

I would like to state right now, Mr. Chairman, that I am not in any sense directing my inquiry to Dr. I. D. Cotnam. There was a coroner's inquest and it was decided by that inquest that Dr. I. D. Cotnam was quite blameless in whatever happened. I am quite willing to accept that. I am not questioning the decision in any way. It is the next paragraph, which I will now read, that I would like to call to the attention of the hon. Attorney General.

The supervising coroner sat beside Coroner Gordon Hermitte of Pembroke, who conducted the inquest, but did not participate in the proceedings.

Now the question I want to put to the hon. Attorney General is, I think, quite a straightforward one. Does he consider it desirable for the supervising coroner to sit beside the presiding coroner at an inquest when one of the matters that was at issue affected his own father? Does he consider that a desirable procedure?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: In reply to the hon. member, I would say that, generally, I think it would be in order for the supervising coroner to sit beside the coroner conducting the inquest under ordinary circumstances. Unless he interfered with the proceedings, and it does not appear that he did in any way, I cannot see why, in the light of his interest in the matter—unless he interfered—he should not sit there.

I think this is a matter that would occur, perhaps, only once in a blue moon, if I may use that expression. But unless there is some evidence that he interfered with the conduct of that inquest, which was conducted by a coroner and with a Crown attorney examining witnesses, I cannot see what objection might be taken.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, surely the mere fact of his presence on the bench beside the other coroner leaves at least an impression of interference. The hon. Attorney General used the expression "if it was a matter in which he had an interest" there might be a reason for him to be there. I suggest that it was a matter in which he had a personal interest. That would be a good reason why he should stay as far away as possible. Certainly, this form of procedure can create a wrong impression.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Did the hon. member say that he sat on the bench beside the coroner?

Mr. Bryden: It said—I will quote what it said:

The supervising coroner sat beside Coroner Gordon Hermitte who conducted the inquest—

I do not know exactly what it meant by "sat beside." I would interpret it to mean that he was up at the head of the courtroom sitting beside the supervising coroner. I would suggest to the hon. Attorney General that a desirable practice in such a matter would be for the supervising coroner, under these circumstances, to stay as far away from it as possible, and that he not sit anywhere near a position that looked like a position of authority.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I will say this: I do not think he should have to stay as far away as possible. I think he has a right to be in the courtroom, or the place of hearing, apart from his position as supervising coroner altogether. Whether he had a father involved, or any other relative, he had a right to be there at a public inquest. Perhaps he might have exercised a little thought in not appearing to sit in a position of authority. But if he did not interfere, and there seems to be no suggestion of that, then I would not feel too seriously about it. But I certainly think he had a right to be there, to listen and to be interested. If he had evidence to give, he could even have given evidence. But if there is no suggestion that he interfered, I do not treat the thing too seriously.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, there is another matter under vote 208 relating to the Attorney General's lab. I notice that this section of the vote has been increased from some $430,000 to $537,000. I would like to ask the hon. Attorney General if he considers that this increase is sufficient in view of the frequent statements that have been made in recent months, sir, by the director of the Attorney General's lab that a very large increase in its facilities and staff is required if it is to do the job it has been called upon to do.

All of the stories that I have read refer to the fact that the Attorney General's lab, by doing some work that is not related to its principal function—that is in testing pharmaceutical preparations supplied to Ontario hospitals—has saved this government a large sum of money. I, in common with some other members of the House, sat on a committee which inquired into the matter of the cost of drugs and we found that to be true. They have done an excellent job there. But it would appear, from the stories we have seen in the press—all of them based apparently on information obtained from Dr. Ward Smith—that the lab is being starved in some of its other activities.

It may be that an increase of $100,000 this year is all that the organization can absorb in the way of expansion. But on the other hand, I am rather concerned when I read in the press that many cases are held up in the courts because the expert evidence that is available from this source only cannot be produced in time; and that sometimes this expert evidence just is not produced at all. I would like to hear some sort of a statement from the hon. Attorney General with regard to this year's estimate and the long-term plans for the Attorney General's lab.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, the estimate first of all is increased from last year's $428,500 to an amount now of $537,000. That is an increase of $108,500, which is almost on the nose, I think, of a 25 per cent increase. That is a fairly substantial increase in any estimate. The hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan) tells me that, to the best of his recollection, this was what he thought was their budget. They seemed to be satisfied with the requisition made in that amount for this year. There are long-term plans to expand and extend the work of the laboratory and obtain better space for it and better facilities. I think that having obtained a 25-per cent increase in one year is a fairly reasonable evidence of progress.

Mr. Bryden: Dr. Ward Smith is quoted in the Globe and Mail of February 13, which is two or three months ago, as saying his agency should have eight times the space and three times the staff and I would doubt if $100,000 would provide that.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: In this year, no, it will not provide that, but more space is definitely required. More space is planned and a programme of expansion is in the plan, but not to be all accomplished this year by any means.

Mr. Bryden: There is another statement here that I would like to call to the attention of the House. This is in the reporter's own words. It is not attributed to anyone.

One of the more unhappy results of this shortage—that is the shortage of staff and space:

—is that the laboratory's scientific study on Crown cases awaiting trial is backed up on an average of four to six weeks. The accused person held without bail awaiting this evidence for the trial to proceed has to be patient in jail.

Does the hon. Attorney General think that some significant progress can be made in reducing that sort of waiting period in cases coming to trial?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: A large part of the increase is for increased competent personnel and I think this will quickly help to clean up the backlog.

Vote 208 agreed to.

On vote 209:

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Chairman, before we deal with 209, and I take it that vote 208 has been passed, I move that the committee rise and report progress.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report it has come to certain resolutions and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow—I gather it has been arranged with the two Opposition parties—we will proceed with the balance of the estimates of The Department of Education, starting at 3 o'clock, and then when we have completed that we can return to the estimates of the hon. Attorney General.

We are sitting at 3 o'clock tomorrow because there are some achievement awards being presented here in the chamber and this is the only place to do it, apparently, so we will sit at 3 o'clock, not 2 o'clock.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 11.25 o'clock, p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

TUESDAY, MAY 5, 1964

The House met at 3 o'clock, p.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: We welcome to the Legislature today, in the west gallery, students from Central Elgin Collegiate, St. Thomas; under the Speaker's gallery, members of the Etobicoke North Women's Liberal Association. We are also pleased to welcome on the floor of the House, to the right of the Speaker's chair, the hon. Walter C. Weir, Minister of Public Works and Highways for the province of Manitoba.

Presenting petitions.

Presenting reports by committees.

Mr. D. A. Evans (Simcoe Centre), from the standing committee on labour, legal and municipal bills, presented the committee's tenth report which was read as follows and adopted:

Your committee begs to report the following bills with certain amendments:

Bill No. 104, An Act to amend The Mortgage Brokers Registration Act.

Bill No. 105, An Act to amend The Real Estate and Business Brokers Act.

Bill No. 109, An Act to provide for the registration, supervision and control of used car dealers and salesmen.

Mr. L. M. Reilly (Eglinton), from the standing committee on highways and tourism, presented the committee's second report which was read as follows and adopted:

Your committee begs to report the following bill without amendment:

Bill No. 122, An Act to amend The Highway Improvement Act.

And the following bill with certain amendments:

Bill No. 123, An Act to provide for the establishment of local roads boards in territory without municipal organization.

Mr. Speaker: Motions.

Introduction of bills.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management (Mr. Simonett).

How many property owners are going to be bought out by the Upper Thames River Authority in order to construct the Gordon Pittcock dam and how many of these property owners have voluntarily accepted the offers made to them by the authority?

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question. The number of properties involved is 46. The number who have accepted voluntarily, offers made by the authority, is 12.

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Minister of Highways): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I wish to announce to the House that further progress has been made in the discussions between the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority and The Department of Highways dealing with crossings of the Welland canal. These discussions have covered changes in the crossings necessitated by the proposed twinning of the locks of the canal and also the replacement of existing crossings because of increased traffic volumes. Agreement in principle has been reached on all the major points, and both authorities now wish to meet with the municipalities along the canal where these new facilities must be provided. The purpose of these meetings would be to work out the details of the various projects as they affect the municipalities.

While the immediate plans, to coincide with the twinning of the locks, call for the construction of tunnels at Carleton Street in St. Catharines, replacing existing Highway 58 bridge in the Thorold area, and a new facility, previously announced, in the city of Welland, the discussions also included proposed tunnels to be constructed at a later stage at Allanburg—Highway 20—and Highway 3 at Port Colborne.

A similar statement is being made to the House of Commons in Ottawa today by the hon. J. W. Pickersgill, federal Minister of Transport.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The 13th order. House in committee of supply; Mr. W. G. Noden in the chair.

On vote 518:

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Mr. Chairman, this afternoon the House is asked to approve the expenditure of $48 million in vote 518. As well as this, we are going to discuss the provision for advancing further money on a loan basis to the universities of Ontario, which will make available to university education a sum just in excess of $100 million.

This is the amount that the hon. Minister of Education (Mr. Davis), in his judgment, feels will meet the needs of education at this level for the coming year. This is the money that is needed, evidently, to provide the facilities of all types at the university level: the laboratories, the libraries, the other expansion in buildings, as well as to train and provide the staff and the maintenance that is needed for our rapidly expanding university system. We were assured by the hon. Minister in this House on Friday last, that their most careful statistical research would indicate that approximately 38,000 students will be available for university training in September, 1964, and that as near as they can tell this will leave a surplus of something approaching 1,500 to 2,000 places in the universities of the province of Ontario.

It is obvious that the distribution of these students will probably leave something to be desired, particularly during the months when their applications are being sent to universities and sent probably to more than one university. Nevertheless, we have the assurance of the government that for the year coming, without any change we presume in entrance requirements, that every qualified student will be looked after.

I would say to you, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. Minister should certainly, somewhere in the discussion of this part of his responsibility, deal very directly with what the statistics are and what the indications are, not only for the coming year 1964, but every year up to and including 1970. Because we have certainly been led to expect by the report of the universities' presidents that there is going to be a serious shortage of university facilities between now and 1970, and we want the assurance of the government that proper provision is being made before this crisis of numbers, as it has been called, is upon us.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is true that there is very little conjecture remaining about the number of students that must be accommodated. These people are presently in the schools, in the high schools, and many of them have already indicated by their examination work and by guidance interviews that they will be requiring this sort of advanced education in the immediate years that lie ahead.

The crisis will be upon us, according to the statistics that are available to us as ordinary members of the Legislature, in the term 1965-66. It is in this area particularly that we would ask the hon. Minister to comment specifically as to how his plans will meet the predictions of the statisticians. Certainly we would expect this additional information some time this afternoon.

Another thing to be borne in mind as we discuss university affairs, is that in the years that lie ahead many more of our students than will go to university will be in Grade 13 and graduating from high school with their honour matriculation certificate, and these people must be accommodated in some areas of post-secondary education in this province. Many will go into the expanding areas of technology; the teachers' colleges, the nursing schools; and, obviously, many will enter the work force directly from their senior matriculation training.

The number, however, that will be available for further training and education beyond those who will be going to university must always be borne in mind; and according to the report that we have at hand it will be a number that is almost equivalent to those who will be taking university training by the end of this decade. A number then, amounting to 100,000, sir, will certainly require, many of them, additional education beyond the secondary level. Here is an area where there does seem to be considerable confusion in the advice that the government has received and in the steps that they have taken to plan for this large number of students.

In my view there must be a continuation of academic training at the local level. There are many ways by which this may be provided. The university presidents, who have reported to the hon. Minister through his advisory committee, have suggested that perhaps the normal grade system might be extended beyond Grade 13 into a suggested Grade 14.

There have also been numerous suggestions that colleges at the community level, either under local auspices or more preferably under the auspices of the present university system, could be set up. This, in my view, is the solution that should recommend itself to the planners in The Department of Education.

I think it would be a shame if any system of community colleges were to be divorced from the academic train so that they would become something aside from an academic institution and be more or less a part-time school for adult training with, perhaps, courses in art and that sort of thing exclusively. I would recommend most seriously to the House that any extension, then, at the community level be along academic lines.

One of the greatest problems that the government must face, and is dealing with to some extent, is the provision of staff at the post-secondary level. There were ample warnings in the time from 1955 on toward 1960 that the provision of staff was going to be one of the major difficulties, if not the major difficulty, in the provision of education at the post-secondary level. If one is to look at the records of those days, it is obvious that the government of the day took no steps, certainly no effective steps to increase the number of students who were going on to doctorate work or to post-graduate work. As a matter of fact, if one examines the statistics after the warning bell was first sounded in 1955, they actually indicated a decrease in the number of graduate degrees granted in this province and across the country.

I would be the first to say that the plan introduced some time ago, which provides fellowships in the humanities and social sciences for those who wish to proceed with graduate work in the province of Ontario, has been very effective. I would certainly say that the restriction of this to the humanities and social sciences is something that should be explained carefully to the House.

I presume that there are adequate funds available from various research projects to provide graduate scholarships for those in the natural sciences, which are not accommodated under this fellowship plan. I am sure that the hon. Minister would agree with me that anyone who has indicated that he has the ability at the undergraduate level, and has the interest in proceeding to the graduate level, should be given every monetary encouragement so that everybody with this ability will have ample opportunity.

I would also suggest to the hon. Minister that it would be quite in order, I feel, if these people who desire to go on for graduate work would be granted permission to pursue this study out of the province with provincial fellowships. I would not even suggest that a rider to the money made available be put in to insist, perhaps, that they be required to return to the province, although every effort should be made to make such a return attractive to them. Certainly any use that we can make of education facilities outside of Ontario for those of our students who require this advanced education we should certainly take advantage of.

In the provision of staffs at the post-secondary level, as well as being sure that every effort is made to train these people, it is essential that better pay scales be established. Of course, the government would not in any way dictate these pay scales. But they would make sure that finances were available so that these people, who would be interested in going into teaching at the post-secondary level, would at least be paid on a level equivalent to what they would get in secondary schools.

There are cases—I suppose they are gradually decreasing in number—but certainly many cases in the universities of the province where people with high academic standing are actually making a monetary sacrifice when they choose to teach at the post-secondary level rather than in the collegiates.

It is also true, as has already been stated in the House, that the government has not provided a safety valve for the numbers of students who may wish to go on to university education that are in excess of the facilities that will be provided through the financial and planning efforts of this government. I do not want to dwell at any great length on the use of television in this regard, but all of the hon. members of this Legislature who have read the Deutsch report know that there is a very serious and carefully worked out plan there whereby, in the view of the presidents of the universities of Ontario, television can be used to provide regular university courses for those students who may not be able to enter universities in the years that lie ahead.

We are glad to read in the press, but I have not read it in any official publication, that the developing universities in the province are going to make some use of educational television on a closed-circuit basis. This is very good, indeed, and it could be that the very best teachers, professors and those with the best background will be able to extend their contact with large numbers of the student bodies in more than one university in this way. The government is to be commended if they had any part in the assistance of this provision.

Mr. Chairman, the relationships between this government and the universities of the province have been very much in the minds of those concerned with education in the past few months and years. We think, particularly, of recent statements from the government benches having to do with what the history of the development of the universities has been; and more recently, of how the universities are going to be dealt with by a new department of government in the years that lie ahead.

I would like first to make some reference to how this government in the past few years has undertaken the financing of necessary university expansion. It appears that the universities have met in private with the hon. members of the government and the Treasury, presumably the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) among others, and negotiations have taken place in secret.

The people of this province, and certainly the hon. members of this Legislature, have never been informed what the original university requirements might have been. There seems to be a very beautiful veneer of gentlemanly undertakings between the government and those representing the universities, so that there is much tut-tutting and looking askance if, in fact, there are any squawks from the university level at all.

Now mind you, from the government's position we have the blandest assurances that all is well. There is a tendency for even those in the Opposition, when they are presented with these statistics, to be assured. Certainly, for those citizens across the province there is ample assurance from the government that all is well as far as university expansion is concerned; and that ample funds are made available without any restrictions or intrusions for the expansion of the universities. Nevertheless, there seem to be some squawks from the university level. It is perhaps advisable that we refer to them at this time.

I think particularly of Dr. Hagey, the president of Waterloo University, who is also chairman of an important commission of the government. He stated categorically that the support that this government has extended to the universities is dangerously short. He mentioned a figure of $65 million, which I believe applied for a period of two years. He said:

We have been instructed by the government—at least by the advisory committee on university affairs—that we extend every effort to accommodate 100,000 students by 1970.

Although I am not quoting him directly, the implication was that this man, who has the responsibility at university level, felt that there was not sufficient support to do this. Many of us have also had an opportunity to read the report of the committee of university teachers, who have indicated once again that in this particular connection the government's support has not been adequate. They very much feared that actual intrusion into the affairs of the university by the government was something that had to be seriously guarded against in the future.

It appears that in summary, for years the grants to universities have been seriously insufficient, at least in the considered opinion of those at the university level. The university people have described them as being distributed in a capricious and inequitable manner, and I understand this distribution is directed by the hon. Minister's advisory committee. It has been necessary to negotiate on a year-to-year basis with the government, without any real assurance of continuing support so that real planning at the university level would have been possible.

I would say, Mr. Chairman, that we have heard announcements about this in the House. I believe it was a year ago, when the hon. Prime Minister said the universities could count on as much money as they had in the past at least. In this way no doubt he felt that some planning would be possible. I would submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that this was a poor guide to go on as far as planning is concerned because there would be very little thought in this part of the 20th century that the grants to universities would be reduced. There is much to be said for the funds being made available for the universities over a period—I would submit, in five-year blocks—so that long-range planning would be possible. It is in this connection that the government can be seriously criticized.

The advisory committee, then, has played a large part in what the government has done in the past few years, in making monies available for the expansion of the universities. I would say to the hon. Minister that one area where perhaps public relations more than anything else has fallen down on the side of the government, is that there is a feeling—and held with much justification by university people—that although the advisory committee is efficient and made up of able men indeed, they do not have sufficient representation of the university community, so that their needs, aside from a strict efficient businesslike approach, would be properly known.

I would read from the list of members of the advisory committee, headed, of course, by Dana Porter, chairman, a man known to many of us, to all of us certainly by reputation. As vice-chairman is former Prime Minister, hon. Mr. Frost, a man whom we hold in high esteem and evidently is very efficient indeed in the workings of this particular committee. The other members of the committee are: Mr. Chalmers, who represents Maclean-Hunter or is employed, I understand, by Maclean-Hunter; Mr. Gathercole, a graduate of McMaster University, and a servant of the public of this province; Mr. Leonard, a Senator; Mr. Mitchell, employed at Super-test Petroleum; the secretary, John R. McCarthy, a gentleman who is advising the hon. Minister this afternoon.

I submit in this list there is no one who would be considered by those at the university level as representing their interest. Certainly the interests of government are well represented here and the interests of business. Mr. Chairman, it has been surely brought to the attention of the hon. Minister of Education and no doubt the hon. Prime Minister, that this is an area in which the expansion of the committee, if it is going to continue to operate, is absolutely essential. We need only think of the other sections in The Department of Education. The affairs of the secondary schools are dealt with largely by people with experience in this field. The same is true of the primary area of education. I would not say they were entirely analogous but certainly the recommendation is an important one and I hope the hon. Minister will consider it seriously.

Mr. Chairman, I was running a tractor with a seed drill all morning. It is a diesel tractor and a very noisy affair, but I must say it was easier to make myself heard there than it is here. Nevertheless, I know there are a lot of very important things going on in the House and perhaps university affairs is not one of the most important.

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education): I am listening.

Mr. Nixon: Okay, as long as the hon. Minister of Education is listening I appreciate it.

As far as new policy is concerned—

Mr. P. J. Yakabuski (Renfrew South): The hon. member better stick his head up in the air if he is going to be heard.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Nixon: You know, Mr. Chairman, over the weekend I had an interesting experience in driving through the areas in Renfrew South and Renfrew North where the hon. member who is interjecting comes from. As I drove through some of those rockbound areas I thought of our rockbound friend here who intrudes in the debate in this unnecessary manner. I hope that he will pay attention to this so perhaps the area in which his representation is most important will be able to benefit from it.

Certainly there is no doubt that the provision of a Department of University Affairs is in response to a widespread concern that this important area of the affairs of this province has not been dealt with effectively over the past few years. As one goes through the country and reads what is said by those concerned with education, there is no doubt that the provision of adequate education at the post-secondary level is in everyone's mind. I submit to the hon. Minister that the government's decision to deal with this by establishing another department is simply in response to this concern.

We trust that this new department will not end up like The Department of Insurance, which is really just a branch of another department. There has been no announcement of a separate Minister to have this responsibility and it may well be that it will be in effect just a branch of The Department of Education. We trust that this is not so, having heard the announcements having to do with the development of this new department.

Certainly the criticism which would level itself, and which would make itself evident in this connection is that the whole area of the responsibility for education is unfortunately being broken by the implementation of the new department. One editorial has said that education was being decapitated and I suppose this is so. It is a shame that the overall planning of education cannot be conducted by one ministerial responsibility. It is obvious that the new department, when it is finally enacted by the Legislature and set up, will take onto itself a considerable amount of responsibility for close investigation of the particulars of what goes on at the university level.

We have heard the hon. Prime Minister and the hon. Minister of Education say—and we agree with them in this—that we want to see that the money which is granted for post-secondary education is well spent and is not wasted. On the other hand, we do not feel that the new department or any other department of government should intrude itself into the everyday university affairs so that its auditors are on the heels of everything that is done by the university. We must regard them as autonomous institutions. We must consider our responsibility to provide at least a share of the wherewithal that will provide the expansion that is so well needed.

I would quote from the Deutsch report in this connection, when the university presidents are discussing the possibility of changing the responsibility for university affairs and have suggested that perhaps a ministry of higher education could be created. We presume that The Department of University Affairs is this.

They say that this arrangement would have the grave disadvantage of giving the government direct control of higher education, a situation that runs counter to the whole tradition of higher education in the English-speaking world. I would say to you, Mr. Chairman, that the traditions of higher education are valued and honoured by almost every member of this House—the man who is presently interjecting possibly excepted. In this connection, it is our responsibility in the Opposition, while going along with the government in saying that the money must be effectively spent—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: I would ask the members to respect the speaker who is on the floor trying to give his message to the members of this Legislature, and would ask your co-operation towards this end.

Mr. Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And so I would say it appears, from reading and listening to the statement that accompanied the introduction of the bill to set up a Department of University Affairs, that there is at least a danger of the intrusion of the Minister of the new department, or some other Minister of responsibility in the government, into the autonomous affairs of the university. In this connection I would like to say that the proposed Capital Aid Corporation does not allay these fears. We know that the money is going to be granted on the direct authority of the new Minister, whoever he may be. Naturally, he will give this recommendation, or he will grant this authority after being suitably advised. But he has the say-so as to who gets the money and how much it will be, which is certainly a direct intrusion if we are to take the words of the Deutsch report as having any meaning in this connection.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I think this is an area that once again is worthy of some exploration. That is, what do the hon. members feel, really, we mean by autonomy, or academic autonomy? We mean by that, perhaps, the reluctance of government to allow a university, say, to establish a faculty of medicine if the government feels there are sufficient faculties of medicine. I am not saying the government takes this position. But is this to be construed as an intrusion into the academic autonomy of an institution?

This is very important and I would like to have the views of both the hon. member for Brant and the hon. member for York South (Mr. MacDonald), because as I have said and the hon. Prime Minister has said on several occasions, it is not the intent of either the legislation or the government to infringe on the academic autonomy of the university. This is not our desire whatsoever. But there are these areas and I would like some thoughts from the hon. members opposite as to whether they would construe this as an infringement on academic autonomy.

Mr. Nixon: I would not think that the situation described by the hon. Minister would be an intrusion in academic autonomy. It would be gross waste of public and private funds, if such a medical school were established when statistically there was absolutely no need for it. As a matter of fact, I could not think of a university that might even suggest they get into the medical school business unless there were some need for this. As I say, I would like to deal with this area of autonomy perhaps later.

However, I would say that in the bill that is setting up the new department and the University Capital Aid Corporation, there is no indication that there will be anything but the Minister's sole judgment as to where the money goes, and as to whether there will be any long-range grant. There is no doubt that he would be advised. He would be foolish if he proceeded without advice. But if the advice he receives does not have the confidence of the university community, then certainly he is heading for trouble along those lines.

I would like, when the opportunity arises, if the hon. Minister would have something to say about how the monies that are going to be loaned by this new corporation will be paid, because surely the income of the universities over which they have direct control is pretty well exclusively from their fees.

To suggest that fees, in the long run, are going to repay the money lent them by the corporation is not reasonable at all. The money will be repaid from future grants. It may well be that this corporation should not be a capital aid corporation to extend loans, but to provide the grants that are going to be needed.

The fear of intrusion into this whole area really centres, in my own mind at the present moment, around what the university fees will be. Certainly the amount of fees charged will depend directly upon the view of the new Minister of University Affairs as to what monies will be made available.

It is interesting to note that in the past few months university after university in the province of Ontario has indicated that they are going to raise their fees next year by an amount of approximately $50. I think the University of Toronto was the last to make this statement. They said their fees would go up $50 to $60. If we were looking at an anti-trust situation, this would almost look like price fixing. Why would they all come to the conclusion at one time that they needed $50 from each student this year?

It almost appears that they sat down with the university advisory committee and they all decided that this is what was required. This may be an intrusion into the freedom of the individual institution. That is one thing that is significant and simply just an indication of what could lie in the future.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I am, of course, in this position as Minister of Education. The university advisory committee reports to the government. I am here today to give the hon. members as much information as I can. The best information I have would indicate that the decision to raise fees by the universities was a decision made very definitely by the individual institutions. There is no question of this.

Also, I would tell the House as Minister of Education that we are reviewing the possibility of raising the bursary or loan limits by whatever the average would be for the increase in fees. If it is roughly $50, sir, then we are going to consider the possibility of the increasing of bursaries by a like amount. This has not been decided because we do not know whether all the universities are doing this. But I can assure the House that as far as I know, the decision to raise fees was one made very definitely by the universities themselves.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, I accept that from the hon. Minister. My particular interest was the fact that the increase was almost identical in the whole university community.

Hon. Mr. Davis: To a degree. I think this would account for it: One does it; then others use whatever the first amount was. I gather it was $50.

Mr. Nixon: Then it seems to me, although all of us are concerned with the provision of facilities, there is every reason to believe that in the next few years there are going to be large numbers of qualified students who will not be able to attend university. It may be that the main point of this afternoon's discussion should not be on the crisis of numbers, but on the crisis in the universities as autonomous institutions.

I submit that I have not attempted to build any ironclad case that would indicate the government is intruding in university affairs. But at this time when we are going to face a continuing crisis at the post-secondary level that we must build well and build carefully. Certainly, there are many expert opinions to go on. I think, particularly, of the report of the committee on higher education from Great Britain that was chaired by Lord Robbins. I am sure that the hon. Minister is more familiar with this report than I. Yet there are parts of it that apply to our own situation precisely, and I would like to deal with it briefly. The report came down in October of 1963. It has been discussed in the press and it is considered very highly indeed by those who have some interest and abilities in education. It begins by talking, at least the part that I wish to refer to, about the responsibility of the state. I refer to page 228 of the report where it said:

It would be generally agreed nowadays that the government has a responsibility to ensure that the development of higher education is adequate to national needs.

Provincial needs in our case.

Moreover, it is clear that in the determination of the aggregate amount to be spent from public funds it necessarily has the last word.

The advisory committee quoted the same passage in their report. It is a very important passage because it has to do with the point the hon. Minister raised a moment ago: That the province, in this case, surely has the responsibility for overall planning and direction.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, may I ask what the hon. member might include in the overall planning and direction? This is a very grey area. I think that in examining this question we get close to trying to assess what university autonomy really is.

Mr. Nixon: I would prefer, Mr. Chairman, to indicate the areas that I would exclude from the government responsibility.

Hon. Mr. Davis: All right.

Mr. Nixon: I must say that my list comes directly from the Robbins report, with some comments that I have added myself. After the responsibility of the state is indicated, it goes on to say that the intrusion into the academic affairs at the university level does not always bring about efficiency or even the best use of the funds available. I would quote from page 229 of the report:

We are convinced also that such academic freedom is a necessary condition of the highest efficiency and the proper progress of academic institutions, and that encroachments upon their liberty in the supposed interest of greater efficiency would in fact diminish their efficiency and stultify their development. This is something that is of paramount importance as the government takes more and more of the responsibility of financing education at this level and it is well for us to accept the warning with all of its gravity.

Certainly there is no worry about infringement of individual freedoms at the university level. We would grant that immediately, although it is interesting to look back at some of the historical events that have occurred in this province. There have been occasions when the Legislature and important members of the Legislature, in years gone by, have undertaken to impose their will on the academic freedom of the university community. But we would assume that in the ordinary course of events this would happen very rarely indeed. So we are not concerned with individual freedom, but more the freedom of the institution to run its affairs in an autonomous way. It is this freedom that could be in danger at the present time.

I believe that the academic community at the post-secondary level must be free to direct its own affairs having to do with appointments to the staff, and the curriculum that is made available at the individual institutions. It may be that there would be a certain amount of overlapping, but surely co-operation and co-ordination among the universities would be better than having a super-authority that would make the decisions based on the statistics and indicate to a university that it would have a certain area of responsibility as opposed to some other.

The whole position of university standards must, of course, be a part of the freedom of the individual institution. I am referring particularly to the standards in the course, rather than the standards of admission at this time, although I will refer to the others in a moment. The fact that certain universities in the province may have been able to develop an aura of excellence, not enjoyed to quite the same extent by all the other universities here, is certainly to the credit of those institutions. We must leave the situation so that such outstanding abilities in certain areas can continue to show themselves, so that the general standards within the university are open to the universities themselves for control.

When it comes to admissions, this is a difficult point and the Robbins commission itself asserts that it is difficult. It is difficult for a government to refrain from making very strong suggestions as to, for example, what the level of admission should be. There have been statements both from this side of the House and from the hon. Prime Minister of the province as to what we would consider a general area for possible admission to the universities of this province. But this is an area which in the last analysis must be up to the administration of the individual institution. It is, however, I submit, the responsibility of the government to see to it that if there are restrictions on the admissions which mean that large numbers of students cannot avail themselves of education, then the responsibility lies with the government to see that suitable alternatives are provided. I would think that this would be a reasonable approach for the government.

To go on, the areas of the balance involving teaching and research must be under the control of the universities. Of course, this would, in the long run, be controlled by the sums available for fostering research, much of which comes from private enterprise as well as from government sources. The general shape of the development of the individual institution must remain, as well, with the university. This means that the government will have to restrict itself considerably in what the new department does when it sets about to direct in a general way, the development of post-secondary education. The responsibility is with the state to provide for the provincial needs. It is also the responsibility of the state to keep its hands out of the day-to-day work of the individual institutions. We on this side are not opposed to either of the bills that will be discussed later in the day. They are a possible solution and a solution that the government has decided that it will use for the problems that face us. It is up to us to indicate the dangers of these particular solutions and I have done this to the best of my ability.

But it is wise, surely, for the government—a Conservative government—to look well at what is a tested solution and an alternative to its present situation and its present plan. I refer to an institution which has developed in the United Kingdom and which has directed the government money into higher education for some years. It has just been carefully investigated to see how effective it really is. I refer to the university grants committee which is fully described in the report that I have been referring to. I would like to quote briefly from the report in this connection right now. This is of course a British report. On page 235 the report says:

Fortunately this country—that is Great Britain:

—seems to have hit upon an administrative invention that, although not precluding all such dangers, has the effect of making them much less probable—a device of interposing between the government and institutions, a committee of persons selected for their knowledge and understanding—

—which would, and I am no longer quoting directly from the report, have the main responsibility for administering these affairs. In this way it is possible to ensure that the necessary measures of co-ordination and allocation, which I would say the government is very directly concerned with, are insulated from inappropriate political influences.

The inappropriate political influences are not the type that might spring to mind immediately from the discussions in this House previously. We are not thinking of any direct appointments or anything like that, but the very fact that the government, which is not an educational authority per se, would intrude its judgment into the everyday affairs of the university community. This device is exemplified in the present arrangements for the famous university grants committee and its principles are best explained by a reference to its constitution.

I want briefly to refer to it. I would say that this committee is made up largely of university people. This does not refer to people having university degrees, obviously. They are people who are associated with the university community in an administrative way or else in a teaching or research capacity. This does not mean that all other interests are kept out. Representation could be as broad as the government saw fit, as long as the majority is not dissociated from university connection.

The committee has two jobs. It advises the government on needs on a rather long-range basis, and secondly, it takes the money that the government in its wisdom and ability provides, and distributes it. In this way it is possible, in the case of England, to provide blocks of money over five-year periods. In this way there is true academic freedom and the institutions are able to be masters of their own development in the sense that I have have tried to define.

It is also true that for special purposes, and it may well be that the medical school the hon. Minister mentioned would be one, that supplementary grants would be approved by Parliament and paid directly, I suppose through the committee, but they would be earmarked grants and paid directly to the recipient university.

The system is flexible, it is tested, it has recently been examined, and it works. I would submit to the hon. Minister that he should look at it carefully—I would like to hear from him what objections there were to forming a university grants committee like this compared with the present proposal for a new department and a continuation of the advisory committee in its present restricted way.

The Robbins report has been very useful not only for the jurisdiction which commissioned it but in areas all over the world that are having this same problem with education at the post-secondary level. It is true that what is effective in England might not work here. It is also true that there are other areas of uncertainty at this level of education and many of them have been raised in the House in the last few days. I think particularly of the difficulties, we might call them a muddle in the area of post-secondary education at the technological level, where we are not sure what the schools will have as their real area of responsibility when they are called technical schools. We do not know how the institutions at the vocational level will be co-ordinated across this province. We know that there is a real conflict of views having to do with community colleges and the extension of academic education at the community level.

The hon. Minister himself has stated that the Deutsch report that I have referred to several times during my remarks, did not go deeply enough into these very areas which are presently giving us so much difficulty. Surely all these things would make a good case for having a committee, or a commission if you would call it that, that would concern itself with all these problems of education at the post-secondary level in the province of Ontario.

Mr. Chairman, my friend, the hon. member for York South, has called for a Royal commission on education which would have a responsibility having to do with the whole area of education. I would think that surely, to be effective, any new investigation along the lines that we have been discussing should be restricted to the area at the post-secondary level, because it is here that the major problems are presenting themselves. There is no doubt that the difficulties at this level will increase over the next few years and certainly be with us for the rest of this century. It is important that we plan very properly and carefully the development of education at the post-secondary level. I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that this can best be directed by a full inquiry into education at the post-secondary level.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Chairman, education is our greatest problem, and within the context of that problem certainly the most challenging aspect is related to higher education. If I can just make a brief comment on one of the concluding observations of the hon. member for Brant, that if we are going to have a Royal commission investigation—or a committee of inquiry, as I described it—into education, that it should be restricted to the secondary field.

I am not going to argue vigorously with him on this. It is rather significant, however, that in Great Britain, following an investigation into the higher levels of education in the Robbins report, there is now a considerable body of opinion emphasizing the view that this has only separated out the higher level of education, and that some of the relationships of the higher levels of education back to the secondary and public level are so intimate that the whole field should be surveyed.

Indeed, Mr. Chairman, it was in the context of that overall need, that I was suggesting a continuing committee of inquiry which would deal with the problems as they move from stage to stage throughout the educational system.

The problem of Grade 13, for example, is a problem at the end of the secondary system but at the beginning of the higher level. It is only one link in the chain.

However, I do not want to pursue that thought any further this afternoon. I want to deal exclusively with the challenges of higher education at the university level without any further comment on the whole range of other post-secondary education, because we have dealt with that to some degree. I agree with the hon. member for Brant that it is a very vague and confused area, and there is desperate need for clarification so that we will know what our lines of direction are.

I think our real problem here this afternoon, and I am glad that we are now relieved of some of the boorish interjections here so that we can give some serious consideration to it—because we are going to be mapping the pattern for the next generation, or conceivably much longer than that, of the higher levels of education which are desperately important, not only from the view of education but from the point of view of economic development and many other related fields.

There are a number of aspects of the problem of higher education and I want to treat of each one of them. The first one is the crisis in numbers; I want to say to the hon. Minister that he has really complicated this picture in a fashion that has left me mystified, over the weekend, as I tried to absorb what he said last Friday. I want to go back and review exactly what has been said and what the hon. Minister now contends is the situation.

I do not know who is correct, but once again it seems to me that it is about time that we got some of the basic facts resolved. In essence, if I may state his conclusion, because I want to come back to it after, what the hon. Minister stated was that this fall, for the coming term of 1964-65, there will be some 38,000 students at our university level and that we were going to have some 40,000 places available at the universities. In other words, we are going to have something in excess of 2,000 places beyond our requirements.

Mr. Chairman, all I can say is let us go back for a moment and review—

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I want to interject this—just reading my notes here again—I said the maximum that could be provided for would be 40,750, but that a more desirable number would be 39,500 and this would still provide us with a margin of roughly 1,400 based on the anticipated enrolment of the universities. I would not want the hon. member to feel that we are suggesting there will be 2,600 surplus. I am suggesting that the happy number would probably be around 39,500.

Mr. MacDonald: I accept the hon. Minister's refinement. I submit it is a little irrelevant to the basic point I am trying to make at the moment. The hon. Minister says we are going to have 2,000 extra places, and, as I shall draw to the attention of the House, all of those who have been studying, with every available statistical assistance for years now, have come to the conclusion that on the basis of this fall we would really be having some 7,000 to 8,000 more students in our universities. However, I am getting to my conclusion without taking it stage by stage, and I want to do that.

For some years now we have been operating on the basis of statistics that were provided in the first instance by E. F. Sheffield who used to be with DBS and who is now with the Canadian University Foundation as their research director. Years ago I knew Ted Sheffield very well. In fact he was my wife's teacher at what is now Sir George Williams University and I have always been interested in his work.

Dr. Jackson, of OCE research, has studied and restudied the statistics in so far as the problems of Ontario are concerned and he has come up with figures that I had been led to believe were conservative estimates. As a matter of fact, Dr. Jackson came up with a number of projections, and the university presidents themselves chose projection number five. I want to come back to exactly what that means in this coming year, but Dr. Jackson has been reassessing this whole picture in the course of developments over the last year, or even the last few months, because there are changing factors in the picture all the while. He has told me personally in discussions I have had with him, and he has said publicly, that in his view, his figures tended to be on the conservative side.

Indeed, Mr. Chairman, I want for just one moment to digress here to put on the record a comment of Dr. Jackson which is part of his very comprehensive and detailed presentation to the Canadian Education Association at its conference in Quebec City last September.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I was there to hear it. It was an excellent presentation.

Mr. MacDonald: It was, yes. I am quoting from page 27 of the mimeographed version.

He said:

In a society which needs not fewer highly educated men and women, but more, a selected process should promise more accuracy than any now available.

Entrance qualifications for students in universities is the topic with which he is dealing.

There is likely to be a real tug-of-war over this problem, probably with the universities on the losing side.

As you know, up to the present time universities have more or less set their own admission policies, and in theory at least each university acted independently. And they obviously desire to retain this right. As a matter of fact, admission requirements have been steadily raised to the point where for some universities up to 40 per cent of the candidates acceptable in my time would now be excluded, including outright rejection of myself. And university authorities have openly stated their intention of raising entrance requirements and standards for each year to even higher levels, understandably enough perhaps in view of increases in knowledge during my lifetime.

But these actions affect national and provincial growth and development in these days when so much depends on brains and so little on brawn, and also the educational plans of many young people of above-average ability. Consequently, and for the first time in this country to my knowledge, not only are the actions of the universities being questioned, but also their right to take such actions.

In Ontario, many parents are gravely disturbed by what seems to them to be an imposition of unreasonably high standards of achievement, and our Premier went so far as to suggest to the universities in his statement in the Legislature on government policy in regard to university expansion, that they seriously consider reducing entrance requirements. McMaster is conducting an experiment along the lines suggested for a limited number of students.

Suspensions have been voiced that the universities are planning to resolve the numbers problem by excluding more and more students, steadily closing the college doors, so to speak, and taking advantage of the crisis to restrict admission to the select few gifted individuals who are highly motivated and practically self-teaching.

My hunch is that social pressures will severely restrict the traditional rights of the universities and these matters generally, and in particular will rudely yank the college doors wide open more or less along the lines of the pattern in the United States. Certainly, the problem of numbers cannot be solved by the easy solution of exclusion, and in fact I predict that the numbers probably will be arbitrarily increased in magnitude by about 20 per cent in the near future through a yielding to social pressures in the matter of admission requirements.

Mr. Chairman, here is a man whose reputation is so unchallenged in government circles that I think we have to pause and reflect upon the full significance of what he said. He has said that educational standards of admission have been raised some 40 per cent in some universities to the point that he would be excluded today. And I may add, so would I, for reasons that I will not go into in detail here.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I might be, too.

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. Minister says he might, too. I think we should get that on the record so as to enlarge this goodly company who would be deprived of the rights of higher education in this day and age.

But he also says that the pressures are going to follow along the lines of what has happened in the United States and I want to come to that. Let us just see what has happened in the United States as compared with Canada, that these pressures are going to force university doors to be opened so that it is likely that the university requirement will be 20 per cent over figures that we have been dealing with.

Mr. Chairman, if that is the case, the projections for 91,000 students in 1970 may well be 110,000 students in 1970, as these pressures now begin to exert themselves. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, I think it is well for us to take cognizance of just how far behind the general North American pattern we are in providing opportunities for higher education. The latest figures—forgive me for quoting from Canada Month but I happened to come across this; it is not one of my usual sources of quotation, I can assure you—

Hon. Mr. Davis: I can get the hon. member the same quotation from a better source.

Mr. MacDonald: These are reliable statistics in this instance. They point out that in 1962, 12.3 per cent of our college-age students were in colleges, that is the age of 18 to 21. To be fair, Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether that 12 per cent includes our Grade 13, which really should be a college bracket. If it does not, the figure might be closer to 15 or 16 per cent. But at the same time that our figure was 12 per cent, in the United States it was 39.5 per cent. They point out that in Sheffield's projection—

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Has the hon. member got the quotation of the British figure?

Mr. MacDonald: No, but it is much smaller, incredibly smaller. I shall not go into the details of the Robbins report which documents how small the British figure is by comparison.

However, let us get back to Sheffield's projection, because they point out that Sheffield's projection for 1970 envisages 21 per cent enrolment of the college age bracket, 18 to 21, as compared with our present 12. By that time they expect that the American figure will have risen from 39.5 to 45 per cent. In other words, the only point I am making, Mr. Chairman, in passing, is that the figures that we have been working with have been modest figures. They are going to end up with the opportunity for higher education going to only half the same percentage of college-age students as will be the case in the United States by 1970. Therefore we should not under any circumstance entertain the proposition that the projections that we have been living with are really too high, that they are going to be reduced.

Let me get back to the theme that I was trying to follow here. In face of all this, it has been contended repeatedly throughout this session by the government that, "We are facing this problem and we are meeting it." They started with the Throne Speech, when they said that "We are in a position to cope with the impending crisis of numbers in 1965." The advisory committee report was made available to us a week or so ago and on page three there is one sentence which says:

The provisions which have been made to date for enrolment have been a little ahead of schedule.

Now we have the hon. Minister coming into the House and contending that we are ahead of schedule, in fact, with the refinement of figures he gives us, we are going to be ahead of schedule this fall, with a surplus of either 1,400 or some 2,600 places for students.

Mr. Chairman, I think it is good once again to go back and take a look at the studies that were made, not just the Jackson and the Sheffield studies, but the Deutsch report. The Deutsch report, when it was made to this House in 1963, I believe it was prepared in 1962—pointed out that by the year 1965 there was going to be a deficiency of 6,000 places in universities in the province of Ontario, and that this deficiency would rise to 10,000 places by 1966 and to between 20,000 and 30,000 places in 1970. This was the clear-cut warning of the Deutsch committee, as a result of which it made recommendations to this government.

What were those recommendations, Mr. Chairman? They were that the government should give consideration to the creation, to the launching, if you will, of some three or four new institutions. There should be a new institution of higher learning in the Niagara peninsula, and they suggested that it should aim for a student population of 1,000 in 1965 to be able to close this gap. They suggested that there should be two colleges in the Metro area, now named Scarborough and Erindale, and each of these should be in a position to accommodate 1,000 students by 1965. And finally, they proposed that we should have an independent university in the Guelph complex and that by 1965 it should have capacity for some 500 students.

The interesting thing, Mr. Chairman, is that the Deutsch report in effect envisaged a closing of this gap of 6,000 by only 3,500—1,000 from each of these three new institutions, plus 500 from Guelph—so they were not closing the gap completely.

Let us analyze what are the up-to-date prospects for each of these new institutions. The hon. Minister draws a very interesting little red herring across the trail by saying that some of these institutions are ahead of schedule because they are going to open up in temporary quarters—which have been made available through finances advanced by the government—this fall rather than 1965, but the student body will be only 100. I am not deploring the making of a start because they will cope with a lot of their problems and iron them out, but it is only 100, and in the overall picture it is only a drop in the bucket.

The prospects, insofar as the hon. Minister has brought us up to date, are that by 1965 you will have not 1,000 students in Brock but only 500, not 1,000 students in Scarborough but only 500, not 1,000 students in Erindale but zero, because Erindale will not be opened at least until 1966, other than perhaps on this experimental 100 student body proposition. At Guelph, presumably, you will have 500, so that instead of closing the gap of 6,000 with 3,500, the hon. Minister is going to be closing that gap as the Deutsch report foresaw it, with three new universities each having facilities of 500 more, a total of only 1,500.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to interrupt the hon. member but I think when he is relating these figures he must also accept the possibility, indeed it is a fact now, that some of the existing institutions have expanded their facilities more rapidly than was anticipated in the original Deutsch report, but I will get into this in greater detail when I reply.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I would appreciate it, and perhaps this is some small measure of the discrepancy that I am trying to analyze here and clarify, but my understanding from the Deutsch report was that they got from the universities a commitment to expand beyond their plans in 1962 and 1963; and that the gap was still going to be 6,000. Therefore, they propose these three or four new universities. So that my understanding, up until now, was that the expansion of the existing universities has been taken into account in these calculations.

However, Mr. Chairman, let me get back now to the present position at which the hon. Minister says we are. He contends that we shall have this fall, 38,100 students at all levels in the university, and that there will be some 40,750 places. Or more accurately, he said some 39,000 and some hundred places.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, once again I apologize for interrupting. If the hon. member will recall my statement accurately, the total number of students in provincially assisted universities will be about 38,100. All these studies, if memory serves me correctly, are based on the entire province, and the estimates for all types of university related accommodation.

As the hon. member is, I am sure, well aware, Waterloo Lutheran has 1,200, or will have in 1964-65; Guelph 1,800; Ottawa University, other than medicine and science, around 2,900; the preliminary year at several universities—which we do not include in the figures—I have given as around 500 for a total of 6,440; OCE, 800; Library School, 105; the denominational and theological colleges somewhere around 700, and the College of Art and the technology division of the Lakehead College, something over 1,000. This totals, Mr. Chairman, 9,137 for 1964-65. And these, Mr. Chairman, are not included when I refer to the provincially assisted universities. I think this figure, perhaps, will make up for a very large portion of the discrepancy which the hon. member is concerned about.

Mr. MacDonald: I wish I could say that the hon. Minister has clarified the picture. Just let me go on and present to him the basics as I see them.

I have tried to remind the House that the estimated figures that we have been living with, if anything, are on the conservative side and why they are on the conservative side. Indeed, we may be working for an objective in 1970 that is too low.

Let me go back to what the Deutsch prediction was for 1964-65. Estimate number five, which has been accepted by the university presidents, establishes the projection for this fall at 46,300. When Dr. Jackson reviewed this in his presentation to the Canadian Education Association in Quebec City last September, his projection—as found on page 16 of his speech—is for 45,300 to 45,400. Let us settle on a figure between 45,000 and 46,000. He has said since that he feels this figure should be revised upwards. This certainly means—and this is what I want the hon. Minister to address himself to some time—that the hon. Minister is coming in and saying we will have 38,000 students, whereas Dr. Jackson and everybody else has said we should be having this year between 45,000 and 46,000.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I will try to make this clear for the hon. member right now. I think we can accept, as one basis to work from at least, the estimate of Dr. Jackson. I have some very recent information. I called Dr. Jackson in Kingston yesterday. But dealing with the other aspect for the moment, I have stated that on the information that is available to the university committee and to the department, we will have 38,100 and that we will have space for approximately 39,500—or, if he wants to, use the other figure 40,750. These are for the provincially assisted institutions. Out of that has been taken certain areas like OCE, which we do help finance, but they are not included in the figure when we refer to provincially assisted institutions. So that adding to the 39,500 figure for 1964-65 you will have enrolled in these other institutions something in excess of 9,000 students.

Our best estimate is that we will have accommodation in 1964-65 for roughly 48,500. From this, we would anticipate, if we include this 9,000 figure as being related to the number of students attending these institutions, somewhere in the neighbourhood of, perhaps, 46,000 or 47,000 students who may be anxious to enter these institutions. What the hon. member has to do is add the places available in the non-provincially assisted institutions to the 39,500; taking the lower figure. The hon. member will find that we are not very far away. In fact, we are ahead of the estimate that we call estimate five prepared by Dr. Jackson. I hope I have made myself clear, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MacDonald: May I ask the hon. Minister, while he is on his feet, what are the institutions again that he has listed that are not provincially assisted?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Yes. Waterloo Lutheran University, 1,200; the Federated Colleges at Guelph, 1,800; Ottawa University—we have deducted from this number the medicine and science faculties because they are provincially assisted—2,940; the preliminary year at several universities where there will be roughly 500 students which are not included in our other estimates; for a total of 6,440. Then there is the OCE and the Library School for 900. Then there is Huron College and Brescia College for 702. These are not provincially assisted but they will accommodate this number of students in 1964-65. Then we have the Ontario College of Art and the technology division at the Lakehead College, for an additional 1,090, making a total of 9,000 plus. These, Mr. Chairman, should be added to the figure of 39,500 if we take the lower figure.

Mr. MacDonald: I thank the hon. Minister. I think I see it now. All I can say to him is that I hope, in some fashion or other, he gets this information out to the public. While he maybe was able to contact a lot of the people now at a conference in Kingston, I was not able to but I did contact a considerable number of people in university circles here in Toronto over the weekend and since then. They were as mystified as I was. I see the explanation now and I think it should be communicated, if possible.

However, all that this really does, Mr. Chairman, if we move forward into other aspects of the problem of higher education, is to remove the problem of the crisis of numbers from the government's complacency. I will concede to the hon. Minister that he has now resolved—

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I want to make one thing very clear: This government is not the least bit complacent when it comes to post-secondary education. We regard it as a very serious problem.

Mr. MacDonald: I hold in my hand an editorial of the Globe and Mail of February 10th which opens thus:

The Ontario government took a complacent view of the progress of the universities in its review of provincial affairs presented in the Throne Speech at the opening of the Legislature last month: "With the assistance of substantial government grants, our universities are continuing to expand at a rate sufficient to meet the needs of the rapidly increasing numbers of young people seeking university education."

These reassuring words were true as far as they went, but there are a number of critics who think that they did not even begin to discuss the real problems of the universities.

I am one who agrees with that. I want to go on now to deal with some of these other problems because, if I may just state generally the position of the New Democratic group in this House, we have serious misgivings—as I think everybody in the higher education level has. Let me rephrase that. We have some misgivings with regard to the proposition of establishing a Department of University Affairs.

We were cognizant of the sensibilities of people in university circles with regard to interference in university independence and autonomy. But despite these undercurrents, the university presidents chose not to be articulate on the point. They have accepted the proposition of this department. We, therefore, I think, have no alternative than to go along with it.

However, Mr. Chairman, in the government's decision as to the relationship that will be established between this new department and the university, I want to suggest that our misgivings are so great as to on some occasions be opposed to specific proposals the hon. Minister has made, or that the government has made. I want to deal with those now.

In the first place, for example, I think one should take note of the fact that there has been a strange sort of unwillingness to communicate publicly on some of these matters on the part of the government and to a degree even more—and I say this frankly and pointedly—on the part of university presidents. Bascom St. John had an article in which he referred to the people who are speaking for universities, it was on February 10, and his comment was that "There have been individual exceptions, but on the whole our university people had been modest to the point of inaudibility."

This is a pretty accurate description. One could talk with them personally, and hear a good deal of grumbling and objection, but for some reason or other they will not raise their voices. It is fear of the reaction from the government; and it is complicated by a feeling that they are in a competitive position—which surely is the height of folly—with other institutions of higher learning, with the result that they all want to play it cozy and quiet. It is not out in the open where, I submit to the hon. Minister and to the hon. Prime Minister, it should be if we are going to build public interest and support for the needs of higher education at the present time.

There was one rather interesting exception to this. It comes from a man whom I had assumed for other reasons the Ministers of this government had confidence in, and I am referring to Dr. Hagey of Waterloo. They had sufficient confidence in him that they chose him to head their Medicare or medical insurance investigation—if I do not intrude that nasty word Medicare where the government does not want it. But on March 4, Dr. Hagey really spoke forth. He said, for example, as quoted in the Globe and Mail:

Last year the government grants were $26,000 short of the funds requested for the university.

Sorry. It was $26 million. And he added:

It is now well known that the university grants in the new budget are $39 million short of that requested by the university.

In other words, if the universities last year were asking for approximately $96 million and they got $70 million, this year they are asking for $140 million and they got $101 million.

Now this is a pretty important statement, in view of the mechanism that the government has decided they are going to establish. Indeed, in the supplementary reports to the Deutsch report on behalf of the university presidents, they complain that they are not going to be able to meet the objectives of 1965 in expanding their facilities, because last year they got only 60 per cent of the capital grants they required.

This brings us, Mr. Chairman, into the whole sensitive area of the relationship of the universities to the government within the format of The Department of University Affairs that the government has now established.

The hon. Minister intervened once or twice when the hon. member for Brant was speaking and he was trying to solicit from the hon. member for Brant some of his thoughts in exploring these sensitive areas. It was a very skillful little intervention on his part. Well, I want to meet head on his proposal for exploring some of these, because I have some specific suggestions to make and some of them are in opposition to the proposals the government has made. But first I want to quote Bascom St. John again, who on April 26, just a couple of weeks ago, made this observation:

It might be said that the method the government chose would be the test of its sincerity in proclaiming its desire to preserve university autonomy.

I concede to the hon. Minister and the hon. Prime Minister sincerity on their part in wanting to maintain the independence and the autonomy of young universities, but I think Bascom St. John has put his finger on the acid test. The acid test of sincerity is the machinery we are willing to establish, and in the light of experience in Canada and elsewhere, whether or not you have chosen that particular machinery which will least intervene, which will create the least danger of intervention in university affairs and university independence. I want to suggest to the government that this is precisely what they have not done.

For example, let us consider the advisory committee. I want to suggest, Mr. Chairman, that in my view the advisory committee has outlived its usefulness. Lest anybody suggest that this is just my view alone, I think it is rather interesting and useful to turn to the comments that have been made by a number of people.

I turn first, for example, to the annual report of Dr. Claude Bissell of the University of Toronto. On page six of the Varsity Graduate reproduction he said this:

The advisory committee on university affairs has been a useful intermediate stage and has worked with the committee of presidents in the establishment of several co-ordinating programmes but it appears likely that a stronger and more representative body will be needed in the near future.

Now, at least, he was very seriously criticizing the present status of the committee, if not indeed suggesting that the day had passed for a useful contribution from the advisory committee. Dr. Bissell is one, I would say, who along with the university presidents has tended to talk in somewhat muted tones. Indeed I hear that there has been an exchange of letters between Dr. Bissell and the

"Laird of Lindsay," Mr. Frost, in which, if it could be published, you might have about as forthright a discussion of some of these very delicate problems in relation between university and the government as is possible. I wonder if the hon. Minister cannot persuade the two principals involved to publish them; then we could get this discussion going.

Some newspapermen succeeded in digging out some of the buried facts with regard to representations on these delicate issues such as the university faculties report that the Globe and Mail dug out a couple of months ago, and I want to come to that in a moment. Nobody has succeeded in unearthing for the public this alleged correspondence between Mr. Frost and Dr. Bissell.

However, there was Dr. Bissell's view. The Globe and Mail editorial that I quoted from a moment ago though, had a comment with regard to the advisory committee. This is what they said; it was on February 10:

The existing advisory committee on university affairs has wholly failed to do the job required of it and might well be courteously retired.

There was a second view. Let us take a look, for example, at a couple of comments that Bascom St. John has made with regard to the university advisory committee. He refers to it as:

An amateurish and unsatisfactory advisory committee in university affairs that the government has on its hands.

This is one of the problems of the government, in his view.

I have here a quotation that was carried in the Toronto Telegram on March 19 quoting Dr. R. G. Stanton, editor-in-chief of the Ontario Mathematics Gazette from the University of Waterloo in which he said:

The former Ontario Premier, Leslie Frost, failed to recognize the approaching university problem during his term of office.

He made a charge in the latest issue of the magazine, usually read only by professional mathematicians and teachers, that the provincial government is not only lax in support for provincial universities in the past but it is still so. The tragedy here, Mr. Chairman, is that a great deal of this criticism, perhaps for understandable reason, is tending to be focused on Mr. Frost so that the usefulness of his contribution, because of the growing criticism, is being seriously brought into question. Finally, you had the observations of the university faculty, the Ontario Council of University Faculties, as found on page 32 to 34 of their report. This is what they have to say on page 33:

With all due respect we observe that the members of the advisory committee cannot be accepted to have an intimate knowledge of university matters since none of them have had the experience as a university teacher or administrator. They are all busy men with many other responsibilities both public and private.

There can be no question that comprehensive and continuous review of university matters is necessary, but we strongly believe that the committee as constituted and staffed at present is not an appropriate body to undertake it. In addition, we believe that the responsibility for providing informed and comprehensive advice does not lie with the body which determines the provincial grants to universities.

Then they go on to make specific proposals that I want to come back to in a moment.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I think it rather significant to take note of what the advisory committee on university affairs itself had to say. Indeed, in the latter part of their report, they say this, on page 18:

The new department will relieve the advisory committee of a number of functions it is now performing and may indeed remove any necessity for the advisory committee to continue.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, let it be said of the advisory committee that they are becoming sufficiently sensitive to the growing feeling that they had outlived their usefulness and the mounting tide of criticism particularly in university circles with regard to their role, that they themselves suggested to the government that perhaps the time had come for them to pass out of the picture. In Dr. Bissell's term they had served very effectively at an intermediate stage.

The government in its wisdom has said no. It has reappointed the advisory committee. It says it is going to expand its personnel.

However, it has not, as far as I have been able to discern, clarified exactly what is going to be the function of the advisory committee now that The Department of University Affairs has been set up.

This brings us to a second aspect about which we in the New Democratic Party have such serious misgivings that they go to the point of being opposition. This is to the government's proposal for a capital aid corporation, as a device, for making money available on a loan basis to the universities to meet their current needs and then to cope with the—

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I think we should make it very clear this does not extend to current needs. This is for capital.

Mr. MacDonald: I am sorry. I meant current expansion needs, the present expansion of the universities. Again, if it will not provoke them to some sort of frenzy—some of the government backbenchers to my left here—I want to make a couple of quotations from J. Bascom St. John. He has reflected on this issue with regard to the role of the grants committee or this capital aid corporation. On April 27, Bascom St. John said this:

All submissions for capital assistance will be made to the new department and only on recommendation of the Minister will loans be made by the new capital aid corporation. Surely this will not provide the assurance of autonomy that the universities desire nor does it assure the public that the government realizes what its responsibility is in this vital field.

The following day he had this to add:

Nevertheless, in spite of the fact that the Premier has stated with unquestionable sincerity that there is no intention of interference with the autonomy of the universities, it remains true that The Department of University Affairs will exercise such an interference every time it says it will not approve a request from a university. The government has kept university affairs in politics by the method it has adopted. Under the scheme it has adopted the government will be directly involved in specific decisions on each and every building project and with the administrative budget of each university.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, Bascom St. John has contended, and I am inclined to agree with him, that the government's decision that the size of grants is going to rest now with the Minister instead of with the university advisory committee presenting recommendations to the Minister, is going to result in an intervention in the independence and the autonomy of the university each time it is done. When one takes into account along with that, Mr. Chairman, that this capital aid corporation is going to be administered by a committee of five—why in heaven's name you need five people to make decisions with regard to what grants are going to be made to universities, I do not know; indeed, it reminds one of an earlier comment—

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I have great respect for the gentleman that the hon. member has been quoting, Mr. St. John, and I think he raised this in his article as well, if I recall it correctly. I should point out that the Crown corporation will not assess the applications for loans. It will not make the decisions. Its function will be the same as with any other Crown corporation, to market the debentures and look after the financial aspects of it.

I question the thought that Mr. St. John expressed that this in itself was any infringement on autonomy at all. I cannot follow this argument, because to me it is strictly a financial matter. The Crown corporation is responsible for the making available of the funds and the marketing—or however these matters are done, I am not that familiar with it—of the actual bonds or debentures. These gentlemen that you refer to are not related in any way to the project or the type of application or the monies being lent to the universities.

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. Minister has really raised a new problem and that is that all these men are going to do is administer a corporation which will decide how much money will be sent out once the decision has come from the Minister. As Bascom St. John has quite rightly suggested, this is a bureaucrat's dream that you should have five people assessing what the Minister has already decided, when all you need is a good-grade clerk and stenographer who is going to see that the cheques are made out and mailed after the Minister has made his decision.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I do not pretend to be a financier, but if you are going to market $2 million or $3 million in debentures to cover this, there is no problem making out the cheques. But I suggest there may be some problem in arranging for the money. This is the duty of this corporation and I suggest that a clerk, with due respect to the ability of the clerk, whoever he may be, is not really up to doing this kind of task.

Mr. MacDonald: I can come back and quote Bascom St. John for his own defence.

The above procedure, as a means of financing university groups, seems to be a bureaucrat's dream—wasteful and expensive to administer. Surely in all of the administration of The Department of the Treasury, once you have decided—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Chairman, there is no cost of administration. It will be conducted from the Treasury in exactly the same way the Ontario Municipal Loan Development Fund is operated.

Mr. MacDonald: Right.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: And this will involve no other personnel. The decision is made and then the financing is done. Now I read Mr. St. John's article. He is a little concerned about the complication of the bill. The complication of the bill comes about because in order to sell a debenture it is necessary to have statutory authority to do certain things. In other words, a clerk cannot sit in a back room and sign a debenture and proceed to sell it. It is a technical matter, you know this, and the man who buys a debenture is looking for the security for the money he is putting up. He wants to know: Do you have legal power to sign this debenture? Are these people properly authorized? Where is the statute? And so on and so forth. To any lawyer who has practised in the financial world, this is standard form. You may wonder sometimes when you buy a debenture yourself or a share of stock, with all the material that appears on it, but this is to meet certain legal requirements and really, in fact, is an administrative problem. It has nothing whatsoever to do with the purpose of the corporation in assisting in the financing.

I will have something to say about this later on. I do not want to get into the purposes of the corporation, but I do want to point out that many of these things are purely technical. We are following the form we have used in dealing with the municipal fund, which is now a revolving fund in that so much goes out and so much comes in on a continuous basis. This is the purpose for—

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to spend too much time on this because I want to get back to the real problem of the relationships of government and university and this is an administrative detail. But I want to touch on the proposition that the Minister is going to make the decision as to how much money is going to be out, and then the collective decisions are going to be handed over to a group of five who are going to cope with the problems of raising this money. Certainly they need statutory requirements, this is obvious. But why do you have to have a separate body to raise each allotment of money that is required for the government? You must have any number of officials in the Treasury, because this government is going to finance the refunding and the repayment of these loans through grants to the universities later. This is Parkinson's law in full force here, in terms of setting up new organizations to do each job.

However, Mr. Chairman, let me get back to the main point. That this administrative detail, and the government does not think it is complicated, is of secondary concern. The main concern is the proposition which, once again, Bascom St. John has put it in these terms:

In effect, therefore, the total a university has to spend in any one year is decided by the government, not by the university. It is not surprising that universities feel that they are losing their freedom and autonomy. This is an intolerable situation.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, if I may. Mr. Minister, please! I am trying to get my sequence of thoughts down here. You have had your chance and you will have a chance again. I welcome some later explanation of it.

But I am submitting to you that in the particular technique that you have chosen, you are going to not only give the appearance but it will be a reality of intervening in university affairs. It will be an unnecessary intervention because there is another way in which it could be done.

I want to turn now to that other way. In fact, if I may just conclude by going back some months when Bascom St. John was projecting what was going to come from this government following the Throne Speech, he had a very harsh comment. This is back on February 10. He said:

The problem facing Premier John Roberts is gigantic and we have a great deal of sympathy for him, but he is headed for disaster, educational or political, if he does not make a clean break with past methods and past mentalities.

And I submit to the hon. Minister, in recapitulating what I have said so far, that in perpetuating the advisory committee—which is rapidly losing the confidence of the people involved—you are perpetuating these mentalities. In perpetuating this kind of a procedure by which the government is going to make the decision on grants you will be intervening in university affairs each time you are doing it. You have chosen a technique which is going to be interpreted, and quite rightly so, as an unnecessary intervention into university affairs.

What is the alternative? Mr. Chairman, there is an alternative. It is a tried alternative. It is the alternative. I will not repeat by going back into the Robbins report that the hon. member for Brant quoted at considerable length. It is the university grants committee. Now the grants committee is not a perfect technique. There were growing suggestions before the Robbins report came out that even the university grants committee in Great Britain was, behind the scenes, influenced unnecessarily and to a considerable degree by the government. But it still lessens to the greatest extent possible the intervention of the government in university affairs, an objective which you have set for yourself. I credit you with sincerity in stating it, but what I am now deploring is that you have chosen techniques that mean that your sincere objective is not going to be fulfilled to the extent that it might.

But let us not go over to Great Britain. Let us come back to Ontario, because here you have a group of people who are very interested in this matter—the council of university faculty members. They have come up, without going into the detail of quotations, concerning their position with a double suggestion—that there should be an academic advisory committee, which is going to look after all matters other than grants to the universities, and that you should separate the two functions.

You should not have the same body trying to do the two jobs. I would submit, Mr. Chairman, in my view this is the kind of body that would be one of the many sub-committees to a continuing committee of investigation into education which I suggested to the hon. Minister earlier in the estimates.

Along with your academic advisory committee you would have a grants committee. On this grants committee you would have people who have university administrative experience, just as you would have people with academic experience on the other. But they would be people who could speak from a knowledge and not just the certain detachment of having been Premier of the province in years gone by and coped with the problems, or having been a publisher and conceivably sat on the board of governors of the university; but people who are personally familiar with the field. This the government has chosen not to do. The Minister is going to make the decisions with regard to the grants, conceivably with some advice from the advisory committee. I do not know whether they are going to have a continuing role in this connection.

In this respect, Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the government that I think they are wrong. I think that they should establish a grants committee that could be interposed between the government and the universities. It would, as has been spelled out in the experience in Britain and as spelled out by the university faculties brief here, sit down with the universities, assess their overall needs and come up with an aggregate figure which they will present to the government. If the government says we cannot meet that figure, then they go back and reassess what kind of pro rata reduction in the overall grants they are going to have to make to meet the needs of each individual university.

In this way you will eliminate, to the extent that it is humanly possible, the contention that there is intervention in university affairs. You have not done it and, therefore, you have not fulfilled the sincere objective the hon. Minister has proclaimed on a great number of occasions.

Mr. Chairman, there are two other points that I want to touch on briefly, primarily to request comments from the hon. Minister.

I was interested in reading the Robbins report their emphasis in providing opportunities for higher education to foreign students. The last time I raised this in the House I immediately got some interjections from certain quarters of the House. If we are going to be crowded in getting our own children into the universities, are you suggesting that the foreign students will go there first? I hope that we can be civilized and mature enough not to sink to this kind of attitude.

I would agree that Canadian universities in the overall picture today have an obligation as a member of the world family of nations to provide opportunities for higher education to university students from abroad. In Great Britain, it is some 10 per cent. Indeed it rises to something over 30 per cent in the post-graduate courses, if I recall the figure correctly. However, I will say this to the hon. Prime Minister and to the hon. Minister: I think that this government has a very strong case—I am curious to know of either the hon. Prime Minister or the hon. Minister whether they have presented this case at Ottawa at the federal-provincial conferences—that Canada's contribution in providing opportunities for higher education to foreign students is obviously part and parcel of our external affairs programme. And, therefore, the universities of the province of Ontario should be reimbursed to the extent that they are providing these facilities. This is not a new suggestion on my part. I made it last fall during the election campaign as part of a general plea that, if the government could not meet the needs of the universities adequately, they should go to Ottawa and lay it on the line. Either meet them adequately here or go to Ottawa and ask for assistance.

Without getting into the broader issue, I think we have a solid case with regard to foreign students to go to Ottawa and say this is part of our relationship with the Commonwealth and with the rest of the world through the United Nations. Therefore, Ottawa can—without getting into constitutional problems of provincial jurisdiction over education—make this kind of a grant. I ask the hon. Minister, when he comments later, will he indicate whether or not that kind of grant has been explored with the federal government?

The second issue I want to raise with the hon. Minister because I, personally, am as worried about this as I am about anything on the level of higher education. I do not know what the answer is to it and I am interested to know whether the hon. Minister can answer it. We can build the buildings; we can find the money if we are determined to do it; but we cannot acquire the staffs that may be necessary to teach this tidal wave of students that will be with us—not just in 1965, but for the next generation or more through to about the year 2,000. This is another point that Dr. Jackson has emphasized.

Some years ago, as Dr. Northrop Frye commented in an address that he gave down at the Kenneth E. Norris memorial lecture at Sir George Williams University this past winter, back in the depression years a university teacher had a very lowly status. He—Dr. Frye—put it in rather a colourful way. He said that during the depression “the younger university instructor had approximately the social status of a door-to-door pencil salesman.” He contrasted that with the intensely competitive position that the university teacher finds himself in today. In fact, his description, in an equally colourful way, was that the situation of the instructor today is a very different one. Instead of having a status of a door-to-door pencil salesman he now has, or soon will have, approximately the social status of a free taxi in the pouring rain.

This is something of which we simply have got to take greater cognizance. I give full credit to the government in its post-graduate scholarship—the $1,500,000 that was made available last year and the $2 million that is going to be available in the coming year. I will say that on this occasion the government perhaps is as close as they have ever been to claiming that this was a programme without parallel on the North American continent, or even the universe, in that grandiose fashion to which they sometimes lay claim.

However, Mr. Chairman, I think we might as well face the fact that salaries to university teachers in the province of Ontario are from $3,000 to $10,000 less a year than they are in the United States, as pointed out in the faculty brief.

Indeed, as the hon. member for Brant noted, one of the ironies—showing that we still have not escaped completely the status of the depression years—is that there are universities in the province of Ontario where this year, in negotiations for salary revision, the faculty association has set as their objective that they will get salaries equivalent to secondary school teachers in the province of Ontario.

The hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond) might be rather startled if he knew which university it is.

This just reveals how much further we have to go. In the brief of the faculty, they emphasize the watering down of the standards in university teaching. The fact that so many of the newcomers are just lecturers, that there are so many fewer PhDs means that they simply are not going to be in a position to meet the needs, to meet the rights, of the students. You have a "body" before the class, just as we had bodies when we were taking crash programmes to get public and secondary school teachers in the province of Ontario, but we are not going to have adequately qualified people.

What is the answer to this? I concede to the hon. Minister that this is perhaps the main responsibility of the universities, or is in the main the responsibility of the universities.

The government has made its contribution in part through the post-graduate scholarships, but does the hon. Minister think, for example, that there is any possibility of recruitment from other areas of the economy; for example from industry, in some areas where qualified people with post-graduate qualifications could be recruited?

I have wondered, and indeed I discussed this at one time with Dr. Jackson who seemed to be inclined to think that there was something in it, that if one were really to fine-tooth comb the community, we would find that there were many people who had post-graduate experience; graduates from universities in Europe who could be drawn back into teaching at the university level, perhaps with some limited amount of post-graduate work to get back into the field again.

In this context I think, for example, there has to be something done to shake the academic world out of a pretty deeply imbedded prejudice against women as teachers at the higher educational level.

But all of these, I have a deep seated feeling, are only gestures toward meeting a desperate need, a need which is revealed in the fact that a year ago there were 2,100 teachers on the staffs of Ontario universities and it is estimated that by 1970 they will need anywhere from 7,500 to something over 8,000.

Now does the government really think that the steps they have taken, and that the universities are taking, are going to provide this staff? Because if they do not think it is going to be provided it is rather idle for us to build the buildings and to crowd the students in when perhaps all we will have is mass TV circuits to provide the freshman class and not be able to meet the needs of honour students and post-graduate students and all those other areas that make a university into something more than a glorified secondary school.

I solicit the hon. Minister's comments on that last but most important problem in higher education.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I shall endeavour to answer as best I can the, shall we say technical, questions posed by the hon. member for York South and by the hon. member for Brant. The hon. Prime Minister will be dealing with the overall policy or the principles expressed in the bills.

Dealing with the last question raised by the hon. member for York South, he will be interested to have the following salary figures from the University of Toronto. The deans at the university are earning roughly $17,868; the professors with administrative duties around $17,152 down to associate professors at $10,000; assistant professors are at $8,000 and lecturers at $6,600.

I think there is no question that it would be very foolish for me to stand up here and say that we will not have a problem with staff, because I think it is quite obvious that we will have to exert every ingenuity to see that we have sufficient staff in the universities.

The graduate fellowship programme is almost doubled this year and I think we can draw some very substantial encouragement from this. Yet the one problem we face is that there is no guarantee that these people who hold the graduate fellowships are necessarily going to remain with universities. But I think hon. members would acknowledge that this is a very forward step. In my questioning of Dr. Jackson yesterday I specifically asked him about the staff situation and he felt that we had made tremendous strides in this regard and that there was a possibility with the graduate fellowship programme that we would go a long way to meeting the staff problems.

I think that it is also possible that we can recruit staff from other jurisdictions. As a matter of fact the University of Toronto is recruiting staff now in Great Britain, as I am sure the hon. member knows. I have discussed the other aspect with Dr. Jackson, the possibility of there being a number of people in business and industry, and I think this is an area too that could be, and probably should be, explored.

I suggest to you that the numbers of students in the graduate fellowship programme are significant and I think we can draw some real encouragement from this; but to say that this alone will solve the problem, Mr. Chairman, I would not say.

Dealing with the question of non-resident pupils, I think the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher) asked this question last year as to the percentage of students from outside the jurisdiction who were attending the University of Toronto. I do not have the specific information here, but I think it was in the neighbourhood, roughly, of from eight per cent to ten per cent. Now whether this applies generally across Ontario, I do not know. I would think, for instance, at the University of Windsor there would be a fair percentage of, say, American students. While the provincial average may not be eight per cent or ten per cent, I would agree, Mr. Chairman, that there should be a number of outside-the-jurisdiction students attending our universities.

I think we do have an obligation, and we have recognized this in that we are permitting 20 per cent of the graduate fellowships for non-resident students. In this way we hope to encourage students from outside the province to come here for their post-graduate work and we are hoping, of course, that as a result they will remain here in our universities and this is a very genuine attempt to meet the problem.

I wish to deal with the segment that the hon. member read of Dr. Jackson's address. It was a very excellent speech he made. I was at the educational association gathering—it was the day after the election, sir, if memory serves me correctly—and seeing as the hon. member has quoted one section from it, I want to just quote another for the record, because I know he would be interested in having this part quoted.

Mr. MacDonald: Oh, I know which one that is.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Dr. Jackson says here, dealing with forecasts:

I urge every province to make such forecast and then publish them together with their proposals for meeting the needs so revealed. May I remind you that our province, Ontario, has done so and that our government has issued a comprehensive statement of policy on the matter? Knowing the comments made from time to time about staid, conservative Upper Canada, I may be granted a moment to gloat and to frame a challenge to each of the other provinces to match, or surpass, if you can, our efforts!

Quebec may have already done so, and that is one of the things I wish to investigate later on. Still, there you have it; the picture of prospective university enrolment; Ontario as a model, and as a challenge.

What more could you ask for in one afternoon? I just want that to be part of the record.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, all I can say, in the kindest way possible, is that he is a civil servant and he has to live with you people.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I have a very high regard for Dr. Jackson. The hon. member expressed the same regard, and quoted from certain sections of his speech. I thought it only appropriate that we quote other sections as well.

Dealing with the matter of projections, Mr. Chairman, this is an area that I think we must be concerned about. The advisory committee has been going primarily on what we refer to as estimate No. 5. I hope I have cleared up, to a degree at least, the problem in the minds of the hon. members with respect to 1964. I think this has resolved the problem about the estimate. The hon. member for Brant asked for this. The 1965-1966 estimate is 54,500; 1967-1968, 73,900; 1969-1970, 88,200, and 1971-1972, 94,200. I am not prepared to say here this afternoon that these figures are the maximum figures. I think that we must accept the fact that they could be higher than this. We must make our plans accordingly and at the same time keep in mind that we do not want to over-extend or to waste funds in so doing.

I quite appreciate the suggestion made by the hon. member for York South that there is no question that one should not use these as the basic figures. This, of course, is related, in my opinion at least, to the other areas of post-secondary education—the number of students in two or three years' time who may be proceeding to institutes of technology rather than to the universities. This is another area that of course requires study and it is very difficult to determine the exact number. I think it is impossible other than through some form of intensive study and investigation.

Regarding the question of the statements made by certain individuals as to the "shortfall"—I think this has been the popular term used by two or three people commenting on the adequacy or inadequacy of the government's contribution to universities—I have only this to observe, Mr. Chairman, that in the areas of operating grants, in the 1963 grants the universities were given, depending on how you once again want to construe the figures, between 90 and 95 per cent of their total request for operating purposes. This year, 1964, they are once again being given somewhere within that neighbourhood for operating purposes.

The question of capital, Mr. Chairman, becomes difficult, and while I appreciate Dr. Hagey's views in these matters, I would suggest that some of the observations he made and those which appeared in the Ontario Mathematics Gazette—I read it very carefully—are made on the basis of misinformation. I think quite frankly that some of the material presented by the Ontario Council of University Faculty Associations also was prepared without the full information being available to it as far as capital grants are concerned.

I think this is one of the obvious benefits of the method of financing for capital purposes through the Crown corporation, which the hon. Prime Minister will touch on. That is, instead of the universities coming year by year for a specific allotment, they try to forecast years in advance. They can do this on a continuing basis so that there will be a more comprehensive or intelligent approach to the whole question of capital spending. I would observe to you, without getting into any details, that all the capital available to the universities was not spent when they made their last submission, and this is natural because some projects move more rapidly than others. I think this in itself, Mr. Chairman, would indicate where the idea of a "shortfall," if it were to be called this, might occur in the minds of some people. In fact, when it comes to the actual construction or the availability of projects, it may not be the fault of the lack of provision of finances as far as the government is concerned.

This is one of the very difficult areas. The advisory committee has contributed, I think, Mr. Chairman, very substantially to the development of universities here in Ontario. I think that while there are many problems to be faced, all of us can take some credit at least today for what has been accomplished. We do not have perfection by any means, but nonetheless we do have a system here that I think does some credit to the entire province.

I have not answered, I am sure, all the specific questions. Perhaps when the hon. Prime Minister has dealt with the overall policy in relation to these, if there is some further information about other specific items that I can give you I will be happy to do so at that time.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Mr. Chairman, I wanted to particularly speak about the new department that is being created, which is part of this debate, and also the Ontario University Capital Aid Corporation. I made some comment about the corporation and perhaps I could deal with that first.

We have followed, as I said, the pattern of the Ontario Municipal Improvement Corporation and while this may appear cumbersome there are very good reasons for it. It is not an exercise in Parkinson. It will involve no new employees as far as the government is concerned. It is just a method of accomplishing what we want to accomplish and the first of these purposes, of course, is to spread the capital cost of our universities over a period of years. I think this is good financing. I think we all realize that we are in an area, or in a situation, where we have to spend very large amounts of money very rapidly. Yet it is not necessarily correct that these should be paid for out of current revenue, nor is it correct that some of the cost of these university facilities in the years ahead should not be borne by those who will benefit from the institutions.

In addition, this corporation will be able to provide funds as they are required without any relation to anybody's particular fiscal year. This, of course, is part of our scheme for easier planning on a long-range basis for our universities. We will make money available to the universities all year around. What happens to them now, and what has happened to them in the past, is that out of current revenue the amount they are to receive is allocated to them. They ask the government for it as they require it, and when we come to the end of the fiscal year the balance is paid to them. They have, in each year, received the amount that is allocated to them, whether in fact they have used it in that year or not.

You can see this is not a particularly wise way to do business and with a corporation of this type which has funds available to it without relation to our particular Budget here or without relation to the university budgets, money will be available to them all year around. Money will then be available to them on two bases: one, individual project basis, and two, individual project within a term of years. This is what the hon. member for Brant referred to when he spoke rather disparagingly of the fact that two years ago we said, "Well, at least we will guarantee you the amounts that you have had so far in order that you may go ahead and plan."

I think we have to go back and take some sort of an historical look at the development of our university situation in this province if we are to understand and if we are to see the advantages of what we have done. I covered this at some length some days ago, but there are parts of it at least that I will repeat because to me, in any event, there has been a very definite development here. As I pointed out, it goes back to the 1940s when Dr. Wallace was appointed from Queen's. That was the beginning of it and it was a very simple beginning indeed. Subsequent to that, Dr. Althouse, who was chief director of education here and I think a man recognized as one of the leaders in education in our province, took on this task and he followed Dr. Wallace who unfortunately died.

His job in The Department of Education was to co-ordinate university efforts, and to advise the government on what action it should take in the university field. To assist him as the task grew larger, a technical committee was appointed which did not really consist of men who had any particular skill in the university field. I believe that this was pretty well left to Dr. Althouse, but these civil servants were appointed with the idea of analyzing and taking apart the needs and translating them into finances in order to advise the government.

At this time there was encouragement given to the universities to expand. Of course it is necessary to take a look at the programme the universities submit, and it is necessary to take it apart to see whether it is perhaps reasonable or unreasonable. This is the great dilemma in which we find ourselves when we start talking about the government, which is responsible to the taxpayers providing literally hundreds of millions of dollars every year. Yet in order to preserve autonomy, the idea is advanced that perhaps the government has to take complete control out of its hands and pass it over to an independent body in order that there be no suggestion of any infringement of academic autonomy, or university autonomy.

All I say is that this poses a problem that is well set out in the Robbins report. If you refer to what the government in Britain did, their arrangements are really quite interesting. This is the difficulty that we face. If you look at the history of what we have developed—and this is the reason that I sketched it out the other day and the reason I am mentioning it today—you will see that we have followed a pretty regular pattern of development here.

I concluded with Dr. Althouse, chief director of education within The Department of Education, advising the government and using the work of a technical committee in order to advise the government at one juncture on what he was advising in another stage.

The next step came in 1961. I was Minister of Education myself at that time. I made the recommendation to the Prime Minister of the day that I felt, in any event, we needed a committee to advise the government on university affairs that was made up of people from outside, that is, from outside the government service. Here was born the advisory committee as we know it today.

While it is easy to come along and criticize this committee, in my opinion, and I think it is shared by many people, it has done really quite an enormous task for this government. I think that we should all be grateful to these men. While they may not be men who have been active in the immediate operation of universities, they have all had experience in this area. Certainly they are all men who have had a great deal of experience in administering this type of concern. I personally refuse to cast them aside by just simply saying this man works here and this man works there and this man does something else, as if they did not bring to this task a great deal of very public spirited effort—because they do. I think that they have done a large task indeed.

When we decided that we considered it to be wise to establish a Department of University Affairs in conjunction with this, I could see another change coming over the advisory committee on university affairs. This I spelled out, perhaps in not sufficient detail, but in any event when I introduced the bill on first reading, in the explanatory remarks I made I said that it was our intent to extend the functions of the advisory board. I went into it in some detail. I will go into that again as well.

The advisory board has been carrying a great load of investigatory work. Indeed, in some areas, administration will be taken from them or they will be provided by services to do these tasks. This work will be done administratively by the new department. I am referring to such things as an analysis of financial statements, and an examination of four- and five-year programmes.

I think we are all aware of what a committee like this can and should do. Its major functions are very great indeed. Some of them have been touched upon by the hon. member for Brant. I must admit that in none of these areas did I make notes on what he said, but he mentioned several things that he felt should be left entirely to the university and in this way I would have no quarrel with him whatsoever.

We, as a government, have no intention whatsoever of interfering in any way with the independence and the autonomy of our universities. We must solve this problem of how we are going to provide very large sums of money, indeed, for our universities. The hon. Minister of Education may choose to give his breakdowns, but I do not have them here. What we are spending for university education in this province on a per pupil basis, both for maintenance and for capital, is something that I think all the people of the province should be very interested in because the figures are truly enormous. Regardless of the fact that your figures indicate that university personnel are underpaid, and I do not think that our record as a government indicates we favour the underpayment of the teaching profession, there is an absolute in this which we must look at. This I will again say is the problem we are trying to solve with the machinery that we are setting up.

In connection with the expansion of the advisory committee, I said it is our feeling, in the light of the already significant contributions it has rendered, that we must continue to derive the benefit of the experienced insight and wise counsel of the advisory committee on university affairs.

I would like to refer to some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Brant when he said there was some unwillingness to communicate, or that there had been some matters that had been done in secrecy. There really has not been anything secret about the function of the advisory committee on university affairs. Really, this government has accepted its recommendations pretty well as a whole. We have given it a free hand to make the decisions which we see have to be made. In order to preserve academic autonomy, or university autonomy, we may take the advice of the committee. We have established the committee for that purpose. But ultimately we are the people who have to bring in these amounts and present them to this House to be voted. That, of course, will be the function of the Minister of this department.

I had better speak first about the composition of the commission. I have been in touch, of course, and I have had many conferences with many people in the university field. But in order to get at this specific problem, in the last five or six years—longer than that really—but all the time we have been developing this particular organization, which is embodied in these two bills, I have been discussing matters concerning the university affairs committee with various people from the university world, both on a formal and an informal basis. I have had many discussions and, by and large, I think that what we are proposing meets with approval.

I do not know if you can meet that ultimate point of autonomy unless you are prepared just to turn the whole thing over to one group. I do not think this can be done. I think there is an area in here in which we can work out this problem. After all, if we have a university advisory committee—and I realize that the people in the academic world are very interested in serving on the committee—I can see the contribution that they can make. Certainly they will be represented thereon.

I also noticed, in discussing the subject—and I had a long meeting with the committee that presented this brief from which you quoted—it seemed to me that some of the problems they are facing are not with this government, but are with the administration of their own universities. I am quite certain that they will work these things out among themselves, but the logical progression of this advisory committee, in my view, Mr. Chairman, is into the area in which we are putting it. When it is expanded I can see that much of the work it will have to do has to be done by subcommittees of the committee itself. In other words, there is such a vast amount of research and examination of future programmes, the question of a medical school comes up.

I think we are all agreed we cannot have three universities deciding at once that they are going to each establish a new university. This makes no sense at all. What we need is a group of men who all belong to the university world, plus a leavening of men that belong perhaps to the business world but have connections with universities, and I might say have spent three or four years working on these problems. Surely they will sit down and do the necessary research, and have it done by scholars or whoever must do it, so they can advise this government where we might best put the taxpayers' dollar in order that we have the proper medical care, in order that we have a flow of doctors coming into our society. And of course this applies to dentists, it applies to all the other faculties and disciplines.

So in my view, I see the advisory committee expanded and functioning with the hon. Minister of Education and with this loan fund. I see it all working as a unit in order to provide a vastly more efficient method of dealing with the problem that can only get larger and can never get smaller in the foreseeable future.

I think that in this framework we can achieve what obviously we are all after, because I would disabuse anyone's mind of the idea that secretly we want control of the universities while publicly we say we do not. This is quite wrong. I see the necessity for a university to be completely independent. I think that we have discussed this. I have said it on many occasions and I will say it again. As we put the three items together, then I think we can achieve what we are after.

I would just like to refer to the Robbins report, because it is very interesting—and this is in relation to a point raised by the hon. member for Brant. The Robbins report really recommended on and dealt with four possibilities, none of which exactly fits our situation in Ontario. And of course I think that this is something we must bear in mind. I suppose there is always something about far fields looking greener. We might think that there is something special about a report drawn up in the United Kingdom, but I think their percentage of young people of the age we were discussing, is about half of what it is here.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): The figures are not comparable.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: It is some time since I checked this out, it is some years ago. No, they are not exactly comparable, no figures are.

Mr. Bryden: No, but there is a big area of incomparability here.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: There is, and I think that there is a fairly large area of non-comparability between Canada and the United States. I think there are many people who would be classified as perhaps having a university degree there that we would not necessarily—

An hon. member: Flycasting!

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, flycasting; I know of one university where you can get a degree in flycasting. That would be a very nice thing to have. I just served an apprenticeship myself, I did not go to university to learn that.

But the point is these things are not comparable. There is rough comparison, in that the British have faced a problem there that is greater than we have faced in this country because in fact over the years they have not done as much about it. I think our neighbours to the south perhaps have gone a bit further in their approach than we have, and perhaps the good old Canadian compromise might be the best course of action after all. I just warn anybody against accepting: (a) the figures that you see with complete faith; and (b) let us not assume just because it was done some place else it is any better than we can do here ourselves.

In any event, the Robbins committee dealt with four different things that might have happened and the four of them are really quite interesting. The first was that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who at that time had the responsibility for university matters, that ministerial responsibility should be given to him. They rejected this idea because they thought as Chancellor, who, of course, is the chief financial officer of the government, he could not serve.

I do not know whether they thought there would be a conflict of interest there or not, but the term used is that it would be anomalous for a Minister to hold the responsibility for being guardian of the public purse and at the same time a special claimant on that public purse. Certainly there are going to be very large claims on this portion of the public purse in our future, and this of course is of concern to anyone who has the responsibility for raising money as well as spending.

Then they considered the Lord President of the Council, but he was rejected because he was a Minister without portfolio, and that is of no significance here. Then they thought of the idea of a Secretary of State for Education. Now here is the point that is raised, and this is why the debate takes place as to what is the proper thing to do. The committee rejected this idea despite weighty arguments in its favour, particularly those arguments which concerned a unified approach to and control of education.

Here we get into the whole area, and believe me the debate goes on in Ontario about this, as to whether the universities should be out from under The Department of Education, whether we should have one Ministry here; and I believe the term used by the hon. member for Brant was that we decapitated education. Well, this debate went on in the United Kingdom as well. It was argued that a single Ministry for Education would be too wide to be effective, if you had one to look after everything, and that dealing with universities called for an organization and approach quite different to those which were used for state schools.

In other words, here is a point on which it would be difficult to compare and apply the same principles in respect to operations of one of our state secondary schools as against operating one of our universities. There is much virtue in this argument as I see it.

Third, a university's responsibilities include more than education. There are people who certainly argue this, and of course it all depends how broad the term education is. If you include research perhaps that is so. But in any event, the committee finally decided, after considering these things, on the fourth consideration; and that was they would establish a Minister of Arts and Science. And this is their final decision. There was one note of reservation expressed by one member, otherwise they were unanimous, and this Minister of Arts and Science was to be a single Ministry to control all education.

The Robbins report, of course, has received very wide publicity both in the United Kingdom and here, but the interesting thing is that the Minister of Arts and Science, even though recommended by the committee, was not really received with any unanimous favour. It was the subject of a good deal of controversy. In the controversy were brought up these arguments I have mentioned.

In any event, the next interesting thing, in my view of this story anyway, is: What did the government finally do? It was only in February of this year that the Prime Minister decided, and I am quoting from Hansard of February 6, in which he said:

After taking full accounts of the views that have been expressed I have concluded that the right course is to have a single Minister with total responsibility over the whole educational field who should be Secretary of State to education and science. Under him there will be a single department which will include two distinct administrative units and will give the organization something of a federal character.

So there we have the final decision.

Now in view of this debate, I think it might be wise for me to say that in the opinion of the government, sir, the present hon. Minister of Education should be the Minister of this new department we are creating. This means that perhaps we will have separated the two functions. I agree with the statements made that the administration of university affairs should be separated from the administration of our elementary and secondary school affairs.

We are, in my view, in a formative state in this matter. That is why I have sketched out the history of our committee. You can see that really this committee that is now functioning only goes back to 1961. I think that with this organization, we will be able to get at this problem. I would hope that we will be able to give to the universities that which they require and I might say that I have had few, if any, complaints about the establishment of a separate department. In fact, I cannot think of any individual who has approached me to disagree, and I have discussed this with many people in the university field, naturally. I have heard from nobody that he disagrees with the idea that we would establish a separate department here to look after the university affairs of this province.

I think the hon. member for York South was quite right when he pointed out in his remarks that the advisory committee itself has become aware of the weight of the tasks being carried. It has become aware of the necessity for a greater organization in order to provide the research and the analysis it needs. It has made that feeling known to the government. The committee has been enlarged in order that its duties may be shared more broadly among the members. With the introduction to that committee of people from the academic world and people from the world of university administration—and I think to some extent there is a difference between these two—and with the introduction to that committee of people who are more intimately associated with the affairs of our universities, if we can put this together with the experience we presently have, then I think that the advice that will be given to the Minister, and which, of course, he will have to translate into action here, will be proper.

I do not anticipate that we will have any difficulty other than the normal difficulties of any human organization. Nor do I think that there will be any difficulty in maintaining that ultimate independence of our universities. I would point out to you, that if there has been any suspicion in anybody's mind that what this committee was doing was in any way secret, I will arrange to have that dispelled. If there is anything that is bothering anybody, we will know about it and surely this will be finally the true test of whether we can create an organization to produce the results I want, and we all want.

Finally, I would just say that I was interested in the first point the hon. member for York South made when he referred to Dr. Jackson's report. Dr. Jackson is not really a civil servant. He is employed by OCE, which is controlled by the University of Toronto. However, that is beside the point. His independence is something that I admire and find to be very refreshing. You quoted from his report and I am not taking issue as the hon. Minister did with the amount you quoted from what he said, but I think you pointed up the real dilemma when you remarked that he said the social pressures were so great they would break down the university doors and open the floodgates. You quoted him as almost saying, or indeed saying, that this social pressure would evidence itself in our society through the action of government. This is being typified by a remark that I made once when I said something to the effect that I thought a good passing mark back in the late 30s when I was a student should be as good now as it was then, namely, a 50 or a 55.

But here is the point we face. We have social pressures that must express themselves through governments and over here we have universities that must be autonomous. Somehow or other, we have to translate social pressures into action and maintain autonomy. This I do not suggest for a second is a simple task, but I am convinced in my own mind that with this arrangement that we are setting up and which will be shortly functioning completely, I would hope, we will be able to solve this very difficult problem. I am so confident that we can, that I would also tell you that if it proves not to be that way, we will simply have to change it.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, before the discussion proceeds under this vote, may I ask your guidance on a matter of procedure? The hon. Prime Minister has given us a statement quite appropriately, I think, with regard to the intentions of the government. But for future guidance in the discussions of the committee, may I ask if it is considered in order to discuss the principle of Bills 126 and 127 or should we, as I would think myself might be a better way, reserve that sort of discussion until the bills are actually called for second reading?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Mr. Chairman, it was my thought that these things were so inextricably bound together that if you wished to discuss the principles, because that really has been what I have been discussing here, although perhaps—

Mr. Bryden: Well, I was ready to make an exception for you.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Well, I am prepared to make an exception for you. There was an arrangement. We had a discussion. The hon. Minister of Education had a discussion before in which I understood it was decided that they could all be discussed at one time. If you prefer it the other way, it does not matter to me. Personally I think the discussions are so tightly bound up I would say that both must be taken together—as the hon. member from Brant said and the hon. member for York South said—and the principles of these bills dealt with as well as the particulars and many other things. There was a crossfire, so if you wish to speak to the principle of the bill in this debate in committee it is perfectly all right with me.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Dovercourt): Mr. Chairman, in view of the flexibility provided by the hon. Prime Minister, I would like to go back to some of the remarks by the hon. Minister of Education.

I am taking another aspect from the question of the hon. member for York South. This is in connection with, not foreign students coming to Ontario, but students from Ontario going overseas. I do this, sir, because of a letter I received from a young person who had won an Ontario scholarship. He went to the London School of Economics and he wanted to make use of his scholarship there. As I understand it this is restricted so that he cannot use it there. It would seem to me that we should have a broad view about education. These young people going abroad are really emissaries for us and they come back again. Why not have it recognized that education transcends national boundaries and have them go? That is my first question.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, there are two purposes behind these graduate fellowships. The first is, of course, to try to keep the graduate student at the universities here in this province so that he will, we hope, be encouraged to become either a lecturer or eventually a professor at the university. But the other, one of the very prime objects, of course, is to build up the graduate school at the universities here. You cannot build up a graduate school in our universities in this province by awarding fellowships to students to attend graduate schools in other jurisdictions. This is why, to date, we have kept the graduate fellowships for Ontario universities, but at the same time we permit 20 per cent to be awarded to non-resident students.

But I think the hon. member can see the merit in our attempting to build up graduate schools in this province, so that in perhaps a few years it will not be necessary to go to the London School of Economics to get this type of course. This is one of the basic objectives of this programme; not just to provide the fellowship to the individual, but also to build up the graduate faculties here at our various universities.

Mr. Thompson: I appreciate the point of the hon. Minister. I do not know if we have statistics on the people who have gone for graduate work outside Canada and the number who are attracted back. I am sure that with new conditions, principally, with respect to staff if we can attract leaders in their field—I am thinking both of academic as well as from industry—that an excitement is aroused. I am referring now to the remarks of the hon. member for York South. One of our dilemmas is trying to attract more staff to provide better training.

I cannot help thinking of the excitement that can come to young people if they know that an acknowledged scholar is the head of a department. I would like to bring up this point about the previous stereotype of the lecturer, or assistant professor during the depression days. When you talked of honouring the people who have made a contribution, I cannot help thinking of Professor Ned Pratt, who passed away recently. Perhaps I can speak with some personal feeling on this because I took courses from him. A man who has been an acknowledged poet of Canada would seem to be appropriate.

Amongst the people to whom we should give acknowledgement, to attract more people to university life, I think that we all recognize that we should give a prestige and a status to the university circle.

I would like to come to another point, which was one about which I got more correspondence than anything else. This was when I first entered Parliament and when the hon. Prime Minister—who was then the Minister of Education—and I had raised the question of night universities. From across the province I got letters from people who told me that because of the narrowness on the part of university requirements, they therefore were unable to enter university. They had to get other requirements.

The other barrier, they said, was that they had families. I realize that is not your responsibility with respect to the families, but they had families. They had economic necessities, but at night they would want to have the opportunity of getting accredited courses with a substance. I remember the hon. Prime Minister had mentioned a night university was going to be formed. We know that developments have taken place, but somehow I do not think these evening classes are still as yet reaching to the needs of the people. I do not think they have been getting the accredited aspect that some of the people want.

I think that we should, as the hon. member for York South has said, make use of people, for example, from Europe who have had an academic background. He was referring to using them for teaching. I am thinking of a number of these people who could be used, if they could get more and have their background accredited. I think of the example that after the war many went through DVA courses. We were older, but suddenly the doors were open for us to take training at a university. I am sure, sir, there are opportunities now that people would grasp if we had more availability of evening universities.

While I am on this subject one of the aspects I noticed when on the manpower committee was the question of opportunity for a young fellow who, because of family circumstances or some other reason, had started to work. He had acquired a skill and then he hoped to be able to move up the ladder and have this experience and these skills recognized and up the ladder into university.

The concern of the manpower committee was that there were culs-de-sac all along the line. A young fellow may have taken training and then there was no recognition. For example, after technical schools or Ryerson, there is no recognition from the universities and colleges.

I would hope that in some way and I realize all that the government can do, is to try to suggest and encourage universities to open their entrance requirements and to be more flexible. I would hope that some young fellow who has had to start life, and is first class at some skill; that this does not mean that he has got to keep in this particular type of vocation. But that he can move on right through. If he wants to, the avenues are open to be come a PhD. I wonder, sir, if you would mind commenting on those questions.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, as far as the night courses are concerned, the hon. member is well aware that most of the larger universities have extensive night class programmes. Many of them have special provisions as far as entrance requirements are concerned which deal with, say, mature students. I am not sure whether we are getting into one of these great areas of academic autonomy when we start discussing if the government should be telling the universities whether or not they should alter these requirements.

As I tried to explain earlier in my estimates, we are endeavouring now to relate the secondary schools, the vocational centre and institutes of technology so that, through some form of progression, a young person will know what the avenues are. Of course, once again we get into the situation of whether or not the institutes of technology should be related to the university courses. I think, Mr. Chairman, there would be no point in my making any observations on this at the moment. I think it is obvious that we want to keep as many doors open as possible and make our whole educational programme as flexible as possible in the future. I think this should be one of our very obvious aims.

Mr. Thompson: If you would stress this point it might be helpful, to stress that there should be this flexibility all the way up.

One last point I would like to mention. A number of years ago I had the opportunity to visit a number of educational TV stations in the United States. As I say, that was a number of years ago. I noticed, for example, in Boston, that in relation to Boston University, and indeed in a number of the other cities, they were able to put on educational programmes—in physics, for example—they take the best minds who could translate their knowledge through teaching. Apparently they had magnificently stimulating programmes which went on at 6.30 in the morning. Apparently the audience was very extensive and it showed the thirst for knowledge on the part of many people.

I realize this raises questions, but some of the universities were teaching a correspondence course in relation with these TV courses. The hon. member for York South raised the question about losing the atmosphere of the camaraderie within a university. On the other hand, I would think that with challenges of a modern society it is better perhaps to be able to thus expose the brightest minds to the people. I am raising again the question of educational TV, which was talked about in the schools in connection with universities. Just looking at the whole area, I wonder if the hon. Minister, for example, has quoted the experiments which Dr. Shrum in the new university in British Columbia is considering to carry out. This is one of them. What his opinion is of these?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Those experiments will be at the new Simon Fraser University, not the University of British Columbia and, Mr. Chairman, as I recall some of Dr. Bissell's statements, he has indicated the possibility of the use of television.

I think, as the hon. member for York South pointed out, maybe he was talking about two different types or classes of student. With the younger people right out of secondary school, I think it would be most advisable, if at all possible, to have them within the university atmosphere. I do not think there is any question about this. When it comes to adult education—maybe television has more possibility in retraining and the like—and therefore I think the medium might have more extensive use. As you will recall, the University of Toronto is making provision for closed-circuit TV at their new Scarborough campus.

This whole area of educational TV at the post-secondary level certainly is worthy of exploration, but at the same time I think there is much to be said for trying to get as many, of the young people particularly, into the university proper.

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Mr. Chairman, it is six o'clock. Is it your wish that I should wait until after dinner?

Mr. Chairman: It being 6 o'clock, I will now leave the chair and we will resume at 8 o'clock.

It being 6.00 o'clock, p.m., the House took recess.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION

On vote 518:

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Mr. Chairman, I have several questions for the hon. Minister of Education (Mr. Davis).

In the presentation of the estimates we had an effort by the hon. member for Russell (Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence) early in the debate—and it was transferred to a certain vote, although probably it should have been before we dealt with the votes at all—he presented a question, maybe he was flying a kite, in regard to community colleges. His proposition seemed akin to some of the ideas that this party, and particularly Mr. Wintermeyer, had presented to the people of the province. Has the hon. Minister made any comments about the suggestion of the hon. member for Russell or was he speaking just as a message to the people? Would the hon. Minister comment on his—

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education): Mr. Chairman, I am not sure that I know exactly what the hon. member is asking—

Mr. Troy: I want the hon. Minister to give some comment on the suggestion that the hon. member for Russell made to the House and to the people of Ontario. It was reported all across the country in the press.

Hon. Mr. Davis: As I recall the statement, or at least the suggestion made by the previous leader of the Liberal Party, he was referring—

Mr. Troy: No, I was talking about the hon. member for Russell.

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, but you were relating it, you said it was like the suggestion—

Mr. Troy: Well, akin—you can have kissing cousins, you know.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that perhaps what the hon. member for Russell was suggesting, in a general way is not really related to what the former leader of the Liberal Party was suggesting. He was suggesting a state university with branches in various sections of Ontario. I think also that he was suggesting that this state university would have entrance requirements of 50 per cent and that this is how we could solve the university problem.

As I understood the remarks of the hon. member for Russell, he was, perhaps, dealing with a different area. If we look at community colleges, as I understand them, they fill two or three functions. One could be academic, related eventually to some university situation. They could be terminal courses; they could lead to a degree in technical or vocational courses, and as is implied in the name "community" they are related to the needs of the community where they are located.

They form what I refer to as another type of post-secondary education that is not directly related to the university field.

As I indicated on a former occasion, we have looked at these situations in two or three other jurisdictions. They vary from one state to another. In some areas they are junior colleges which are strictly academic. In some communities they are, as we have said, community colleges, and are quite different from what might be called junior colleges.

The only observation that I have this evening, Mr. Chairman, is that some three months ago, when speaking to the registrars of the universities of Canada, I suggested that we should be exploring some other type of post-secondary institution that was not, at least initially, at the university level.

Now this is, I think, the only comment I could pass on to the House at this time that might relate to the remarks of the hon. member for Russell.

Mr. Troy: In addition, have you thought of the junior college type; say, for first and second year of a college course, with students going on from there to one of the larger universities. I know that has been discussed in my section of the province and has been endorsed.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, this is the area in which the university presidents—I think the hon. member for York South (Mr. MacDonald) brought this to the attention of the House—were initially opposed to junior colleges. Whether we agreed or disagreed is not the point. I think this was their initial reaction to junior colleges which are academically orientated. They deal almost exclusively with the academic side of post-secondary education.

What I am suggesting to the House is that one area we should explore is the type of institution that has an interest in areas besides the academic. I think that really they could be coupled in the same type of institution or the same institution.

Mr. Troy: The hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) in giving his statement this afternoon referred to The Department of University Affairs. Did he mean, when he was talking about the hon. Minister of Education, did he mean the office or the particular person who is now the Minister of Education?

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): The present hon. Minister of Education will be the Minister of the new department.

Mr. Troy: The present one?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: The present hon. Minister of Education will hold the portfolio.

Mr. Troy: And in addition will hold—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: He will hold two portfolios.

Mr. Troy: Is that to be a permanent—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: As permanent as anything is in the world of politics.

Mr. Troy: That is quite right, it is a very uncertain thing, as the hon. Prime Minister very well knows from the past session.

Does the hon. Prime Minister think—I have great respect for the attainments and the qualities of the present hon. Minister of Education, but he is being saddled, sir, with another very important task in addition to his present duties. The hon. Prime Minister says this is one of the most important portfolios in his government and—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: If I were not completely satisfied that the hon. Minister could handle these responsibilities I would not give them to him.

Mr. Troy: If the hon. Prime Minister were not so satisfied—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Troy: Probably the hon. Prime Minister had such meagre reinforcements that he could not get anybody else to take it.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. A. V. Walker (Oshawa): We have a million of them.

Mr. Troy: Well, what is a million? This levity is usual on these night sessions.

Unfortunately, through pressure of other business, I did not hear the answer of the hon. Minister to that very fine presentation from the hon. member for Ottawa East (Mr. Racine) concerning Ottawa University. Of course Ottawa University is no different from some of the other universities across this province, like the University at Sudbury and so on. Was the hon. Minister's answer that it was still government policy that there would be no support to what is called in English the denominational colleges and "en français, Le confessionnelle"? I know that we cannot relate Ontario to some of the poor little provinces of this Dominion.

I know that in my native province of New Brunswick it does not make any difference who operates the institution, they still get support from the government for their operation. It is also the same way in the secondary schools. Right through the whole secondary school course, it does not make any difference whether it is operated by a religious order or not.

Then again, I cannot understand, when grants are given in this province under The Department of Health to institutions that are operated by religious orders, where the distinction comes in then in the schools because they happen to be operated by a certain denomination. For example, in my own area of northern Ontario we have Laurentian University, with its companion colleges: Thornloe, which is an Anglican institution; the United Church's Huntingdon; and the University of Sudbury, Catholic. But still we are so hidebound in this province that we cannot do anything for denominational ones.

The strange part about it is that if we did not have those you would be forced to spend maybe a whole lot more money than is spent now to get the same type of education.

Has the hon. Minister, since the weekend, had any second thoughts?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I do not think we need to debate this again. The hon. Prime Minister gave a very full, comprehensive answer to the hon. member for Ottawa East stating the government policy. I am sure that the hon. member for Nipissing will be quite interested in reading this reply in Hansard.

As I recall the gist of the hon. Prime Minister's reply to the hon. member for Ottawa East, this was still the policy of the government.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Chairman, in looking over these estimates, I find very little reference, if any, to the whole problem of research. We have had a number of discussions in this House in various estimates on the matter of research. But I think one of the fundamental functions of a great university is the matter of pure research and research into all kinds of subjects which have relevance to industry and to the society in which we live.

Now, certainly, as far as Canada is concerned, perhaps the University of Toronto is in the forefront in this field. But it is so far behind other great universities in other jurisdictions that I wonder if any real thought is being given here to building up great research centres in some of our universities. It may well be that the hon. Minister is thinking in terms of private subsidy for this purpose, or it may be that it is in some of these estimates and he is leaving it to the universities themselves to allocate the funds that are necessary. But it just seems to me that this is an important part of the function of a university which should not—at least in this debate—should not go by without some reference being made to it.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member will appreciate that when it comes to research this is an area that I think is definitely within the academic autonomy of the university. Our operating grants are given to the universities without strings attached. They receive substantial sums, some of them, from the National Research Council, and some from private industry and so on. I think we all agree that universities should carry on extensive research and with this we have no quarrel. But in these estimates, on the individual items, we have paid about 90 per cent of the total requests for operating costs, and this they have been paid with no allocation, as far as we are concerned, as to where they should spend the money. This is an area in which the universities, I can assure you, have great interest and are certainly developing capabilities.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Chairman, there are two private bills standing on the order paper that relate to the whole matter of university affairs. They relate to only one aspect of it, and perhaps a limited aspect, but it is one that I consider to be of importance.

It is normal practice in this House that private bills, when they are reported out from the private bills committee, go on the order paper and come before the House for regular processing in the form in which they are reported. Once they are reported out they usually go through the various stages in the House with relative despatch. In fact, all of the private bills that were reported out this year long since went through all stages and were assented to, with three exceptions. One of them is the bill relating to the city of Toronto, which seems to be bogged down in committee of the whole House. I do not know why it bogged down there, and I do not know if it has anything to do with Maple Leaf Gardens, but I will not inquire at this stage because it is obviously not related to the vote with which we are dealing.

Mr. A. H. Cowling (High Park): Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, the other two are not related to the vote either because they are in the jurisdiction of the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr. Spooner) and they were dealt with by him and the private bills committee. I cannot see their relation to this vote.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, they are clearly both related to university affairs. In fact, opinions were expressed by a representative of the university affairs committee. One of them is Bill No. Pr11, An Act respecting Westminster College in the city of London. The other is Bill No. Pr14, An Act to establish Rochdale College.

There is no question that the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs also had an interest in these bills and expressed his opinion at the committee level. We all know that he had that interest and we know what his opinion was. That is not a subject for debate here. But these two bills are part of the total picture of university affairs in this province. We may have differences of opinion as to the merits of the bills but that is another matter.

As to their relevance to this vote I do not think there can be any doubt.

I was pointing out, Mr. Chairman, that all other private bills, with the exception of the three that I have just referred to, have long since been assented to.

Mr. Cowling: Mr. Chairman, on another point of order. I cannot see how we can discuss private bills on this particular estimate. I would like your ruling on that, sir.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I am not discussing private bills.

Mr. Chairman: Order, order! I wish to inform the member for Woodbine we are dealing with vote No. 518 and with Bills No. 127, 126 and 133 at the present time if he wants to discuss it.

Mr. Bryden: Yes, sir, I am well aware of that fact. I am not discussing the content of the two private bills that I am referring to, but I am interested in vote 518 which is entitled "grants to provincial and other universities," and which we were advised would be an appropriate place to discuss the entire question of university affairs. What I would like to ask, Mr. Chairman, if I may, since we are in the final stages of this session of the Legislature, is whether there is any serious danger, as appears to me, that these two bills are simply going to die on the order paper?

Mr. Cowling: Mr. Chairman, just another point of order.

This is a very fine line, Mr. Chairman. I will agree we are talking generally and in a very broad way about universities, but the hon. member is getting on to two very distinct private bills. I think the time to deal with the private bills is when they are called for discussion, and not under this vote, that is for sure.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I would like to know, and I think it is a fair question, is it intended that they will be called for second reading? If it is, then that is the end of it.

Mr. Chairman: Order, order! It is at the discretion of the Prime Minister.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Mr. Chairman, all I can say in this dispute is I think the hon. member is completely out of order. He is trying now to control the business of this House which is the prerogative of the leader of the government.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bryden: I can see, Mr. Chairman, that I have touched an area that is even more sensitive than I had thought. I take it the hon. Prime Minister refuses, under the guise of alleging that I am trying to control the business of the House, to answer a straightforward question as to whether or not he is going to call the bills.

Mr. Chairman: Order, order! We are on vote 518. Please continue.

Mr. Bryden: I suppose I can put my own interpretation on the refusal to answer the question. I would like to suggest, Mr. Chairman, that this is a most remarkable situation when bills that are reported to this committee are not called.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order, order! I wish to inform the member that he is out of order with respect to those other bills. We are on vote 518.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I have no option but to accept your ruling but I would suggest to you that it is an unduly narrow ruling. The matter I think is of real importance and apparently—

Mr. Chairman: Order, order! The member is out of order.

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary): That is the expert on the rules of the House.

Mr. Chairman: Order, order! Continue on vote 518, please.

Mr. Bryden: I have stated, Mr. Chairman, I accept your ruling. I really do not think you need the assistance of all these other gentlemen who are fairly free with their assistance but not very free with their observance of the rules of the House.

Another point that I would like to raise in relation to this vote, Mr. Chairman, is the question of university fees. The University of Toronto has announced that it is making a significant increase in fees for the coming year, and other universities have indicated either that they are doing the same sort of thing or are contemplating doing it. I think it is regrettable that what the government has heralded as a new development in the administration of university affairs should be signalled by an increase in fees that students must pay.

We have heard a great deal and have had much sober consideration of the whole problem of numbers that is facing universities.

Some of the new departures in policy are made necessary as a result of the challenge of numbers. I would like to put forward the proposition that though we are faced with real problems of numbers and may have to use methods that we, in some cases, may not entirely like, to control the problem of numbers, one system of control that we should not use is a means test system.

It is the view of this party and it has been for a long time that university fees should be abolished altogether. If it is necessary to limit the number of students entering university, such limitations should be purely on the basis of capacity of the students and their academic qualifications. That should be the only factor operating in our opinion.

I am not suggesting that we can eliminate fees overnight but at the present time we are going in the exact opposite direction. We are far from eliminating them. They are being increased. I would like to put before the Minister-to-be of the department which is to be created shortly, that a basic objective should be to reverse this trend and to ensure that sufficient funds are made available so that fees can be reduced and ultimately eliminated, so that all students of merit will be able to attend university, regardless of their financial means.

I might point out, Mr. Chairman, that the mere elimination of fees will not accomplish that objective. There is also the problem of living costs. That is another problem that will have to be considered. It is to a certain degree being dealt with by provisions that have been made with regard to scholarships and bursaries.

However, a first step, I think, in eliminating the price tag is to eliminate the fees. At least make it possible for people to go through our educational system from kindergarten as far as they can go and obtain benefit without having to pay any fee for the privilege of doing so.

I know that arguments will be put forward that, notwithstanding university fees, some students of limited means or practically no means still manage to get to university. That is quite true. I realize that is the case. But it is a real problem for those students. It means that they have to spend a lot of time that should be devoted to their studies on the mere problem of earning a living and raising sufficient fees to get to the university. There is no question in the world that the dollar barrier discourages a great many students who could benefit from university, who could complete their courses successfully and would thereby be able to make a greater contribution to society. I believe a major function of the new department should be to take steps to ensure the elimination of fees at the earliest opportunity. I would appreciate it, if the hon. Minister sees fit, if he would comment on this point.

Hon. Mr. Davis: On the question of fees, I think the hon. members might be interested in some examples, taking just two or three representative institutions here. In the University of Toronto, the fee for the arts and science course, and I think this is perhaps the easiest course to compare with other institutions, is $410. You can go to McGill University and it varies from $525 to $590; Bishop's University is $480 to $520; Mount Allison is $500; New Brunswick is $475; Windsor here in the province is $465.

As I intimated, and perhaps the hon. member was not here when I made this observation this afternoon, we are considering the possibility of increasing the bursary amount because I feel quite frankly there are very few students, and I will use the term you used, with merit—who are prejudiced from obtaining a university education because of the fact that they cannot afford to pay the fees. The bursary system is, I think, quite generous. The scholarships are also quite generous and we are considering, if the overall fee increase—for the sake of argument—is, say, $50, extending our maximum amounts on the bursaries by this sum. The federal government, it appears, is going to participate in the student aid programme. I am sure when it establishes its limits for student aid loans and if they are administered by the province, we shall certainly bring it to the attention of the federal government so that it will take into account the fee structure as it exists in each province. I think this would be a very natural thing for it to do.

Mr. R. M. Whicher (Bruce): Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I could ask the hon. Minister if he has any figures on the percentage of university students who upon graduating in Ontario leave and go to the United States?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I am interested in this figure and we are trying to find out. It does not really relate to The Department of Education as such, but I am also interested in this figure. If we have it before the next session, I will certainly make it available to the hon. member. We do not know from our information, certainly in The Department of Education, what this percentage is. I would say this though, that we undoubtedly lose a number of young people with ability to the United States and other jurisdictions and this is regrettable.

We think we will retain a number of these people here through our graduate fellowship programme. We are quite encouraged by the number who might otherwise have gone to graduate work in the United States but who are remaining in this jurisdiction. It is a very substantial number. We also have, of course, a number of people coming into Ontario from other jurisdictions, which, to a degree at least, makes up for the loss of talent that is leaving. But to be specific I do not have any estimate. It would only be a guess and would not be a good guess. I shall try to get this over a period of time for the hon. members.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, does the hon. Minister have any figures as to the percentage of students either in the province as a whole or in one university, such as the University of Toronto, who receive the assistance of scholarships or bursaries?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, this is very difficult to get. I think we could get it by specific inquiry to the universities and I will undertake to secure this information for the hon. member. Actually, the vote during the department's other estimates on scholarships and bursaries indicates the amount that the province is expending, but this sum does not include the scholarships and so on given by the universities themselves about which we do not have specific information. I think it is perhaps possible that the new department will have this type of information available and certainly I can find it out from one of the institutions. The same information might apply to the others as well.

Mr. Bryden: I do not wish to put the hon. Minister or his department to a great deal of trouble, but I think it would be fair for me to say that only a small percentage of the students actually attending get that form of assistance. Would that be a fair statement?

Hon. Mr. Davis: It is difficult to break this down, but for instance, in 1962-63, there would be somewhere in the neighbourhood of 5,000 to 5,500 students with types A and B bursaries. As far as the government scholarships are concerned, perhaps between 600 and 700. This does not include the many other private scholarships or endowments that these students receive. We do not have this information from the universities available, but as far as our own bursary programme is concerned, it could be roughly in the neighbourhood of 5,500.

Mr. Troy: We heard much about academic freedom in the discussion of the estimates of The Department of Education. Is there academic freedom, too, for students who want to attend a certain university? For example, supposing they live in northern Ontario and they want to attend one of the universities of southern Ontario, but we have a university we will say, for example, in northern Ontario, that is getting grants from the government. Would the government say to the student up there, "Now we have a government-supported university in northern Ontario, so you must go there"? Is there any likelihood of any situation like that?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, this has not been considered and there is no geographic allocation for students in this province. The student is free to choose the institution he prefers to attend, subject, of course, to his admission at that university. There is no geographic boundary as far as admission is concerned.

Mr. Troy: Thanks very much. I listened to the statement of the hon. Prime Minister this afternoon and also replies of the hon. Minister to the hon. member for Brant and the hon. member for York South. The hon. Minister has mentioned several times this phrase "grey area." I think on this side of the House some of us—I know I do—still think with the statement of the hon. Prime Minister, not only today but earlier, that we are a grey area in regard to this new Department of University Affairs.

It seemed to me that the hon. Prime Minister in his statement still avoids stating clearly just what the function of this strengthened and augmented university advisory committee is going to be. He has said that no complaints were received from the universities in regard to this new department, and of the setting up of a Department of University Affairs. Naturally there would be no complaint from the universities, because I am sure that the universities themselves are still somewhat concerned, Mr. Chairman, because of the fact that they were correlated in The Department of Education mostly with secondary education. Certainly the pro does not like to be related with the amateur or a semi-pro, and so on. Naturally there are no complaints, because we do not know just yet how this strengthened university advisory committee will work; what its function is going to be or how this whole thing is going to work out.

Certainly I think everybody in the academic field, and even anybody not in the academic field who has any common sense, will agree that it is a very good thing that the government is bringing into the committee people that have some knowledge of university affairs on the academic side as well as the administrative side. That is all to the good. I do not know just what the function of the Minister is going to be. The hon. Prime Minister has said that he is not going to impose the will of the government on the universities. But just who is the boss and who is going to give the orders to the universities? The committee? The Minister of the department?

Is it going to be that this strengthened committee, which is all to the good, will recommend to the Minister the amount of grants the universities should get, and the Minister will say: "Well, I am sorry you want a hundred and fifty million. We cannot get that. We may have to put on another sales tax if you want to get that, or some other, a further gasoline tax perhaps. We cannot give you that now, but maybe you will get it later. But we can give you a hundred million."

If this committee, which is made up of the people that are on it now and those that have experience in university affairs, can then say: Well, this is what we want. Then who is going to make the allocation? Is it the Minister who makes the allocation? Or is it the little group that becomes part of The Department of University Affairs? Or is it the committee?

I may be somewhat dumb in this, but I notice there is an air of "What the dickens is he talking about?" Have I not made all this clear? I do not think the hon. Minister has. I believe, too, there have been here, since the estimates of this department have been before the House, those who are concerned with this new department and people who are on the staffs of a university. I think naturally they are concerned. Anybody connected with university education is concerned.

Actually, I do not think we have the full answer yet from either the hon. Minister or the hon. Prime Minister. They talk with rather soft voices, as if "Now this is it. Just everything is going to be fine. We are not going to interfere with the academic freedoms. You have your economy and so on."

But we have not got all the answers nor did, I think, the hon. member for Brant. The hon. Prime Minister said he had taken notes of his remarks, but I do not think he answered the important things, nor those of the hon. member for York South.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Chairman, I would be very happy to speak on this again. I am sorry if the hon. member did not understand me the first time around. I would be very happy to say it again.

This is really the third time around, because I made a rather full statement when I introduced the bill at first reading. However, as I pointed out this afternoon, the advisory committee on university affairs which I just do not disregard as they appear to have been disregarded by others, I think that they have done a very fine task indeed. They have been in business, if I may put it that way, since 1961. During that time they have established five new universities in our province. They have reorganized—

Mr. Troy: The hon. Prime Minister said they did not do it.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: They established a scholarship, bursary and loan assistance fund. They established temporary accommodation—

Mr. Troy: We are not talking about that. It is the new one.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: They established the Ontario New Universities Library project. They established the graduate scholarship programme which I think—I know—has been commented upon. It is quite unique, not only in Canada but in North America. The extended graduate programme is also one of their brain children. I mention these things just to illustrate that this committee, in two or three years, has done a pretty large job.

Mr. Troy: Nobody denies that.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I am going to make this clear to the hon. member so he will understand what we are doing.

Then I said that the committee indicates in its own report that some of their tasks have become pretty heavy from an administrative point of view. We have provided them over the years with economists and with accountants who have drawn up the forms. I do not know whether this is generally known in the House or not, but when the universities apply for the grants they are going to require, we have a standardized set of forms that has been devised over the years so that we are working with standard financial figures.

We have provided them with economists and with accountants in order that they may do this technical work, because there is a lot of work in it. There is a lot of analysis. This has nothing to do with an infringement on the economy of universities, at least I cannot see that it is. But there is just a lot of work in dealing with $100 million when you are distributing it. I do not think the hon. member really meant our elementary and secondary branches were the amateurs and the semi-pros, and that the universities were the pros, but in any event—

Mr. Troy: Being an athlete himself, the hon. Prime Minister understood.

Hon. Mr. Roberts:—in any event, it took us some three or four years to devise this scheme to meet the needs for grants in our elementary and secondary schools. I point out that these things are not simple. They are very complex. The committee itself is concerned about the complexity of some of this type of work, and some of the executive functions that they found they were being asked to do. For that reason, one of the functions of this new department will be to provide the university affairs committee with the necessary staff to do this work. This is associated entirely within universities.

This new department will be able to employ people of its own. It will be able to use the facilities of other branches of government. All this work can be lifted from the committee and put into the department in order that that department may do what might be termed the slugging. Then an enlarged committee will have the function of conducting studies in conjunction with the department, sir, because the Minister will once again provide them with the research people they may need to do this. There is a host of statistical information that we require.

The hon. member for Woodbine just asked for some statistics. We do not have them here. We should have them here. I mean, this is the work that has to be done. Now all this has to be lifted from this committee, because it has not the facilities to do it. I said this afternoon that it would be enlarged.

I foresee it functioning, perhaps breaking down into subcommittees, to study the various matters that will have to be considered. Then it will advise the government. Its purpose is to sit as an independent body between the government, as such, and the universities. This is quite clearly recognized. I felt, from the remarks of the hon. member for York South and the hon. member for Brant, that we are seeking a means of removing the affairs of the universities from anything to do with politics. This is what we are seeking to do. But the Minister of the department finally decides how much money this government is going to spend. This is his responsibility to the government.

I pointed out this afternoon, in addition, that in the past we have accepted the recommendations of the advisory committee on university affairs in regard to sums and amounts of money that it has asked for. I would point out to the hon. members that it was the advisory committee that gathered the presidents of the universities together, not the other way around. It was the advisory committee that had the studies done by Dr. Jackson, realized the situation, brought the presidents of the universities together and said, "Now here is the problem that we, in co-operation, have to solve."

This is the procedure that these affairs took. I assume that the committee will function in that way in the future. It is going to look ahead. It is going to see what developments are needed. Are we going to go into this junior type of college that has been debated here? Are we right in saying that we should expand our present institutions for a while instead of establishing new ones? There are a whole host of things. I listed all these some time ago when I spoke. I could go through this again. But you can see the very wide range of activity that must be carried on.

There are all kinds of decisions to be made here that in my view must be made by co-operation. There is no question of anybody coercing anybody as to where we are going to put a medical school, where we are going to put the next dental school. Things of this nature surely must be worked out by the committee and this is what I see its function to be. This is why we are treating it the way we are and strengthening it the way we are, so that the committee will do the research and we in the government will make available to it the facilities it needs because it cannot make these things available to itself. Then it will make its recommendations to this department and the Minister of this department is then responsible for coming to the government.

The hon. member asked the question, what would happen if the committee came up and asked for $250 million, and in our desire to tax or for whatever reason, we had only $200 million? I am quite sure that we would say to the university affairs committee, "Look, we do not have $250 million. We have $200 million, so go back and see the people most concerned and sort out who is going to get what, and then come back to us." I just point out to the hon. member and make this as clear as I possibly can, that this is the function we see this committee performing. Quite frankly it is there to separate the affairs of the universities from any possibility of political influence in their development. But as a government we are still responsible for the spending of the tax money that we raise.

Mr. Troy: Then what will be this committee's responsibility regarding grants?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Chairman, yes, that is what I am talking about. The committee already does this. The committee has already done this in the past, that is why I mentioned the standardized form that we have so that each university submits its requests for funds on the same forms. Then comparisons can be made, for ease of administration and ease of analysis. These forms have been developed over a period of years while this government has been making grants. All this work is done in this committee. Then it makes its recommendations to the government and heretofore these recommendations have been accepted.

Mr. Troy: What will be the function of the Minister of that department?

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I am personally glad that the hon. member for Nipissing precipitated the hon. Prime Minister into making what he described as his third explanation of this matter. I think his third explanation threw some additional light on the matter. I am not suggesting that the previous ones were deficient, but this is a new development and new concept and I think it can stand a certain amount of discussion.

I had planned to speak on the second reading of this bill; I think perhaps I will say what I have to say right now. I had planned to indicate—and perhaps I was a maverick—that I am opposed to the principle of the bill. I think I will still vote against it if it is necessary to do so. I will say that the explanations the hon. Prime Minister has given have allayed some of the worries I had about the matter, but not entirely. The situation he describes is what I would consider to be the best possible solution to a difficult problem of balancing on the one hand the government's responsibility for the expenditure of funds, and on the other hand the independence of the universities.

I do not think, though, that the legislative framework we are creating is the kind of legislative framework that is best suited to achieve what the hon. Prime Minister describes as the purpose he has in mind. He regards the university advisory committee—I think he even used the word—as a “buffer” between the universities on the one hand and the government on the other hand. That, I think, is a proper role. That is the sort of body we should have, whether we call it an advisory committee or a grants committee or a grants commission, or whatever you like. I think it is desirable to have such a body between the universities and the government. It will in effect negotiate with the universities to try to sort out their demands and to produce a certain degree of harmony in them, and will negotiate on the other hand with the government with regard to the total amount of money available.

I would judge, certainly from the last statement that the hon. Prime Minister made just a moment ago, that the government will likely deal with this only in terms of aggregates, that it will agree to a total amount of money that it can see fit to recommend out of the appropriations of any given year and the committee will be responsible, in effect, for allocating the money available among the various universities. I think that was what he was saying. I think that is the way it should be.

But if that is so, then why should not our statute law provide for that sort of arrangement instead of having a statute to set up a Department of University Affairs? Why do we not have a statute to set up what I would call a university grants commission as an independent commission, which would have the type of functions that the hon. Prime Minister has suggested for the advisory committee? If such a statute were passed, there could be no doubt as to what the chain of communication was. As it stands now, we have a Department of University Affairs, or will have if the bill is passed and I have no doubt it will be. And there will be, although it is not formally provided for, an advisory committee.

But there is no clear-cut assurance in the law that the department itself, and thus the government, will not take upon itself the task of dealing directly with the administration of university affairs. After all, let us face it, the agency that is putting up the money, or most of the money—and the government is now I think putting up most of the money for the universities and it will continue to put up more in the future—is the agency that ultimately has control unless some special procedure can be devised.

It is necessary for some agency to consider the overall planning of the development of university facilities. It may become necessary, Mr. Chairman, for an agency to consider the question of standards to decide whether a particular institution is eligible for grants or not. All of these things become part of the responsibility of administering grants. I am suggesting that it is not desirable for this to be in the hands of a government department and that is the way the proposed statute will have it. There is only one body that will be responsible and that will be The Department of University Affairs.

I quite believe that the hon. Prime Minister has no intention in any way of interfering with the freedom of the universities, but statutes usually live long after their authors and we have to think of this in terms of a long-term development. We have in this House during this session had more than usual attention devoted to the whole problem of maintaining freedom in our complex modern society.

I am going to suggest to the House, Mr. Chairman, that the universities are traditionally, and I hope in the future will continue to constitute, one of the greatest bastions of freedom. A genuinely independent university in which there is genuine guarantee of freedom of thought, freedom of inquiry, and freedom of experimentation, is an essential to the maintenance of freedom.

Fortunately, in this province we have not in the past had what I would call serious threats to academic freedom, certainly not sustained threats. There have within my memory been some instances where members of university staffs have been under the threat of dismissal because their views were considered at the time to be heterodox. Some of those views now would be considered pretty orthodox; but that is the way ideas develop, they are heterodox at one time. If there are no pioneers who are willing to advance ideas that are unpopular then no ideas would ever come forth.

The universities are and should be a breeding place for new ideas, new developments in thought. As I say, there have been instances where professors have been threatened with dismissal. I do not know of any case—I certainly cannot recall any case—where a professor actually was dismissed and I am not suggesting that such a thing is likely in the immediate future. What I am suggesting is that this is important enough that we should do everything possible in our power to ensure that it never will happen.

Hon. Mr. Davis: What happens internally in the university by the dismissal of a professor is surely not related to any interest the government may or may not have.

Mr. Bryden: Well, Mr. Chairman, I attempted to suggest a moment ago that control over the purse can be an all-pervading control. I am not suggesting that this government at this time has any such idea in its mind. I am suggesting, that though this sort of thing is nearly as dramatic as the challenges that at least some of us saw to the liberty of the subject in certain legislation that was before this House at one stage—which I will not discuss now—in the long run it can be far more insidious. It can extend from one little encroachment to another one, each one imperceptible in itself, until there is a high degree of state control over the operations of universities.

This is a danger I see, this is the reason I had planned to state that I was opposed in principle to the bill and I am still opposed in principle. I believe that the framework that the hon. Prime Minister has suggested as the one which he is trying to establish is not provided for in this bill. This bill provides for something different.

There is no provision for a committee or a commission which will be a buffer between the government, the state, on the one hand and the universities on the other. There is no provision for that in the bill. I think there should be such a provision. I think if we provided by statute for a university grants commission it would be unnecessary to have The Department of University Affairs. The commission could do the job of working with the universities in planning their development and in trying to harmonize the various claims they make and, on the other hand, of negotiating with the government with regard to sums of money. I think that is the way it should be done. I regret that we have taken the other approach of setting up a government department.

I am aware that the university presidents have welcomed, or at one stage at any rate indicated that they welcomed, the government's decision to set up a department. I can only conclude that they are so desperate to get money, and I can understand why they are desperate to get money, that they are not prepared to consider all of the implications.

I would like to emphasize that I am not accusing this government of having the slightest idea of interfering with academic freedom. I am suggesting, however, that we have before us, or will have before us shortly, a bill which could in time produce that very result. I think there is a better way of doing it. I think the hon. Prime Minister himself indicated the better way and I think that is the way the statute law of our province should be framed.

There is frequent objection to the establishment of commissions. I think that a wholesale condemnation of commissions is ridiculous. I think maybe that proposition will be agreed to. There are proper areas where commissions can operate and there are areas where they should not operate. This is one where we should have a commission.

I suggest that we have already several precedents right in our own province. I take one as at least having something in common with this problem, and that is the Ontario Hospital Services Commission. It would have been possible, it is technically possible, for the funds which the government makes available for hospital services in this province to be administered by a government department. But the government of the day saw fit, and I state rightly, to entrust that responsibility to an independent commission operating under certain statutory rules. The independent commission becomes a sort of buffer between the hospitals on the one hand and the government on the other. I am suggesting that principle is far more important in the field of university affairs, where the whole question of academic freedom is involved and I would think that the example that we have before us in the Ontario Hospital Services Commission is an example that we could follow, with adaptations, in this field.

For that reason, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the bill that is now on the order paper and will be called for second reading shortly.

I would like to make it clear, sir, that in expressing my opposition I am speaking for myself only. I am not necessarily, although I may be, speaking for other people within the New Democratic Party and others. I would point out that although my hon. leader (Mr. MacDonald) expressed a qualified acceptance of the bill, the difference between him and me is something of a difference of degree. He expressed the same sort of reservations as I did.

He arrived at the conclusion that on balance it was desirable to support the bill. I arrive at the conclusion that on balance it is desirable not to support the bill. Even though I am the only one in the House who takes that position, I wish to record it.

I would have hoped that the government would have chosen the other method of dealing with this very complicated problem, the method which I think is completely inherent in all the remarks that the hon. Prime Minister made.

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the hon. Minister, in connection with the scholarship and bursary loan system fund, are there ever any suggestions or inducements that those people who are successful in getting bursaries or scholarships or money from the loan assistance fund perhaps owe somewhat of an obligation to the province from which they get this money; and that through services or income taxes, which they undoubtedly will pay to the state from which they come, that perhaps they should stay here for a period of time?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I would say that the obligation that exists under, say the scholarship or bursary funds or under the Ontario Graduate Fellowships, would be a moral obligation only.

Mr. Whicher: I will accept that this is a moral obligation, but is it ever pointed out to the students that there is a moral obligation to stay here, that we need these people; not only for the services that they render to the province from which they come, but we need the money in order to be able to provide additional funds for students in the future?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, this is very difficult to communicate to everyone. Under our fellowship programme they are informed and it is indicated by their acceptance of the fellowships that they have a genuine interest in teaching. They do not swear that they will become teachers, but I think it is brought rather forcibly to their attention that this is one of the prime purposes of the fellowship programme, to interest young people in teaching.

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Chairman, does the hon. Minister ever worry, or the government worry, about the number of students and graduates of the university whom the taxpayers of the province have educated and who leave this province and go, not to other provinces in Canada, but to other states in the United States?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I think we are all concerned about losing any young person of ability to some other jurisdiction. I think this is a concern, yes.

Mr. Whicher: Is the hon. Minister prepared to do anything about it? I, sir, as an individual, am very concerned that there are thousands of students who are leaving here.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well, I think we all agree with the right of the individual to make his choice. We have discussed this at some length in other areas. I think that surely we must maintain this view: That the individual must have freedom of selection. We point out to him the benefits he is receiving under this fellowship programme. We ask him to declare his genuine interest in teaching. I suggest, really, that this would appear to be as far as a person can go in dictating to an individual what his future career will be. I think it is obvious that we want to retain these people here. But at the same time I would suggest that, as a government, none of us would want to be responsible for saying to any individual that he must stay here.

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Chairman, I did not suggest that we should say that they must stay here. The hon. Minister has mentioned the teaching profession. Is it ever pointed out to graduates of medical schools that we need these doctors, whom the taxpayers of Ontario have educated, in the province of Ontario, and that we would be very happy to see them stay in the province from which they got their education?

I might point out, Mr. Chairman, that while I would be very much opposed to making them stay here; at the same time I say that this province if not now, five years from now, will not be able to continue to afford, in dollars and cents, to educate these students and to have them go, particularly, to the United States of America where, perhaps, they can get higher salaries than they do here. We simply cannot afford it, in my opinion, Mr. Chairman. I am worried about this situation.

Vote 518 agreed to.

Mr. Chairman: This concludes the estimates of The Department of Education.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report progress.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed, Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report that it has come to a certain resolution and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. J. P. Roberts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in conformance with the procedure we agreed upon, I move second reading of Bill No. 126.

THE DEPARTMENT OF UNIVERSITY AFFAIRS

Hon. Mr. Roberts moves second reading of Bill No. 126, An Act to establish The Department of University Affairs.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

ONTARIO UNIVERSITIES CAPITAL AID CORPORATION

Hon. Mr. Roberts moves second reading of Bill No. 127, An Act to incorporate the Ontario Universities Capital Aid Corporation.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

UNIVERSITY OF GUELPH

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, before I move this amendment, when this bill reaches the committee stage I will offer amendment to clause (b) of section 12, which is really an amendment for clarification. There is some doubt as to whether clause (b) says exactly what we mean it to say, but I will not make this amendment until we reach the committee stage.

Hon. Mr. Roberts moves second reading of Bill No. 133, An Act to incorporate the University of Guelph.

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Leader of the Opposition): On the second reading of this bill, Mr. Speaker. The staff of the new University of Guelph—will they be civil servants? Will The Department of Agriculture continue to hire and pay the professors and staff of the new university? Will they have the same freedom that the University of Toronto staff has? And other universities? What is the situation in regard to staff?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, I dealt with this question. I said that, for the moment, they would remain where they are now. This includes the research branch, the three colleges and the administration. But it is our intent to change this. The practical difficulties of so doing are many. We want to get the university established. Then they will have to sit down, the administration of the university, with these people and work out the details of such things as pension arrangements and salaries. It is quite complex, but we have to start somewhere. We start with the bill, but I can assure my hon. friend that this is our intent and this will be done. This will be a university in fact as well as in name.

Mr. H. Worton (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, on this bill I would like to voice a word of appreciation on the incorporation of this University of Guelph. As the hon. members know here, it has a longstanding reputation in our community as OAC. I am sure, sir, that the citizens of Guelph welcome this university into their midst and that the president, who will take office, and the board of governors will certainly contribute to the making of an outstanding institution of higher education.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

Clerk of the House: The 13th order. House in committee of supply. Mr. W. G. Noden in the chair.

On vote 209:

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Chairman, vote 209 is the vote dealing with the securities commission. I have had two occasions now on which I made some general remarks on certain actions that I think should be taken by the securities commission.

I dealt with the question of disclosures, the importance of legislation to make sure that there should be adequate disclosures. I have dealt with the importance of a code for takeovers being made a part of our law, and I have dealt with several other related subjects in this regard.

The reply of the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Wishart) to this moment has been that there is a committee and that they meet frequently and have all these matters under advisement. I would hope, as I said yesterday, that we will hear at a very early date what the result of their deliberations are, and just what action the government is going to take.

I emphasize again the importance of the remarks made by the committee headed by Chief Justice Dana Porter, in the report of his Royal commission to the federal government.

I think that the chapter in that lengthy report should perhaps be a guidepost for the committee and for the hon. Attorney General in bringing in new legislation.

It is to be regretted, and seriously regretted, that we have no statement of policy before this House at this time in view of all the discussion that has taken place concerning the field of securities administration.

But this evening, Mr. Chairman, I want to deal with a specific incident which relates to the sorry state of affairs in our securities administration. And I think it can highlight better than any general statements that I could make the sort of thing that persons concerned with administration of companies, persons who are interested in the affairs of companies which trade on the stock exchange, worry about. The lack of action that is taken by the securities commission and the lack of recourse available to persons who find themselves in the position of this gentleman, are painfully obvious.

I am referring to a letter, or a series of copies of letters I received from a gentleman by the name of Mr. Robert A. Hill. I note on the bottom of a letter addressed to me and dated April 8 that there is the memo that a copy of this correspondence has been sent to Mr. R. W. Knox-Leet, who is the registrar of the Ontario Securities Commission, 145 Queen Street West, Toronto. So that anything I say should be within the knowledge of the securities commission.

Subsequent to certain telephone interviews that I had with Mr. Hill, and certain earlier correspondence, he wrote to me, as I say, on April 8, and said this:

With regard to your letter I copied all of the correspondence in my file which bears directly on the question of voting of street certificates. Also where possible I have drawn on my associates in the proxy situation to supply what material they have in their possession.

In chronological order these letters are:

1. A letter from Robert A. Hill—that is the gentleman who has been writing to me:

—to the Bankers Bond Corporation dated February 14, 1964.

2. A letter from Robert A. Hill to Cairdner and Company, dated February 14, 1964.

3. A letter from Bankers Bond Corporation to clients, dated March 6, 1964.

4. A letter from Bankers Bond Corporation to "blank"— and in this case the name has been deleted at the request of the person to whom it was addressed, dated March 9, 1964. In this regard, the investment firm receiving this letter—the one I just referred to as No. 4—made a copy available and requested its use or reproduction be confined to subject content only.

5. A letter from S. W. Corfe, to the Ontario Securities Commission, dated March 14, 1964. "Mr. Corfe advises me that an identical letter as that sent to the Ontario Securities Commission on March 14 was sent to the Toronto Stock Exchange. The reply from the Exchange has been lost and reference would have to be made to Mr. W. L. Somerville, Jr., executive vice-president of the exchange, for a file copy if such is desired. Generally the reply, as I recall, was sympathetic and indicated that the matter had been under study for some time by the exchange committee.

6. A letter from the Ontario Securities Commission to S. W. Corfe, dated March 17, 1964.

The letter goes on to say:

Other letters which I have and to which you are most welcome are concerned specifically with the merits or otherwise of West Indies Plantations Limited management.

I do not propose to discuss that subject tonight, Mr. Chairman. The company involved is West Indies Plantations Limited. I have no personal knowledge of their affairs, nor do I think the conduct of their affairs or the ability of their management is really a topic that should properly be discussed at this time. The issue is availability of information to those who might be interested. That is the only issue and that is the issue to which I am confining my remarks.

I believe that—

Mr. Hill says to me in his letter:

I believe that these other matters lie outside the issue at hand.

and I quite agree with him.

With regard to the annual meeting of West Indies Plantations Limited on the 26th of March, 1964 it was evident that the voting of street certificates for management would make it virtually impossible to unseat the management. We had planned to pursue this vital matter with the two directors of West Indies Plantations Limited, who are also executives of Gairdner and Company and Bankers Bond Corporation, at the annual meeting, and so advised West Indies Plantations Limited's solicitors and president at a meeting on the 24th of March, 1964. The two directors in question, however, were not present at the annual meeting of the 26th of March, 1964.

Many firms enact a company by-law prohibiting voting street shares. Also, as

I understand, certain stock exchanges formally recognize the inequity of this situation and prohibit member firms from voting street certificates without written instructions from the beneficial owners. This is as it should be and I wish you every success in your endeavours.

Yours truly,

Robert A. Hill

As I say, a copy of this letter was sent to Mr. Knox-Leet, the registrar of the Ontario Securities Commission.

Very briefly, Mr. Chairman, the dispute involved in this matter was an effort by a certain group to change the board of directors in West Indies Plantations Limited. And to do so, they wanted the opportunity to put forward their case to all the shareholders. Very briefly, sir, they were denied the opportunity to find the names and addresses of the shareholders. Again, very briefly, they appealed to the Toronto Stock Exchange. While I do not have the copy of the reply from the exchange, the exchange apparently expressed sympathy and said they were looking into it.

I do have the reply from the securities commission which said, in effect, "there is nothing really that we can do."

Let me go on and read the rest of the correspondence in connection with this matter. In the order that I listed these various documents, the first letter from Robert A. Hill to the Bankers Bond Corporation, which would seem to be a logical and reasonable type of request to make, says this:

Dear Sir:

With regard to the above company—and that is West Indies Plantation Limited:

—my associates and I are soliciting proxies from shareholders in order to nominate a new board of directors at the forthcoming annual meeting of the company.

If I may pause and just make a comment on that, I would suggest that this is the sort of thing that people do. As recently as last September 25 when various groups lined themselves up, one as against the other, there was no unanimity. Eventually the people who had the franchise were allowed to vote and, eventually, they made their decision. But the various groups did not have one hand tied behind their back. Each one of the groups which thought it had a cause to advance and thought that the board of directors should be the people that they advocated, at least had access to the voters' lists and to the people who were going to participate in the election. This letter goes on to say:

We are most anxious to reach all shareholders in this matter and in examining the share register note that a substantial number of shares are currently registered to brokerage companies of which you are one. Presumably these registrations in many instances would be names other than those of the beneficial owners. We wish to locate these individuals to appraise them of the present situation and would greatly appreciate any assistance your firm can give.

I say, Mr. Chairman, that this would seem to me to be a most reasonable and logical request.

It is important that we obtain this information within this week. We thank you for your attention to this matter.

Yours truly,
Robert A. Hill

A similar letter was sent under date of February 14, 1964, to Gairdner & Company. I think it is almost identical, but I have a copy of it here and in case anyone wants to refer to the copy, certainly it is available to them.

Those two letters went out from Mr. Hill to Bankers Bond Corporation and to Gairdner & Company on the 14th of February.

The next letter, that I referred to in the list that I previously gave, was a letter from Bankers Bond Corporation to clients dated March 6, 1964. I have a photostat of that letter here and it is on the letterhead of Bankers Bond Corporation Limited, Government and Municipal Corporation Securities, 44 King Street West, Toronto. It is dated March 6, 1964, and it is addressed "To Clients." I am not superimposing any other name, the actual address is "To Clients." Those two words are used.

West Indies Plantations Limited

Our records show that you purchased Class "A" and/or common shares of the above company from us in street form. Unless these shares were subsequently registered in your name you may not have received current information about the company. Therefore we are enclosing a copy of the 1963 annual report and a copy of two letters from the President, Mr. E. C. Bovey.

In recent weeks the owners of Leeward Island Developments Limited, a private land company with small holdings on the east side of the Island of Montserrat, have been soliciting proxies in an attempt to gain control of West Indies Plantations Limited. This subject is discussed in detail in the enclosed letter. However, if you have any questions or wish additional information we would be pleased to discuss it with you.

We are not at all impressed with the people behind this attempt or with their methods of operation. In our opinion the precarious financial position of their own company and the nominal amount of their investment in your company as disclosed by the share register hardly recommend them as a candidate for the board of West Indies Plantations Limited.

We are advising our clients to return their proxies in favour of the present management and unless we receive specific instructions to the contrary from the beneficial owners we propose to vote the stock registered in our name in support of the present management.

The annual meeting will be held in the Ontario Room of the Lord Simcoe Hotel at 10 a.m. on Thursday, March 26, 1964.

Well, the first three paragraphs of that letter, I would think, certainly express the opinions of Bankers Bond Corporation Limited, and I have no opinion as to their assessment of the merits of the people who wanted to propose an alternate set of directors. That is their opinion, and for better or for worse it might be right, it might be wrong; but as I say I do not propose to discuss the merits of it. But the second last paragraph of this letter I think is worthy of repetition and it says this:

We are advising our clients to return their proxies in favour of the present management—so far, so good:

—and unless we receive specific instructions to the contrary from the beneficial owners we propose to vote the stock registered in our name in support of the present management.

Now, there are a great many street certificates. Bankers Bond Corporation apparently had some information about who appeared to be the beneficial owners. Bankers Bond Corporation, as is their right, gave their advice, made certain recommendations to these people, but then they go further to say: if we do not hear from you we are going to usurp your rights to make a decision and we are going to vote the way we think you should vote. This is the objectionable factor in this story.

Then the next letter in this story is dated March 9 from Bankers Bond Corporation to the addressee whose name I am not at liberty to reveal, and it says this:

Dear Sir:

Re West Indies Plantations Limited

Our records show that you participated with us in the original distribution of the above company's units consisting of one Class A share and one-half common share. We therefore are enclosing for your records a copy of the material mailed to all registered shareholders late last week.

And I would presume that is a reference to their letter of March 6 together with the accompanying material.

Additional copies are available if required. In addition we are enclosing a copy of our letter to clients who purchased shares in the above company from us in street form. You will note from this letter that we propose to vote the stock registered in our name in support of present management at the forthcoming annual meeting. We have been told by our solicitors, and by Borden, Elliot, Kelly & Palmer, solicitors for West Indies Plantations Limited, that it is perfectly legal to do this unless we receive specific instructions to the contrary from the beneficial owners.

I am not going to quarrel, Mr. Chairman, with the opinion that they received from their solicitors, nor with the opinion that Borden, Elliot firm gave them. I am suggesting that very probably those opinions are correct and reflect the present and very unhappy state of our securities laws.

We hope that you too will support the present management with your proxy. We will be conducting a proxy solicitation campaign on management's behalf and any help you might give with your own clients would be greatly appreciated. If you have any questions please let us know.

Yours very truly,

And then it is signed.

The next letter that I have is the letter of March 14 addressed to Mr. R. W. Knox-Leet, the registrar of the Ontario Securities Commission, and it says this:

Dear Mr. Knox-Leet:

I write to you as a shareholder of the above company to confirm our recent telephone conversation. A group of shareholders are attempting to replace the existing board of directors of the above company. Proxies have been solicited and to date better than 30 per cent of the shareholders have deposited signed proxies with us. In addition many more shareholders have pledged their support to us but wish to attend the meeting in person. Bankers Bond and Gairdner & Company, who made the original offering, have sent out letters stating that they intend to vote all shares registered in their name in support of management where there are no specific instructions to the contrary. We have requested and have been denied the list of names and the opportunity to correspond with the beneficial owners of these street shares.

That probably is the key sentence in this story.

We have requested and have been denied the list of names and the opportunity to correspond with the beneficial owners of these street shares. As you know the majority of brokerage houses will not vote any shares held in street form without express instructions from their client.

I checked that paragraph, Mr. Chairman, and I find that this is the general, common and accepted practice on the street, that the majority of brokerage houses will not vote shares held in street form without instructions from their client. I think this is the way it should be. It is unfortunate that the law does not reflect this, but most brokerage houses feel that it would be unfair to vote street shares unless they have specific instructions. The letter goes on to say:

It seems possible and highly probable that the intentions of Bankers Bond and Gairdner & Company to do the opposite in this instance will override the wishes and interests of the majority of the shareholders.

We feel in this instance that in the interest of the majority of shareholders Bankers Bond and Gairdner & Company should not be allowed to vote any stock unless it is beneficially owned by them. It hardly seems equitable, if the wishes of the majority of the shareholders could be thwarted by two brokerage houses. We are not asking you take sides in this matter—nor, and may I underline this, Mr. Chairman, am I suggesting to the House that anyone take sides in this matter:

—but we are asking you to give all shareholders equal rights to decide for themselves. The annual general meeting is to be held on March 26, 1964, and any action you can take in this matter will be greatly appreciated by us and the shareholders.

We enclose for your information a true copy of a letter sent to us over the signature of Bankers Bond, Gairdner & Company and Atlantic Securities, which sets out their policy regarding the voting of street certificates.

Then finally the last letter in this story is the letter of March 17 addressed to Mr. S. W. Corfe, the gentleman who signed the second last letter, in reply to his letter of March 14, and it says this:

Receipt of your letter of March 14, 1964, together with the enclosure referred to is acknowledged with thanks. This material has been perused and it is evident that the right of the shareholder to vote his shares in accordance with his own desires remains.

If I may editorialize at that point, certainly no one denies that this is so or that this should be so.

And further, that he has been put on warning by Bankers Bond Corporation Limited et al as to how his shares will be voted in the event that he takes no action to express his wishes.

And that, sir, is the sentence or phrase to which I take particular exception, because it seems to lend the blessing of the securities commission to this bald statement of fact that it is sufficient to put a group of people on warning that if they do not do something positive someone is going to take action in their name.

Finally, the last paragraph in this letter is this:

On the basis of the information available it has been decided that this is not a matter requiring any action by the Ontario Securities Commission at this time.

Sir, I have taken some time in reading all of these documents into the record because I think that they are indicative of a most unfortunate approach of the securities commission to problems of this sort. I do not have an exact copy of the letter written by Mr. Somerville of the stock exchange in reply to the correspondence, but the information I have is that his reply was sympathetic and the advice was that the matter has been under study for some time by the exchange committee.

I am suggesting, Mr. Chairman, that this story highlights the lack of control and interest certainly, that the Ontario Securities Commission has in matters of this sort. The fact is that when a fight like this takes place one would think—and it should follow almost axiomatically—that the shareholders who want to, can and should reasonably express their opinions in light of the decisions they make after receiving whatever information is available.

The fact is in this case that a group that was not happy with the existing management group wanted no more than the right to correspond with the beneficial owners and was denied this right. I say, sir, that this is wrong in light of all the democratic principles we have. This is wrong in light of the business practices that we have understood should have existed and did exist in relation to the management and control of such companies. I say, sir, this is wrong in that it encourages continued control by the in group without the outside group having the right to do or say anything about it.

The rather sad part of this whole story is that in the words of Mr. Knox-Leet, as expressed in his letter, the securities commission apparently has no interest in this.

Mr. Chairman, it is fine to say that the rules of our securities administration should be changed, and I have said that on three occasions in this session of this Legislature. It is fine for the hon. Attorney General to come and say we have a hard-working committee meeting regularly and in due course something is going to be done about it. But I would suggest it is the responsibility of this government in view of all of the criticism that has been levelled at our securities administration to indicate in which direction it is prepared to move. As late as this evening, in the face of all of this criticism, neither from this hon. Attorney General nor his predecessor (Mr. Cass), have we had one single word of guidance as to what the approach of the government is.

I say it is a very sad commentary on the affairs of our securities market when the registrar of the securities commission is prepared to say, in effect, "It is tough. It is just too bad and we are not really interested and we do not propose to take any further action at this time."

Surely, Mr. Chairman, this government has a real responsibility to ensure that democratic procedures exist in all of our affairs, and certainly in affairs as complicated as matters affecting securities and corporate control. The government has a special duty to make sure that it leaves no stone unturned to protect the rights of every shareholder, particularly of minority shareholders who have no ability to protect themselves in any other way than to appeal to governmental authority.

That, Mr. Chairman, is the story, and I say the story reflects more clearly than any general statements I could make, more clearly than any statements that any financial writer in our newspapers could make, even more clearly than the statements made by Chief Justice Dana Porter and his committee, the lack of interest, the lack of concern and the lack of desire to reform expressed in our securities legislation by this government.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Chairman, I just want to make one brief comment following along on what the hon. member for Downsview has said. Some two or three years ago the whole role of the stock exchange and the securities commission and their relationship was one of fairly lively discussion in the press—it was started by a series of articles in Saturday Night. We had the then chairman of the securities commission before us, the standing committee on government commissions, and the point that became very clear there—and I submit it to the hon. Attorney General in the overall investigation we are making of commissions and the failure to protect the rights of individuals in his many capacities—was that we delegate certain powers to the Ontario Securities Commission from this Legislature. It is its responsibility to exercise those powers. The then chairman of the securities commission in so many words said in effect, “We leave a considerable proportion of the job that is ours to the stock exchange. There is no point in both of us doing the job. They police their own members.”

There are some people who believe that to a considerable extent the stock exchange is something approaching a private club. It certainly claims to police its own members, but here we have illustrated in the story that the hon. member for Downsview has spelled out to the House an illustration of how a very important principle, the delegation of power that belongs to this Legislature, is delegated in the first instance to the securities commission, which by default leaves the exercise of this power to the stock exchange, and the stock exchange does nothing about it. Therefore, the normal requirements for the normal rights of a holder of stock in the company are frustrated in this fashion.

The hon. Attorney General rather blunted our tendency to an all-out attack on the securities commission and the Toronto Stock Exchange in the introduction of his estimates by saying there is a committee looking into this. I just conclude by suggesting to the hon. Attorney General that here is one area to which I think he, as a new holder of this post, should give some consideration and should make certain that there is some clarification of the situation. I assert without any fear of contradiction that it is a very bad principle that we who are the trustees of the legislative power in the provincial Parliament of Ontario should be delegating power to a body which does not exercise it and in effect hands it on to another body which in turn does not exercise it, and thereby the rights of the individual stockholders are not upheld.

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Chairman, I will not repeat what I said last night and which has been referred to, except to this extent, that I did say the committee—a very capable, distinguished, competent committee—has been studying these matters. I referred to the subjects it was studying: proxy solicitation, insider trading and information to shareholders. As I stated last night, it has been meeting weekly since last November and studying these matters and has sent out questionnaires and briefs and so on and expects to report very soon.

I think I do not need to repeat that. Nor do I wish to say that the matter related by the hon. member for Downsview transpired before I came on the job; I do not wish to use that as an excuse but it did so happen. I must confess that particular matter which went to the securities commission has not come to my attention. I think I can hardly be expected to reply specifically to that instance on this occasion here tonight. But I would say this further that The Corporations Act, which is not actually a matter of the securities commission—a separate Act; not The Securities Act but The Corporations Act—by section 313, requires:

A corporation shall cause the following documents and registers to be kept: the letters patent; supplementary letters patent; copies of bylaws; a register of shareholders or members in which are set out the names, alphabetically arranged, of all persons who are shareholders or members or have been within 10 years shareholders or members of the corporation, and the address of every such person while a shareholder or member, and also the number and class of shares held by each shareholder, the amounts paid up and remaining unpaid.

And then a register of directors, and then section 317 requires:

That information shall be open for inspection and the company is subject to a penalty if it is not open for inspection to any shareholder, and that material must be kept at the head office of the company, with certain exceptions where they have another office.

So that with respect to those shareholders who are registered, there would be no difficulty whatever in ascertaining who they are, and where they are for 10 years back. With respect to those who have not registered their street certificates—and they are all, I think, generally urged to do so—there is a section in The Corporations Act, section 76, and it provides as follows. Incidentally, these three sections to which I am referring—313, 317 and 76—all bear, I note, at the foot of the section, the year 1953. They have apparently been on our statute book as part of The Corporations Act for some 11 years.

Section 76 provides, and is headed in the margin:

Unauthorized voting.

A company may by bylaw provide that any person who is a broker, broker-dealer, sub-broker-dealer, or salesman within the meaning of The Securities Act, shall not vote in person at a shareholders' meeting, or appoint a proxy to vote at such meeting in respect of shares, unless he is the beneficial owner of such shares, unless he is authorized so to do by the beneficial owner of such shares.

The section starts out by saying:

The company may by bylaw provide that such voting shall not take place—

I think this section clearly implies that if the company does not pass such a bylaw then it is proper to vote such shares by the broker, or broker-dealer on behalf of the shareholder and that, I presume, was the basis of the opinion of the very eminent firm of Borden, Elliot, Palmer and Company.

First of all, the point is that this is a matter governed by The Corporations Act. There are certain safeguards as to obtaining information as to who are the shareholders of the company, but as to the voting of those shareholders who do not see fit to register their street certificates, the law which has stood on the book for 11 years allows the voting of such shares. This, I say again, is one of the subjects which is being studied by the committee which is working diligently, meeting weekly, and will report soon. I trust that when that report comes in, if this is one of the subjects which is recommended for action, action can be taken.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, let me merely say this: I did not for a moment disagree either with the legal opinion given by Borden Elliot or by the other firm of solicitors who were not even named. I am satisfied, the hon. Attorney General has given us chapter and verse confirming the opinion that they gave. I do not care whether those sections have been on the statute books for 11 years or 111 years! I would think that the hon. Attorney General, as a man who believes in the preservation of democratic rights, must be shocked at this sort of a story. I would think that the hon. Attorney General would make it his business, as the man who advises the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Roberts) on legal matters, to see that this situation is remedied at the earliest possible opportunity.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think I would accept that and I would only say in reply: The Attorney General has not been in this House as long as some hon. members and this is the first time that he has heard of this matter. I pointed out that this has been on the books for 11 years—

Mr. Singer: I agree, I agree! I made the point last evening. It is unfortunate that this hon. Attorney General must be the recipient of this type of criticism. It is unfortunate because some of the things, sir, that we on this side of the House want to say must be said notwithstanding the fact that the hon. Attorney General has been in his portfolio such a short period of time. But we cannot accept such an excuse which might mute our criticism merely because the government has seen fit to change portfolios. We shall not miss the opportunity to do our duty and to criticize. So in addressing criticism to this hon. Attorney General, or to any other hon. member of the government, we have to address it to the hon. member who happens to be in the particular portfolio at the moment we have the opportunity to address the criticisms. This is the only way we are allowed to proceed and this is the only way really that it should be.

Just one final remark on this. I would hope that when the hon. Attorney General has a chance to examine this particular correspondence pretty carefully—and I would expect he would—that he have a look at the letter written by Mr. Knox-Leet, and particularly the last paragraph which says:

On the basis of the information available it has been decided that this is not a matter requiring any action by the Ontario Securities Commission at this time.

I would have thought this sort of inquiry or complaint, addressed to Mr. Knox-Leet, might have awakened in his mind some sort of feeling that there was an inequity being done by the present form of our statutes. Perhaps he might have said: "A case has been made and I will refer it to my superiors in order that they might review the legislation."

I think when a civil servant takes it upon himself to say that this is not a matter requiring any action at this time, that he is taking too much unto himself. It would appear—and I do not know Mr. Knox-Leet personally—that he is an intelligent and an able man. He must have been to obtain this appointment. However, when this sort of thing comes forward, he should have been sufficiently alert to say: "Well, maybe there is something in this that is wrong, and let me refer it to my superiors and perhaps they might make an inquiry and, if anything is wrong, then the political people who have the responsibility will perhaps correct it."

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Let us have the record straight, at least to this extent, Mr. Chairman. Perhaps Mr. Knox-Leet might have seen fit to refer to the matter, but it only happened some few weeks ago. He wrote his letter in the month of April, but let this be clear on the record, that what was done in this whole situation was done according to and within the limits of the present existing laws of this province.

Mr. Singer: Within the limits of the present existing laws, yes; but not within the limits of equity or justice, and not within the limits of what appears to be the accepted practice on the street, which is much fairer than the existing law.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I might go along with that, but I just do not want the impression to go abroad that a wrong was here condoned because your statutes, which perhaps you had some hand in making, permit this sort of thing.

Mr. Singer: I chose my words very carefully and in case there is any doubt in anyone's mind, at no time did I say, Mr. Chairman, that any law had been broken.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Right!

Mr. Singer: I thought I was as fair as I could be, I accepted the opinion of the solicitors as referred to in this correspondence, and the hon. Attorney General has the statute right in front of him, he confirms my thinking. I did not suggest that at all, but what I did say was that the government should and must be concerned about these things and must take action.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Downsview has raised a number of points this evening and earlier in his introductory remarks on the hon. Attorney General's estimates. He has raised a number of important matters relating to the securities commission, or the securities branch. I will try to avoid repeating what he has said.

He put before the House in some detail information contained in a series of articles which appeared not long ago in the Toronto Daily Star regarding some practices that are permitted in the Toronto Stock Exchange and comparing our regulation of exchange activities in this province with that in other jurisdictions.

The hon. Minister has pointed out that a committee looking into these matters has several of them under advisement right now. I cannot understand, Mr. Chairman, why we need a committee to decide whether or not we are going to do what was done long ago in other jurisdictions.

One of the diseases around here, in my period of observation, is what I would call committee-itis. We have even got to the point, sometimes, where we have set up committees to study the reports of committees. I do not really see the point of this committee. I think that it would have been possible for the government to have brought in legislation at this session, not necessarily on all areas concerned, but certainly in areas where there is solid experience in other jurisdictions to go on.

For the last couple of years we have not heard the sort of lurid tales of the fleecing of the victims down on Bay Street that we used to hear, the tales of the boiler shops and the racketeers hiding behind the shelter of the Toronto Stock Exchange. Things have been relatively quiet in the last two or three years. Partly, no doubt, this is because there has been a considerable degree of cleanup down there. But I suspect from recent developments, Mr. Chairman, that one of the main reasons we have not been hearing these stories has been that we have not had one of these feverish situations where there was a major strike in a mining field in northern Ontario. Now we had one of those recently and it seems to me that we saw a repetition of the same old thing.

Indeed, I saw a reference in the paper a few days ago to a businessman who said that the Toronto Stock Exchange is little more than a high-class gambling casino. I am not sure that that is an accurate description, Mr. Chairman. I must say I am not a frequenter of gambling casinos, but I would think that in a high-class, well regulated gambling casino one could feel assured that the wheels are not rigged and the dice are not loaded. After what I saw a short time ago down on Bay Street, I am not so sure that one can always say that about the Toronto Stock Exchange. I think that there was a real basis for believing that the dice may have been loaded against certain people.

I am no expert on this matter, but it appears to me that one of the reasons for this is the practice of the stock exchange of listing penny mining stocks and retaining their listing even when there is no activity in them. This is a wide-open invitation to individuals, who are mainly interested in stock promotion, to get control of a company quite cheaply and have a listing ready-made on the Toronto Stock Exchange. They can evade the scrutiny that is now, I understand, the practice in the stock exchange when one applies for a new listing. If you just buy over one of these inactive companies, and if you get a nice deal like the Timmins one, you can really start booming your shares that represent no genuine value at all, drive them up for a period, then unload them and let them drop. I do not know that this is done from boiler shops any more. Perhaps the people who are doing it are more respectable than boiler shop operators. But it seems to me that the same old thing goes on whenever the opportunity presents itself.

Another phase of this matter, to which I would like to make some reference, Mr. Chairman, is the whole question of stock options for company executives. As I understand it, the stock exchange has certain rules on that. Perhaps they are not absolute rules but they are guide lines limiting the percentage of shares that can be offered in options. Also there is some control over the price at which they are offered to executives. But I see in a recent item in the press that the rules have been bent in at least one case. I hesitate to mention the specific case because I have had occasion to refer to a prominent individual in this organization not long ago and I do not want to create the impression that I am specifically pursuing him, or his organization. This just happens to be an example where the rules were not complied with as they were written and the stock exchange took the position that their requirements were not rigid ones; that they were subject to some elasticity.

The problem, Mr. Chairman, is that the offering of stock options to executives is really a device whereby the management group consolidates its control over a company. I am a person who is concerned about the ability of small groups to seize control of companies and use the control they have over those companies to get control over others. I have referred to this matter in the past, mainly under the estimates of the hon. Provincial Secretary (Mr. Yaremko).

It is a matter, Mr. Chairman, in which he has little, if any, interest at all, I would judge. But I think it is a matter that we ought to be concerned about. Those gentlemen who claim they believe in free enterprise and in competition, I think, ought to be concerned about the rapid speed at which control over our economy is falling into fewer and fewer hands. The stock option is a ready-made device to expedite that process. The employees who are given these options are not employees. They are management people. They are in the management group in the company. They are the people who are already in control, and they simply strengthen their control by getting shares at favourable prices for themselves.

One other phase of the same problem I would like to mention is the practice whereby the funds of company pension plans and other employee benefit plans, but mainly pension plans because that is where significant investment funds are accumulated, are used to buy the shares of the company concerned. I do not think that should be permitted. It is not permissible for the officers of a company to buy shares of the company out of the company's own treasury, for the very obvious reason that that would enable them to use the company's own funds to strengthen their control. I really do not think that the use of company pension plan funds to buy shares in the company is essentially different. It is a device whereby the management, which really has control over these profit-sharing funds and pension funds, can use funds accumulated from the employees and the company to buy shares to intensify their control.

These are two areas that I think should be investigated, whether under The Securities Act or The Corporations Act, or both. I do not know, but I certainly think that some change should be made with regard to both of these matters.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I would just like to ask the hon. member, in the case where a pension fund is managed in large part by the employees, is the hon. member expressing an opinion that they do not have the right to buy the shares for their pension fund from the company in which they work?

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I would suggest to the hon. Attorney General that it is not all that easy to determine.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Just in that case. Is that wrong?

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that it would be good practice to require that the funds should be invested in other securities. There are not many cases where the employees have any real control. The companies name representatives and then they name employee representatives. They are all named by the company. Where there is a union organization, I think there is a possibility of genuinely independent employee action, but few of those plans are operated in that way at all. They fit into a totally different type of picture. The kind I am talking about are profit-sharing plans which are frequently combination profit-sharing and pension plans.

The so-called employees' voice, which is represented as employee control of the funds, is a fraud. It is not true employee control at all.

Vote 209 agreed to.

One vote 210:

Mr. J. P. Spence (Kent East): Mr. Chairman, I would like to draw to the attention of the hon. Minister a problem under this vote which occurs in towns of Ontario. That is the high cost of policing these towns. Of course the hon. Minister is quite well aware the town has the right to do its own policing, or enter into agreement with the Ontario Provincial Police. We find that we have towns with 2,500 population, other towns with 3,000 and the cost of policing them with the provincial police, which I do not say would be any dearer or any more costly than if they did it themselves, is running in the neighbourhood of $25,000.

These towns have few sources of revenue. With the demands of many other services required, they are finding the policing of these towns a great burden. I believe we are coming to the time when some assistance should be given to these towns. A good police force is required because of tourists and other individuals coming to that town. We also find some municipalities outside of these towns are policed without any cost to them. I know the hon. Minister is quite well aware this has become too great a burden. I think the costs of policing should be absorbed by the government. This would be a great benefit to these towns and give them another life of hope.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I thank the hon. member for the remarks he has made on this subject. I take it the hon. member is referring to the cost of policing in those municipalities that maintain their own police forces. I am sure the hon. member is aware that some thirty to forty municipalities are now policed by the Ontario Provincial Police. I think those municipalities, without exception, seem quite happy with the arrangements they have entered into.

The recent report of the police commission has suggested one field in which costs might be saved. That is amalgamation of police forces. This does present some problems and may take a little time. But it is one of the subjects that was given to the police commission to study. It is under consideration by the government itself as well as by the commission.

I might say, too, that I have had, since assuming this portfolio, interviews with three municipal councils, one as late as today, about their police matters. The matter of cost is only one of the factors. It was more a matter of whether they should have a council committee or a police commission with a magistrate, a judge, or at least a judge or the reeve and one other member who was usually a magistrate. These sort of things. But I know that the matter of cost is becoming more and more of a factor and burden. The subject of it will be given full consideration.

Mr. G. Bukator (Niagara Falls): I do not think it is a fight, Mr. Chairman, but I would like to make this point. I would like to follow up on the same subject. The hon. Attorney General did say that the municipalities that have the provincial police policing them in the small towns are quite pleased, without exception. I think those were the words used by the hon. Minister.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: As far as I am aware.

Mr. Bukator: I would like to relate one case to the hon. Minister particularly. It pertains to the village of Crystal Beach. There are provincial police in the province and in these estimates a figure is shown of approximately $20,300,000. There is no assistance given to these municipalities that are not—

I would like to get the attention of the hon. Attorney General. I think I am entitled to that much of a concession. I do not want to be rude about this, but I think he should hear this particular case.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I was trying to listen with one ear.

Mr. Bukator: Well, at least that is better than none at all.

The village of Crystal Beach has five regular police protecting the village year-round. They have approximately a thousand voters. Now, in the summertime they have to take on eleven part-time provincials for their park. I realize this is quite a hardship for the hon. Minister's department because somewhere he has to find these men. In the summertime it is found, too, that they are needed much more on the highways maybe, so you can ill afford to devote them to municipalities. I am quite sure the hon. Attorney General would be happy if the municipalities could police themselves because he has a place for his police.

But the thing that I am trying to bring to the attention of the House is that if a municipality has an influx of population, such as happens in a summer resort, they need these extra police. These people come from all over the province as well as from our neighbouring country, too. This creates a hardship on the municipality that has no industrial assessment whatsoever and only small commercial assessments.

These municipalities find themselves overburdened when it comes to paying for the provincial police that they must have. Mind you, it takes five regulars and eleven extras in the summer.

I do not believe that the municipality should have to bear the cost of those extra eleven men, because the people who come into that area come from throughout the province. Therefore it would appear to me that it would be good business for the province to pick up the tab for that because, if they were not on that job and they were working through the province, the government would have to pay their wages anyhow.

Now then, these municipalities are geographically situated in such an area that people do come to enjoy the summer resorts, the parks. They come from throughout the province. It would appear to me it would be good business for the hon. Attorney General's department to look very closely at a problem such as the one I have related. I am sure there are others. As a matter of fact, I am acquainted with one or two more, but I was using this as an illustration. If they must bring into a municipality eleven extra police for the summer months to take care of the people who come from throughout the province to that area, and create a condition where the costs are borne by that municipality, it hardly seems fair. I would like some comments from the hon. Attorney General if he has had any experience since he has taken office on that particular problem.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I would not like to engage in a debate with the hon. member for Niagara Falls on this subject. But I would draw to his attention that the situation of the municipality is parallel to the situation of the province, only on a smaller scale. We have had very serious discussions with the commissioner of the Ontario Provincial Police, with members of his staff and with members of the police commission, on this very subject. But particularly, it pertains to the Ontario Provincial Police.

Here you have a situation whereby if you increase your force in summer, which is a very difficult thing to do with competent officers and constables, and you have to increase it by hiring, say, six men for every one of your regular force, what do you do with them in the winter-time? How do you train them to be competent policemen for three or four months of the summer? Then what do you do with them? Can you replace men of this type—a law enforcement officer—for a part-time job and turn him loose in the fall and hire him back in the spring? This is a difficult thing to do.

The force is being augmented, however. I think, as the hon. member and the hon. members of the House are aware, in situations where there is a very heavy summer traffic and summer visitors congregate, additional provincial police are provided for traffic patrols, and to as large an extent as is possible, to assist in those areas that need policing. But it is the municipality—and I do not want to debate the matter—but it is the municipality where the tourist, or the visitor, or the camper congregates which gets the benefit, in that location, of his presence there, and of his spending, and of his visiting, and staying in the locality.

It is all very well to say the province gets the benefit of the tourist traffic. True, it does. But it gets it by the sum total of all the little places, or the big places, where the visitors go and stay. If a municipality has its regular police force and, in the summer, its ranks are swelled, tripled or multiplied, perhaps it is fair to suggest that the increased revenue for the three or four months it is crowded with visitors should be charged, to some extent, against the cost of extra policing.

It is not a problem that I want to shrug off, Mr. Chairman. I want to find out if it is a difficult problem.

In discussing it with the commissioner of the Ontario Provincial Police a few days ago, we discussed this very thoroughly. Additional men are being taken on and the reason is because the force needs, generally, extra recruitment at this time. Those men now in the winter months, are being used to give them training at the college at Aylmer and at the police college facilities here on Sherbourne Street. So that all this has been thoroughly thought of insofar as is possible. A realistic plan has been worked out to try to meet this situation.

But I do not think you can ask that the province assume the whole burden.

Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr. Spooner) has just been good enough to remind me that the unconditional municipal grants which the government makes, go, at least to some extent, toward the cost of police forces in the town. I think that is about all I can say to the hon. member on this point at this time.

Mr. Bukator: The points you make, especially the third one about the unconditional grant, as I understand it, having some 12 years experience in municipal council, are that where you used to give them the one mill subsidy away back and they could do with it what they liked, now you give them $2 per capita and they can do with that money what they like. So a place like Crystal Beach, for instance, with 2,000 population, would maybe get $4,000. That does not pay for eleven summertime police.

I come from a municipality that originally had its own police. I think maybe this should be made public, that we found that around election time the local police were wondering whether, if the council personnel should change because the electors had changed their minds, the police would have a job or not. They would come to see whether, if there was a new reeve and council, they were secure in their positions, because they might fire the policemen. Many times issues were made and elections were fought on the fact of whether they would or would not keep their local police if they were in office. But when I was in council in the village of Chippawa, we found that you would get away from that political pressure by having provincials in the village. They are doing a good job. But this is a municipality that has that population year-round. There is very little fluctuation there.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Could I ask the hon. member—did he mention the population of Crystal Beach as 2,000?

Mr. Bukator: About 2,000 in the winter months.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: About 2,000. Would you be good enough to tell me how much it is increased in order that you have to hire eleven additional policemen?

Mr. Bukator: It gets to at least 25,000 people a day there in the summer months.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Do you not get any revenue from them?

Mr. Bukator: I would say several little businesses do, yes, but how does that affect the man who has a home, who has done an ordinary job, who pays his taxes regularly? This expenditure is added to that individual for something that he has nothing to do with. He has his home in the municipality where for nine months of the year he enjoys himself very well because they are about normal, but for three months or four months there is an increase in population from 2,000 to 25,000. These 11 men you bring into that area—the provincials—why do you bring them in? You, the province are paying them their wages. And so you would just bring them from one area into another. I say that these people who come from throughout the province are taxpayers and should bear part of that cost, and not one little municipality that has no industrial assessment whatsoever. This is the point I am trying to make.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Surely the hon. member must realize that if you have a provincial police force as it is today—I think the number is 2,541 in uniform—and if you needed 11 extra men to police that little village, you could not find them out of thin air on the provincial police force. You just cannot, if they are now occupied on traffic and patrol and the usual police duties before the tourist influx starts. Where are we to find the 11 extra men that you need?

Mr. Bukator: You get them—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I would have to pull them out of the hat and I am no magician.

Mr. Bukator: Before you came someone else did pull them out of the hat and they did come in and they did a job and they were paid for it by that municipality. The fact I am trying to establish is that where they come from I do not know, they are there annually. The fact remains that they come in every year for that period of time. I do not know where you people dig them out of, what hat you get them out of, but I tell you you do a good job and this I give you credit for. I do not know why the people of that small municipality should be burdened with that extra tax and this is the only point I am trying to make. I have said nothing against these men. They do an excellent job.

They are not influenced by local small-town politicians, which again is good, because you have a commission, you have a judge, and you have a magistrate and you have the mayor or the reeve of that municipality who sit on that commission. This is excellent. They are not dictated to by small-town politicians. But the fact remains that there is a village of people who just cannot carry that burden. I will tell you that the business people of that area do benefit, naturally. They try to make in three or four months what will keep them all year. Some of them do well enough that they go to Florida for the winter months. They come back in the spring and open up some old shack. The taxes on that to the municipality are very little, even though they have the business tax. But this is a problem that you have to wrestle with.

If I were standing here before you arguing on behalf of the village of Crystal Beach only and that was the only place where you had this problem, I would say it is no problem of yours. But this problem is throughout the province where you have a summer resort area. I think it will bear a good look at it. You are new in the position, trying to do an excellent job as I have observed your actions, but there is one for you to wrestle with and I hope another year you can settle this problem. I just wanted to bring it to your attention because if you have nothing else to do at least this will give you something to worry about.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, he certainly must think I am quite a wrestler. If you are going to multiply your force by 11, increase it by 11, and this is true all over the province, I must ask your help to tell me where I am going to find some 2,000 extra policemen—

Mr. Bukator: I am very pleased that you asked me to give you a hand.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Actually, I am only doubling the present force, which is 2,500. I will have to get 10,000 more if we are going to do this summer policing for you.

Mr. Bukator: I would like to answer—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I do not think I can wrestle successfully with that.

Mr. Bukator: Just one other point and then I will quit on the subject. You asked me to help you. I think that one of our hon. members here, from Sudbury (Mr. Sopha), made an exceptionally good point. I do not think he meant to take municipal police out of municipalities. I do not think that was his intention at all when he argued in committee, I believe, pertaining to small municipalities having provincial police. I think the provincial police are doing an exceptionally good job and this is quite a concession for me to give the government credit for anything. I think the provincial police are doing a good job.

I think you should add to your forces. There are people who do get sick even in police forces and there are people in summer months who must have vacations. I think all you have to do is add to your forces and you may settle some of your problems. I realize money is a problem too, but if municipalities are policed properly and the money comes from throughout the province instead of hitting individual municipalities, I think possibly this would settle the problem. That is why I say some concession is needed other than the $2 per capita unconditional grant. This is not sufficient.

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Mr. Chairman, to the hon. Minister, I notice that the high officials in the provincial police and the executives and others, maybe inspectors and sergeants, may wear glasses. However, I understand that if an applicant for recruitment wears glasses this is a bar—despite the fact that he may be a graduate, have a matriculation certificate, be physically up to five feet nine inches tall or whatever it is, and of the right weight and so on.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think I understand from the commissioner of the Ontario Provincial Police that on recruitment his vision has to be 20/20. I shall have to ask him for information. Perfect eyesight is necessary on enlistment, the commissioner tells me. After that, unless his eyesight became very bad, it does not affect his promotions.

Mr. Troy: Thank you. I do not know if the hon. Attorney General in his capacity as a prosecuting attorney or as a defence counsel has even been in the circuit court in Nipissing. If he has been, he has seen the building which is the headquarters of the inspectorate for the district of Nipissing. If he has, he would have realized long before he became the Attorney General, sir, that this is not the type of building that should be the headquarters for the Ontario Provincial Police. It might have been all right years ago, long before the bypass was constructed in North Bay, but now there would have to be arrows all across the city to let people know where the provincial police are stationed.

I want to ask the hon. Attorney General when there will be a new inspectorate headquarters in Nipissing. There are all kinds of lovely detachment buildings but here is the inspectorate under which the provincial police all the way from Parry Sound right to Kirkland Lake operate. Does the hon. Attorney General have any idea when we may expect a new building?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No, I cannot answer as to the time when that new building which the hon. member so longs for will be achieved. There is a very substantial building programme to provide quarters for the Ontario Provincial Police, with the names of the places and the amounts required for those structures here in my hand. On the next page is found the extended building programme in view. But dates have not been set, or amounts provided, for this construction. It may be of some comfort, however, to tell the hon. member that this is not an alphabetical list; that North Bay, whatever it may mean, is ninth on that list and, much to my sadness, I see Sault Ste. Marie last on the list. This is not an alphabetical list. But I have no answer as to when North Bay might get that building.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, in the northern Ontario detachments, in each one of them, are there personnel who are bilingual? Is this the practice in northern Ontario, particularly where there are so many French-speaking residents?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The commissioner advises me that one of the problems is to get sufficient recruitment of bilingual applicants, particularly French Canadian personnel who speak French, in order to make the detachments, in the areas where there is a considerable French-speaking population, bilingual. An effort is being made to achieve this. It is a matter of recruitment.

Mr. Troy: Is there any medical-legal expert in northern Ontario who can conduct an autopsy in the possible case of a capital murder charge or non-capital murder? The reason why I ask is because there was a very tragic incident in the riding of Parry Sound recently. The body had to be brought all the way down here to Toronto for an autopsy because, apparently, there was no medical-legal expert who was qualified to conduct an autopsy in such a situation.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I am aware that there are a number of qualified persons in the northern Ontario area but I cannot give the hon. member the locations. There might be a special case where a particular medical-legal expert might be required. But in most of the centres there are physicians and surgeons competent to conduct pathological examinations and autopsies.

Mr. Troy: Pathological examinations; but tell me where—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I cannot, at the moment, tell you where the experts there are. But I know there are some.

Mr. Troy: I do not see, in any of these votes, that particular committee or group that I think are still under the hon. Attorney General's department. That particular branch that has to do with literature and obscene literature. Under what vote would that be taken? Would it be public safety, or official guardians or local masters? Which one?

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think I can find that for the hon. member. We passed it last night, apparently during your absence, but—

Mr. Troy: I was away on the nation's business and I am sorry—

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I can possibly find it before the evening is over.

Mr. Troy: Just for my own information, so that I will be watching for it next year, under which vote did it come? God willing, I will be here next year.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I can tell the hon. member now. I believe it is vote 205, item 5.

Mr. Troy: Vote 205, item 5. Is that under law revisional committee? Have they made a report, sir, this year? Has that committee made a report?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: That committee reports rather informally from time to time. I notice considerable material in my office from it.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, during the debate on the crime report of the Ontario Police Commission, we had considerable discussion on the use of wire-tapping. I think it might be accurately stated that we were discussing there the underlying principles of the use of this. There was, obviously, sharp division. I do not intend to review that aspect of it, though. I would like to ask the hon. Attorney General, with regard to the use of wire-tapping in Ontario at the present time, where is it being used now and under what conditions is wire-tapping used in the province of Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: As far as I am aware, it is not being used. By that statement, I have only a reported statement. I have not any direct report from the Metropolitan Toronto Police. I am not aware of it being used in any other municipal police force. The commissioner of the Ontario Provincial Police assures me that his force is not using it.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, Mr. Chairman, is there any law that permits the private use of wire-tapping?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Does the hon. member mean where you do not make actual contact with the telephone wire?

Mr. MacDonald: Not in the police force—private individuals.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Does the hon. member mean where you do not physically touch it? Is the hon. member talking about electronic devices?

Mr. MacDonald: The use of electronic devices; either the new style or the old style.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I do not know. I do not know the answer.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I do not think we can resolve this here tonight. But I think the time has come for the government to cease what I would describe, if I may use that very wonderful word, as its hugger-mugger approach to this issue. I have made it my business to inquire particularly in some police sources, and I am not going to divulge them because they have to be very quiet on the issues. I want to suggest to the hon. Attorney General that wire-tapping is very widely used—maybe that is an exaggeration—but it is used fairly extensively. In fact, this is where its use first developed extensively, in private business. It is used by private business concerns to get information with regard to their major competitors and trade secrets.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: It is used, of course, most secretly then.

Mr. MacDonald: Oh, I presume it is used most secretly. I will come to that point in a minute, if I may just complete my story.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I thought I might just give the hon. member this as we went along. I have this information from my legal staff, in a note telling me that The Bell Telephone Act and The Ontario Telephone Act both prohibit wire-tapping.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not know to what extent, but that is the note that I have in my hand.

Mr. MacDonald: Yes. This was discussed at some length, the legal position of it, in the crime report of the Ontario Police Commission.

Secondly, I want to suggest, Mr. Chairman, that there is no doubt about it, wire-tapping is used by those who are involved in organized crime. I do not think anybody disputes that.

Thirdly, I am informed that wire-tapping is fairly prevalently used by private detectives and that this government licenses private detectives.

Fourthly, the hon. Minister might be interested to know that—and this is from an unimpeachable source—as a matter of fact, Canadians are sent out of this country to take courses in the use of wire-tapping.

Finally, I am interested in the comment of the hon. Minister a moment ago, that the commissioner of police says that there is no wire-tapping. I talked to a rather important police officer—I will not identify him nor in what police force he was. He was very coy at the end but you could read between the words. Certainly there are indications that it is being used. So it will be denied by the commissioner as he apparently has just denied it now, and it was denied by Chief Mackey.

The Globe and Mail carried a story, which the hon. gentleman has undoubtedly seen, on April 1. Reference has been made to it in earlier debates in which Albert Warson, who is a very experienced reporter on the police beat, reviewed this whole picture in the light of the recommendations that came down in the crime report. In the course of his article there are two paragraphs. Let me read them:

The Ontario Provincial Police have some of this electronic apparatus and are considering acquiring more sophisticated models.

It rather strikes me as futile for the Ontario Provincial Police to be buying this expensive equipment for fun, or for experimental purposes, in leisure time or for some other purpose than using it. The next paragraph is:

The Royal Canadian Mounted Police force has this equipment and uses it for investigations in Ontario and elsewhere.

Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest to the hon. Attorney General that the government's position at the present time comes pretty close to being in the position of the prohibitionist in his attitude toward drink. You are against it and you make it illegal, and then you wink at or turn upon its use.

I do not know whether we can resolve this issue as to the fact of its use at the present time in police forces—quite apart from the desirability of it. But sometime, instead of pursuing the hugger-mugger approach, I submit we have got to do it, as I submitted earlier in the debate. Maybe next session we can have the appropriate people called before a committee of the Legislature and we can get the information. I have reason to believe what I have suggested is true, and if it is the case that wire-tapping is as widely used as I have indicated, then I submit that the hon. Attorney General should examine the situation in relation to the principles that we were discussing.

Is it wise, like the prohibitionist in his attitude toward drink, to say, "I do not like it, it is illegal; I make it illegal and then wink at its use"? Then its use becomes more or less clandestine even when it is used by the police. Or is it more appropriate, and I pose it as a question for our consideration, to follow the advice that was given by the Lord Beckett commission in Britain, by Attorney General Kennedy in the United States and by our own police commission, that instead of winking at its fairly widespread and clandestine use, you lay down the circumstances under which it can be used? Then there is control of it, the use of it is going to be a permission granted for specific circumstances, and the need for its use under those circumstances has to be submitted to the appropriate authority before the permission is granted.

But I do not think the hon. Attorney General—being a person who is honest in his approach to facing the facts—when he has been in this office somewhat longer than he has been, can ignore the fact that wire-tapping is being used. I submit, from information from people who know, that it is being used by the police forces, too.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I would just like to say this before we go further on this vote. I know there is considerable opinion in favour of the thought. Some jurisdictions use it, but I am in some difficulty at the moment, at least—it seems to me the argument is somewhat specious that says because private business uses this in a clandestine way, because criminals use it, because private detectives use it secretly, governments may use it.

Mr. MacDonald: They do it under your licensing.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes, but we do not license them to do this—anyway, you argue that because these people do it, the government should then do it. I think this is almost analogous to saying that because people buy lottery tickets the government should go into the lottery business. I do not think the two things necessarily make an argument for the government doing these things.

I know there is some merit in the argument. I am not going to say more about it tonight. The hon. member has suggested perhaps after I have been here longer I would have more time to think about it and study it, I might approach his thinking more closely. That may be so.

Mr. MacDonald: I would like to add if I may, I am not for the moment advancing any thinking at all.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): What are you doing?

Mr. MacDonald: I want to clarify the facts as to the situation in the province of Ontario at the present time and I am submitting to the hon. Attorney General that wire-tapping is in widespread use in many areas.

Mr. J. H. White (London South): Mr. Chairman, may I make a comment at this point? I am not sure of the law myself but I do know the Bell Telephone Company had secret microphones planted in the calendars on the desks of its female service representatives in its office. I do know that some used car dealers in London have planted microphones in small "closing rooms," and that the salesman deliberately leaves the cubicle and goes into the sales manager's office, where the two of them listen in on the conversation between the car buyer and his wife and assess their desire for the car and the ability to pay and all this kind of thing.

I do not know if this is legal or not and perhaps I could ask the hon. Attorney General to comment on that. Then I want to ask one or two questions about police wire-tapping.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I do not know what comment I should make on this fabulous story. I have never heard of such a thing going on.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): Things were nice and quiet in the Soo, were they not?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: If I had the facts and someone suggested this was illegal—if I could find some law and had the facts, and the law said it was wrong—then I suppose it would be my duty to prosecute.

Mr. White: It is easy enough to determine because it is going on all over the place all the time. It is a matter of concern to me because these devices are becoming more and more easily available. I think that some American magazines offer these listening devices and these different kinds of peeking devices. I am just wondering if we should not attempt to control the sale of that kind of equipment which intrudes on the privacy of citizens.

Getting back for just a moment—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Could the hon. member let me have the details of this at some early date?

Mr. White: With the greatest of pleasure.

I wanted to deal for a moment with police wire-tapping. It certainly is going on, there is no question about it. As a matter of fact, the Globe and Mail or one of the other Toronto newspapers has photographs of the equipment being used by the Toronto police force. I suspect that the use is fairly widespread in police forces. To ignore it completely, to let it be used unrestrainedly by policing authorities seems to me to have dangerous possibilities.

Mr. MacDonald: Hear, hear! Now here is a rational voice, for once, among those back benchers.

Mr. White: It may be that no wire-tapping at all should be permitted by the police. I am not entirely sure about this. It may be that it should be used; that it might be used in legal fashion with a court order. If this is the case I suggest it should be a senior court order and that the authority might be given by a Supreme Court judge to a police force for a particular investigation only. I think the whole matter deserves to be clarified, Mr. Chairman. I would hope that the hon. Attorney General would look at it very carefully.

Mr. MacDonald: Good, now we are a wee bit ahead.

Mr. R. Gisborn (Wentworth East): Mr. Chairman, I would like to raise, with the hon.

Attorney General, a question that I feel needs some clarification. It is in regard to the rights of the police, particularly the Ontario Provincial Police, to confiscate negatives of pictures taken by newspaper photographers, or in fact by the public.

This question arose out of an incident on or about January 29 of this year on No. 8 highway. Apparently a student of McMaster University, who was out on an assignment for the Silhouette, the student paper of that university, happened upon an automobile accident on No. 8 highway on this particular date. He took a picture of one car involved in the accident. Apparently there was a person in the car who was badly hurt at the time, or perhaps fatally hurt.

The policeman on the scene attempted to wrestle the camera from the student and, finally, he agreed just to take the film. The student surrendered the film. I was asked by the director of the paper from McMaster to raise the question and I did. On February 3, before the orders of the day, I posed this question to the then Attorney General:

Are the police within their power when they confiscate films of pictures taken by citizens at the scene of an accident? In the case of a recent seizure of a film, will the hon. Attorney General assure the House that it will be returned to its owner?

Now the answer to the first part was "no" and the answer to the second part was "yes". Subsequently the film was returned to the student. The student did, I understand, request from the commissioner of provincial police an apology for the incident. I believe he was told that they would not apologize and this was subsequently quoted in the press.

But the real point involves a further press report attributed to Inspector Robbin of the district headquarters in Burlington. The question posed to him was to the effect as to whether confiscation could be applied to pictures taken by newspaper photographers. The inspector simply repeated "It is all under consideration."

I think this should be made very clear to the public, and particularly to this House, whether they have the right to make seizures and confiscations of such films. If we get this kind of an answer from the then Attorney General, and we have press reports coming out that certainly create some confusion, then I feel that it should be clarified one way or the other.

It was reported in the press the policeman might have considered the picture to be in bad taste and therefore he might have had that right. I think we have to decide when one considers something in bad taste as to whether or not that also gives them the right to infringe on the individual rights of the public.

I happened to pick out of the Hamilton Spectator a few days after this incident a photograph that was put into the newspaper captioned "Two Nuns in Hospital following Car Crash." It gives the names of the Sister and another passenger in the car. Certainly many would consider that sort of thing, in some light, in bad taste. Others would consider it worthy as a lesson to the public in regards to safe driving. I have certainly seen, myself, many pictures much worse than any I have seen in the public press that are used for safety purposes. They are put up in the factories to indicate the hazards of negligence.

Mr. L. M. Hodgson (Scarborough East): There never was any identification with those advertising pictures.

Mr. Gisborn: I did not say there was. And I did not say—well now, this poses a question. Does the hon. member want to take part in this debate and help me clarify the point I am raising? Has the Ontario Provincial Police the right to confiscate films or pictures taken by newspaper photographers?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The hon. member, at the beginning of his remarks, stated that he had asked this question of my predecessor. He was told that the answer was "no." Would the film be returned, was the second part of the question, and the former Attorney General answered "yes"—and the film was returned. I do not think I can do better than repeat the answer he then gave.

I think there are more factors and features involved in this particular incident, apparently, than the hon. member knows or that he is revealing to this House.

I do not know whether you would call it a question of bad taste, simply and only, or not. But I am told that the situation was that there had been an accident; the body of a woman partly stripped of her clothing as a result of the accident was in the car, exposed. The police were investigating the case and the student came into the area where the police were. He was asked not to come there and not to interfere with their investigation. He persisted. He interfered with the investigation. He took the pictures. The police took the camera and the film under those circumstances.

My predecessor, sir, was asked: Did they have a right to take the film? The answer was no, they did not. Will the film be returned? The answer was yes, and the film was returned. But I think, really, it is pretty hard to defend the action of that student in that particular incident. The legal rights are clear, but surely there is a limit to which that freedom can go. There must come, somewhere, a point where it becomes almost license. If an apology were demanded, I do not think I would be inclined to suggest that it be made to that student.

Mr. Gisborn: I would not argue, Mr. Chairman—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Are you trying to protect him—to establish the right—

Mr. Gisborn: I would not argue, Mr. Chairman, with the remarks of the hon. Attorney General in regard to whether the taking of the picture was in good taste or not. But I certainly would argue with the comments attributed to the inspector of the provincial police when he was asked the question as to whether confiscation could be applied to pictures taken by newspaper photographers. His answer was that it is under consideration. This question is the one that should be cleared.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Is not the matter now closed? Is there any still unfinished business about this?

Mr. Gisborn: The unfinished business, I submit—and I am following through a promise I made to the students of McMaster University that we would get this clarified one way or the other—is whether they have the right to take pictures—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: No, not that kind. The student should know better.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: They have not got the right, I think, if the circumstances are such that they are interfering with the police investigation where such a serious thing as a death has occurred and it is necessary to investigate it and get all the details to establish whose responsibility it is. If a policeman asked me to keep out of that area, whether I have a camera or not, I think I would have to go. I think I would be wise to go. I think that would be my answer.

Mr. Gisborn: Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether the hon. Attorney General has all the details of the particular incident as it happened. The story I got of what happened at the scene of the accident does not comply with what the hon. Attorney General has told me. I did not investigate that part of it. It is the principle of the incident that I am concerned with and I think the thing that has to be answered is, can the provincial police confiscate pictures taken by newspaper photographers?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The answer was no, and I repeat it.

Mr. Gisborn: But it is not clarified by the remarks of the members of the force.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Dovercourt): Mr. Chairman, if I could ask in connection with clarification, I have noticed that it has been reported in the paper that the deputy Minister of the hon. Attorney General suggested, in connection with the police, as I understand it, that the police need not advise anyone that they had the facilities of legal aid or a lawyer. I wonder, sir, if the hon. Attorney General would care to comment on that. What is his opinion of this?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I also read the newspaper remarks. I do not recall that I have discussed it with my deputy Minister. This was part of his newspaper interview in the course of the hearings of the committee in respect to legal aid. I think the matter came up as a presentation to the committee and I anticipate that that committee, which is still continuing its work, will shortly be in a position to report. I expect the deputy Minister will report on this matter, give the views of the committee and the presentation which was made. I have not discussed it with him, as yet.

Mr. Thompson: Could I ask, Mr. Chairman, what would be the hon. Attorney General's opinion? I think it is rather important that there was some concern by newspapers. Assuming that this remarks was made by the deputy Minister, I wonder if this could be clarified. Should police officers suggest to anyone that they can have lawyers, counsel and legal aid and that it is available?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think that it is a new concept to this extent, that a police officer must, as a part of his regular duties, whether he is asked or not, tell everyone he arrests or takes into custody or accosts that he has a right to legal counsel. This is a little bit of a new concept. I think if the police officer were asked, "What are my rights? Can I get my lawyer?" he is certainly bound to answer "Yes."

Mr. Thompson: But what would you say if he was not asked? If a police officer were to see a man going to the court, for example, who looks confused and does not know his rights, would the hon. Attorney General suggest that this advice might be given to him?

In my own riding I have had situations of men who have gone before this court. I think of one example I had which shocked me very much. That was a young man who came from a country where there is a dictatorship and he told me after he had been to court here that under this dictator he thought he would get fairer justice than he did here. The reason he said this was because of the confusion that he had felt because he had received no legal advice.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: He never really told you that, Andy.

Mr. Thompson: He most certainly did tell me this, and I can document this and would be glad to. It is one of the reasons why I am a strong advocate for some type of legal aid and I hope the hon. Attorney General is.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: It is one of the things that is being considered and will be brought forward but I would rather wait until the report is in and then come forward with recommendations.

Mr. Singer: Sir, my colleague raises a very interesting point but I do not know that it touches directly on the inquiry being conducted by the deputy Attorney General. That is, whether or not policemen, who often are an accused's only contact with the law through the whole procedure, should stand aside when an accused comes before a court and say nothing, and whether or not there is a duty on some law enforcement officer to say to the accused that he has certain rights and certain protections. Somebody should make these things clear.

Mr. G. A. Kerr (Halton): The magistrate always does that.

Mr. Singer: No, the magistrate does not always say that. The magistrate does not always say that and I am very glad the hon. member mentioned this. I am not sure but I think it was the hon. member for Halton who said that, is that right? I wish the hon. member for Halton would come with me some morning into A or B court at the city hall and see how many magistrates take the trouble to explain to the accused who come before them that they have the right to legal aid.

I can tell you that there is one magistrate with whom I am personally familiar and that is Magistrate Bartrem. Perhaps this is as good an occasion as any to compliment Magistrate Bartrem. In his court in North York he does this carefully and painstakingly to make sure that these explanations get across. I think he carries on as a magistrate should, but many is the morning that I have spent in the courts at the city hall and this was not done, Mr. Chairman.

These accused come in and their only contact with the law is that they have been arrested. All they have seen really are policemen and suddenly they are pushed out of the pen into the dock. "How do you plead?" And nobody bothers to be of any assistance to them at all. Somewhere along the line I think there is a duty on law enforcement agencies and agents to make sure that people understand the right that they have. This is why I, with my colleague, am very surprised to see what the deputy Attorney General is purported to have said. I do not know if he said it. I think if he did say it, he was wrong and I would hope that these are not instructions that are given to the OPP and other police forces across the province.

Vote 210 agreed to.

Mr. Chairman: This concludes the estimates of The Department of the Attorney General.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves that the committee rise and report that it has come to certain resolutions and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report it has come to certain resolutions and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will meet at 2 o'clock, the usual time, and will have a night session. We will proceed with the estimates of The Department of Lands and Forests. Everything is now back on the order paper. Some bills came back only today so we must be prepared to meet any of the items that are presently on the order paper.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 11.05 o'clock, p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

WEDNESDAY, MAY 6, 1964

The House met at 2 o'clock, p.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: We are pleased to welcome to the Legislature today, in the east gallery, students from Cainsville Public School, Brantford, and members of the Women's Progressive-Conservative Association of Hamilton; and in the west gallery, students from St. Gabriel's Separate School, Willowdale.

Presenting petitions.

Presenting reports by committees.

Motions.

Introduction of bills.

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to present to the House:

1. The annual report of the Minister of Lands and Forests for the province of Ontario for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1963.

2. The annual report of the Ontario Energy Board for the year ending December 31, 1963.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I rise on a question of personal privilege. This morning's Toronto Globe and Mail carries a story in which Dr. Morton Shulman, Metro's chief coroner, and Sergeant Cruickshanks, the constable in charge of summoning jurors at 86 Lombard Street, are credited with statements purporting to refute what I said in the House on Monday. I wish to set the record straight.

Dr. Shulman has done a creditable job of cleaning up a bad situation. I have no desire to get into a public argument with him. But when Dr. Shulman states that one of his first acts following his appointment in March, 1963, was to issue orders to end the practice of appointing veteran jurors, all I can say is that the records prove conclusively that the orders were not obeyed immediately, for the practice continued throughout the rest of 1963. If it has been eliminated this year, that is good, even if somewhat belated. I shall be glad to present to Dr. Shulman, or anybody else who is interested, a lengthy list of veteran jurors who served duty in 1962, and who were chosen once, and sometimes more often, throughout 1963.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, let me cite just one case that Sergeant Cruickshanks disputes. I stated on Monday that the dean of the veteran jurors was D. W. Crawford, who had served five times during the year 1962-63. Sergeant Cruickshanks is reported as saying that he could only find evidence that Crawford had served twice in 1962. He contends that this was merely a mistake and, therefore, not too bad a record in the choice of over 500 jurors. Sergeant Cruickshanks is correct. Mr. Crawford did serve twice in 1962, on May 2 and November 8. But I shall leave the House, and the public to decide whether it was purely a mistake when I inform them that Mr. Crawford also served on three juries in 1963: on May 9, October 30 and November 14.

Sergeant Cruickshanks is also reported as contending that he never had a husband and wife serving on any jury he had chosen. True, no husband or wife served on the same jury. But in the two-year period which I investigated, there were eight husbands and wives who served on juries. The law of averages would not likely produce this result if the choice of the juries was a random choice among the hundreds of thousands available for jury duty in the Metro area.

The eight teams are as follows: John and Helen Brindley, of 420 Kingswood Road; Fred and Margaret Gourlie, of 439 Kingswood Road; Ross and Grace Urquhart, of 447 Kingswood Road; Nolan and Constance Blackburn, of 3 Claudius Gate; Jack and Joanna Knight, of 65 Dombey Road; Herbert and Helen Fuller, of 35 Seven Oaks Avenue; Stanley and Ruth Sherwood, of 133 Midland Avenue; and Stanley and Tilley Vitore, of 27 Tasker Road.

It will be noted, Mr. Speaker, that three of the husband and wife teams are from the same street.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The 13th order. House in committee of supply. Mr. W. G. Noden in the chair.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF LANDS AND FORESTS

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Chairman, before the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests (Mr. Roberts) starts, I wonder if, for the guidance of hon. members, I might ask the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Roberts) if the House will be sitting tomorrow morning?

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Chairman. It is my intention to sit this afternoon, tonight, tomorrow morning, tomorrow afternoon, tomorrow evening and then we will start Friday in the usual way at half past ten in the morning.

Hon. A. K. Roberts (Minister of Lands and Forests): Mr. Chairman, since I did not participate directly in the Budget debate, I would like to record that I subscribe to all the traditional commendation that has gone on the record, and add a personal one recognizing the ability and long service of the honourable Speaker of this Legislature, and of you, Mr. Chairman, both of whom I regard as personal friends of long standing and of high repute.

A year ago in this House I referred to the fact that only seven of the 90 members elected to the 21st Parliament in 1943 remained in the Legislature. Now, a year later, they are but three—Grey South (Mr. Oliver), Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Downer) and St. Patrick (Mr. Roberts).

I commend, sir, the efforts of the new hon. members, some of whom have shown very promising debating ability, and I wish all hon. members well.

In the period in which we live, we have been witnessing renewed growth in revenues and in expenditures at all levels of government and throughout the economy of the province.

Many of the departmental estimates which have already been dealt with reflect basic expanding expenditures. Some of them do not have sources of revenue within their own reach and are dependent on the consolidated revenue fund for their undertakings.

The Department of Lands and Forests is in a somewhat different position. This department is charged with the administration and management of the renewable natural resources of this province, with certain obvious exceptions—agriculture, for example.

I am told that at the Resources for Tomorrow Conference of 1961, when the subject of renewable resources was under discussion, some members of the steering committee thought that people should be included in the term renewable natural resources but I say God forbid that we should have to have that responsibility in our department.

The total ordinary expenditures for the department is shown in the estimates as almost $28 million. The estimated ordinary revenues amount to in excess of $23 million.

We regard five of our branches as encompassing the main activities of the department in volume—fish and wildlife, lands, parks, timber and forest protection. As appears in the estimates, the expenditures relating to these five is almost $19.5 million, or roughly a little more than two-thirds of the total departmental expenditure. Practically all of our revenues will come from the activities of these five branches.

The revenues from these five more than look after their costs of operation and contribute substantially on the black side of the ledger to assist in defraying the costs of the other large servicing parts of the department.

Mr. Chairman, we can wax quite eloquent in extolling the great potential of our province in the field of renewable natural resources.

I had a few experts doing some figuring for me to see if we could come up with a very general guess at the potential value of the standing forests. The standing timber resources of this province are estimated currently by our forest inventory at 150 billion cubic feet gross total volume. That is the new outer space type of mathematics, although as a matter of fact, you do not have to look to the stars these days for those kind of figures. You get them annually in the federal, and even in provincial, financial statements for the asking. I said 150 billion cubic feet gross total volume.

This would be approximately one billion, 800 million cords, which means Ontario can sustain an overall estimated annual allowable cut of 2.7 billion cubic feet—although, not all, by any means, in the economic area of development at the present time. But it does mean that there is, as demands and markets arise, ample room for tremendous expansion.

In the estimates of value based on factory and similar shipment returns for wood products, namely, forest and forest-based industries, I have had provided the very formidable figure of $1.8 billion of value. This amount is bound, however, to be subject to some refinements because we do not have our figures for the current year. When you think of these figures and you realize that these renewable resources are there in perpetuity if properly managed, you get a little better conception of what this means to our province.

Moreover, as more intensive management and improved methods advance, and as the operations become more fully integrated, these resources will increase in value.

Then what about the real value of fish and game in stream and bush? It is, of course, difficult to place a gross value here. Recent surveys indicate that the average resident angler in Ontario spends $138 annually on the sport and resident hunters $110. In our calculation, we have used a similar yardstick for non-resident anglers and hunters and have come up with an overall figure of no less than $338 million. In addition, we have reasonably accurate figures for furs and commercial fish. Add all these together and we have the not insignificant figure of $350 million on an annual basis in the fish and game sector of the provincial economy.

From wood products and fish and game products then, we have an annual dollar value of finished products of $2.150 billion. This, Mr. Chairman, is a larger figure than five per cent of the total gross annual product this year for all of Canada.

This is big business. As a matter of fact some other research figures on the resident anglers and hunters of our country show that they consumed no less than 60 million pounds of game and fish in a single year—I do not have comparable figures in respect to some of the other forms of consumption but there may be some other departments which would.

Incidentally, the total distribution of fish from our 17 Ontario fish hatcheries was 72 million of eggs, fry, fingerlings, yearlings, and so forth. This represents a considerable amount of substitution of class in the hope of getting better end results. For example, we are now using far more yearlings for lake trout restocking and reducing the number of fingerlings.

If there are any unlucky fishermen in the Legislature, this figure of 72 millions of possible fish going in this year ought to be heartening to them for the future.

Hon. members have received a copy of the last annual report and some other material which was distributed yesterday. It included a photograph of the 47 current publications of this department. Those publications are available as required.

This department has been giving very serious thought and study to the ways and means of making the best possible use of Ontario Indian citizens in the management of our natural resources. It is encouraging to see the increased attention being given to the general subject of Indian citizenship at various levels of government.

Bill 130 of the federal Parliament has been introduced for study and, when enacted, will create an Indian Claims Commission with wide powers to deal with claims, including areas where the earlier compensation or dealings may have been so inadequate or sharp as to constitute unconscionable dealings. This bill has been referred by the federal government to numerous groups for study and comment and my department is personally, at the request of the hon. Prime Minister of this province, preparing a submission.

I had the personal advantage and experience of visiting, early in January of this year, a number of our most remote Indian settlements in Ontario and seeing first-hand conditions as they exist, and the way in which some of the problems of existence are met on a day-to-day basis.

I can assure all hon. members of the House that there is plenty of room for improvement. I want to assure the House that The Department of Lands and Forests intends to do all in its power to work with all those who are like-minded in this field.

I would particularly emphasize that there is a very good working relationship between The Department of Lands and Forests and the Indian Affairs Branch at Ottawa. Both the former Minister in charge, the hon. Mr. Favreau, and the present Minister, the hon. Mr. Tremblay, have shown very keen interest in this co-operative effort.

In pursuance of what, I think, are very worthy objectives, we have in our department set up an advisory committee on Indians to the Minister, which committee is composed of eight Indian citizens of Ontario.

I hope, shortly, to be able to announce in connection with that very famous Algonquin Park, the creation of an award or membership which may be known as the "Order of Algonquin." This should, in time, rival the "Order of Good Cheer," which originated with Champlain in Nova Scotia. I can visualize some extremely interpretive pageantry accompanying this award.

I now want to say something which is not in my text, but which I regard as a first priority in human relations. I have been concerned, as I have stated and as you know, with the employment and the living conditions of the Indians in Ontario; and in particular with those living in the far northern settlements. These people are the finest woodsmen in the province, superb fire fighters and of the greatest importance to us when serious fire conditions develop.

We have, in the past, employed many of them after special training in modern methods and equipment. This year we plan to develop this programme further and include, in our attentions, the use of standby forces, on a rotation basis, of several hundred Indians. These forces will be located at strategic points across northern Ontario, ready to move into action should a serious situation develop. In addition to the training programme, these men will be employed on forest management programmes when fire hazard is low.

This is the key sentence. Their pay will be in line with the high standard of work which they perform. We will recognize that they have a particular technique and we will pay for it.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: It is my intention to develop this programme this year and in ensuing years to make the fullest possible use of our Indian people in the management of our forests in Ontario.

Now a word about timber. Our greatest material asset to be managed and administered is timber. The current year has been a very satisfactory one, with an overall five per cent increase in the cut on Crown lands.

Seventy per cent of all timber cut from Crown lands is pulpwood. Almost all the balance is sawlog material. I am sure all hon. members will be interested to know, too, that from 12 per cent to 15 per cent of the overall cut in this province comes from private lands.

Ever-improving methods in the industry are causing more and better end-results to be obtained from the same quantity of wood—more use of the raw material and less waste in the woods. In a word, it means better utilization.

And one can give a quick example of that in the development of the chips industry in the last few years. Today there is enough tonnage from chips to be the equivalent of a single good sized pulp and paper mill in actual production.

During this current year, there have been announcements of several new developments involving millions of dollars in expansion in the pulp and paper industry in Ontario. The sawmill industry is moving at a sound level of production, with its share of the increase indicated from the current year's figures, last year's figures particularly. Chips and veneer are two of the outstanding new uses of this industry.

Some critics have stated that our methods have resulted in tying up vast areas and curtailing possible expansion. They talk from a base of misinformation. Quite contrary to their allegations, good management practices are maintaining us in a position to provide for any reasonable, properly planned, economic expansion in the foreseeable future for both the pulp and paper and the sawlog industries.

That, Mr. Chairman, is a very important situation and one for which there has been a lot of hard work done over the last several years to bring about the possibility and the actuality of being able to make such a statement.

Those who have had experience over the last half-century in the uses and abuses made of the timber resources know what can happen if a policy were to permit acquisition, without comparable utilization, for quick capital gains unrelated to any accomplishment or adequate consideration. On the other hand, the objective is to distribute so that all planned economic wood undertakings can have access to a fair share of the product required. Our policy has always been to assure continuity of that availability for stability in any given area.

Ontario has no law prohibiting free movement of its timber in Canada. There is a control over export outside of Canada from Crown lands. Nearly all the timber that is exported from time to time, under permit, is of species which constitute a surplus. There has been a constant decrease in the export to foreign countries of unprocessed timber from Ontario. The province's control is confined, of course, to Crown lands. It has no control over wood from private lands.

While I am talking about restrictions on exporting of renewable resources, you will recall that a few moments ago I said that there were certain experts who consider that people should be classified as part of our renewable natural resources. If that were ever to happen—and I have already said I hope not—then the Minister of Education of the day might welcome some similar type of export restriction on that form of renewable resource, particularly if he has a spending budget comparable with the one passed in this House yesterday.

I want to say a word or two about provincial parks. The provincial parks as reorganized into a branch of this department are not yet ten years old, yet the expansion of provincial parks from an original six parks into a province-wide system of 86 operating parks is, I think, a fine accomplishment.

I would like to pay tribute to the staff of the department not only in connection with parks but in connection with all the other work I have been speaking to you about and which will be apparent as my estimates are dealt with. Mr. Wheatley, the parks head, has been incapacitated now for several weeks. We all hope that he will recover his health before too long. We have 2,616 of a permanent staff and I would thank them all for their very good work during the year under review.

I take this opportunity also to extend to Mr. A. S. L. Barnes and all the members of the staff of the conservation authorities branch, all good wishes in the new department, and to thank them collectively for the very excellent work they did when a branch of this department.

A noteworthy accomplishment this year was the recognition by way of the McKee Trophy award of the contribution of the deputy Minister of Lands and Forests, Mr. Frank McDougall, to civil aviation.

Last summer we had a record attendance of 8.5 million visitors to all provincial parks and no less than 840,000 campers used the tent and trailer campgrounds. It is a wonderful thing to be healthy and be able to get outdoors in the open air and enjoy the pleasures offered by Ontario's parklands.

The 14,500 campsites providing approximately five times that number of woodland beds for every night throughout our summer period are an open invitation to thousands of families to live out next to nature for at least a few days in the year at a nominal cost and be healthy. More comfortable commercial facilities are available to those who wish to use them. These facilities, too, are taxed to the limit in many areas of the province during the rush season.

I am glad to be able to say that based on our surveys, the expansion that is proceeding is making provision for the summer tourist and vacationer demands. We realize that these demands will constantly increase, particularly in this mechanical age of shorter and shorter work hours. This park expansion will, therefore, continue at a rapid pace. I do not propose to go into any detail at the moment but I would like to mention three great projects.

Not too far from here we have Wasaga Beach, for which further use is indicated and studies with respect to additional beach recreation and expansion are going forward.

Two other sites are also in the making for parks. Point Farm on Lake Huron is a grand site where over 100 years ago the then commander-in-chief of the American army came with a gunboat, pleasure bound. In view of some of the Fenian raids of that era, he caused a calling out of the armed forces to repel the rumoured attack. However, General Sherman enjoyed a few days' vacation on this very site.

Several hon. members of this House will be particularly interested in this park acquisition and we all look forward to its growth and development with great interest. It is not far from Goderich. It has a beautiful beach and ravine area with a certain amount of traditional old buildings and old landmarks that should be of great value in the building up of the park.

Travel with me for a moment down to Prince Edward county, near Wellington, in the east, and I will show you a great length of sand banks owned by the Crown and now about to be developed into a vast day-use bathing area. Highway 401 makes this area readily accessible from places as far away as Metro Toronto for a day's outing or more. The scenic beauty of Prince Edward county will come to be appreciated more and more as this development proceeds, and I am sure the hon. member for the neighbouring riding of Hastings West (Mr. Sandercock) will agree the beauty of Prince Edward is well worth seeing by everybody in the province.

These are but a few of the wonders that will be available for future generations in this province.

Despite heavy current commitments for property acquisition, I am glad to be able to say that there will be no change in park entry and camping fees in provincial parks in 1964. I was going to ask the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. S. Lewis) to take particular note of this. He is not in his seat; perhaps he has run out of steam in this early part of the summer season, but he is not with us at the moment. In any event his hon. leader (Mr. MacDonald) will perhaps convey this to him, because when I read this letter I will make a comment that I would like to be conveyed to him.

One reason for this decision is contained in this letter. In my view, it interprets in a remarkably clear manner the viewpoints and the problems and the outlook of a low-income family mother, a city mother, and her view of the outdoor provincial park facilities. She writes me:

I would like to protest the raising of camping fees from $1 to $2 a night. I am just one of many with a growing family who find camping a way of giving my children a holiday. Food alone is more costly when camping because you don't have ovens, or the same facilities. Also I find things more expensive when not close to the chain stores. To camp for an average two weeks—and she is referring to the fees in the parks:—for around $7 to $10, comes to $14 or $20 a holiday. This to us is top price. To have to put out that amount for one week will, I sincerely believe, render it impossible for our family to holiday this year.

I understand it has something to do with a wood shortage. Surely they could charge an extra quarter to anyone wishing to build a fire. This would cover the cost of wood.

I understand also the association of tourist owners are pushing this raise in fees. They do a good business for a few months in the summer and most of them have other interests to keep them going the rest of the year.

If we could afford to rent a cottage, or even stay in a tourist home, we would do just that. It would be far superior to the inconvenience of camping. However, camping is much better for children than running city streets. It is not my idea of solid comfort but at least my children have managed these last few years to get away from the city. Whether they do this year, depends on your decision.

This, I say, I would like to be brought to the particular attention of the hon. member for Scarborough West, because this is an act of this government which he so frequently in this House has accused of callousness and thoughtlessness for the people generally.

Our revenue, actually, from this source amounts to about 70 per cent of the operating costs. And I think ultimately and looking into the future, we would hope that eventually the parks will be self-sustained.

This year junior ranger camps, 66 in number, will be housing the full number which is provided for in the estimates if the House passes the vote. It is 1,600 this year, which represents almost a 20 per cent increase over last year's authorization. It is a pretty popular business and I am sorry to say I cannot place them all in filling the full 1,600 complement.

The number of applications this year exceeds by a considerable amount the number of places available. Boys of 17 years of age, coming from all parts of the province, meet in these excellent camps, do useful work, learn about conservation and the outdoor life, and with it all earn what for many of them may be their first work pay for approximately two months of the summer.

Now I turn to the lands branch. This branch is continuing its survey of marine resources, supervision of summer resort lands, public land sales and land rentals, and land-use planning for public lands for recreation and other purposes. It is working in close conjunction with the parks branch in a number of these areas.

Some idea of the planning for land acquisition and the availability of suitable areas can be gained by a quick glance at the compilation such as I have in my hand. This is one of half a dozen or more inventories of different areas in the province covering in the main some 440 to 450 possible sites and representing nearly one million acres of land. All of it is documented in volumes similar to this. We also have a map of the province pinpointing such areas and a glance at this map shows that the work is a very extensive and all-inclusive one.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a word—and I am nearly finished—about forest protection.

The forest protection branch has one of the largest and best equipped fire-fighting forces of its kind in the world. A coloured film has recently been made, Flames in the Forest, which shows the work of this branch under operational conditions. Many sections of the film represent photography of live forest fires and actual fighting of them, including the use of the department's air services.

So vivid is this film in its depiction that copies have already been provided to each of our 22 district offices. If any hon. member wishes it shown in his riding, I suggest that he contact the local district forester and make arrangements accordingly.

The great north country of Ontario is still not too well known to many. To really know Ontario you must know and understand the north. I know it is the desire of the hon. Prime Minister and the government to use the facilities of The Department of Lands and Forests to bring this vast area to the closest possible perception of the hon. members of this Legislature.

With this in mind, preliminary plans are being made for a tour of the north by the hon. members during the life of this Legislature. This was discussed at the recent meeting of the standing committee on resources the other day. The air arm of Lands and Forests can play a big part in rapid transportation. It may be that it would be preferable to move in this way a substantial part of the hon. members' tour and in that case the department with its air-minded deputy and staff will do its best to make the undertaking as useful and comprehensible as possible.

On vote 1101:

Mr. R. W. Gibson (Kenora): Mr. Chairman, in rising today to discuss the estimates of this department in a general way, I am reminded of the fact that it is the responsibility, in fact the duty of the Opposition to scrutinize the operations of the government and to criticize where criticism is necessary. Moreover; I would emphasize the fact that in my opinion, this criticism should be constructive, and even more important, responsible.

It is easy, Mr. Chairman, to make wild accusations of dishonesty, incompetence or wastefulness. It is somewhat more difficult for an Opposition member—and this fact I do not regret, and with this government I am proud of the fact—to analyze a department of this size with the limited time, resources and research facilities that I have at my command. This I would suggest is perhaps one of the most dangerous weaknesses in our system, when one considers that I am, in fact, faced with the combined resources, knowledge and experience of, in effect, the whole of The Department of Lands and Forests.

Fortunately, in some jurisdictions, this is somewhat not the case but I am the first to admit, if the history books are correct, that we on this side of the House might well have brought this situation on ourselves. Nevertheless, I prefer to live in the present and try to make history rather than relive it, atoning perhaps, for the errors of the past.

Mr. Chairman, this is the third year in succession that I have been the lead-off speaker for my party in the debate on the estimates of this department. This fact, indeed this honour, weighs heavily on my shoulders and coming from my part of the country, I particularly recognize the importance of this responsibility. That there are others more qualified for this honour I do not doubt, as is always the case, but I am here and will do my best.

I might add that I find it somewhat ironical for me, a northerner by birth, by residence and by choice, to be placed in a position to criticize a department run by a Minister whose experience with the north came before I was born. I cannot personally believe that one who has not lived in the great north of this province can detect, understand and sympathize with the problems we are now facing. This, sir, is in view of the fact that in the operations of this department, to a very large extent, lies the future of the north. Only to live in the north, as it now is, is to understand it and recognize the hopes and desires of all of the people, of every economic level, who now live there.

I have said this many times in the past and you, Mr. Chairman, will recognize the truth of what I say. Almost every settled community in the north and northwest is fundamentally based on the existence of one established primary industry. Each of these communities lives, progresses or dies as does this established industry. My hon. friend from Rainy River (Mr. Noden), more than I, has seen the economic repercussions that result when these basic industries are weakened or threatened.

We in the north have been somewhat overwhelmed by changing economic factors. I was taught some ten or so years ago in university that basic industries were established where the raw materials were available, where a power source could be found and the labour force was equally at hand. A market for the product was important as well but not so important as the other factors I have mentioned. Now the situation has drastically changed. Our raw materials are shipped in bulk to the heavily populated areas of the east and south, our power sources are siphoned off to the same areas and our available labour force drifts off to the metropolitan areas where the only available employment is to be found.

We find that the key to the establishment of a primary industry is an available market. In the heart of Metropolitan Toronto we have paper processing mills. Pulp rather than paper is shipped from our mills to processors in most of the great marketing areas of the world. While all of this is going on, our lesser primary industries are being squeezed, pushed and pulled so that they are fighting for their very existence.

Let me illustrate if I may. For years now, smaller forest industries, which are a significant factor in the economy of the north, have been operating on a day-to-day basis. They were unable to obtain any guarantee of an adequate supply of timber which naturally led to problems in financing, production and marketing. At the same time, many of our pulp and paper mills were given timber limits so large that they could not possibly exhaust their reserves for 100 years, assuming normal regeneration.

Faced with this dilemma, this government has, at least until now, been unable to provide any solution which would work to the benefit of all concerned. I have heard the hon.

Minister say that he now has a solution but so far we have no real indication that such is the case. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that now is the time for a full-scale review of timber limit grants in this province. It is shameful that much of our forest is wasted because it is within a private timber limit but outside the foreseeable harvesting area of the grant holder. In many cases, smaller operators are begging for the right to cut this very timber.

Mr. E. E. Grainger, vice-president of Abitibi Power and Paper Co., had something to say on this very subject at a recent forest forum on the progress of forestry in Ontario. Mr. Grainger estimated that only about 21 per cent of the department's calculated annual cut was being utilized. He indicated that in his opinion, we should be far more concerned with the reasons for our failure to utilize more of our forest resources than with slow regeneration in some of our cut overland.

At the same forum discussion, Mr. J. A. Brodie, a well-known official in this department, is quoted as saying:

We should be able to double the annual cut from our forests, provided, of course, that we can place the final product on the market at a competitive cost.

May I say, Mr. Chairman, that I agree with Mr. Brodie? Trees are a crop just as much as tobacco, beets and what have you. Trees, like farm crops, are of little or no use if not harvested before maturity. This is the great tragedy of your forest industries policy today.

By the same token, we in the north are witnessing another example of government indecision in the conflict of interest between our Indian population and our tourist outfitters. In the past two years I have mentioned some of the problems that exist and indicated the hardship that results when the interests of these two groups are at odds. I have indicated that decisions based on political expediency are the rule, not the exception. I think I can say that there were signs of hope in the administration of the former Minister of this department. The former Minister showed a sincere interest in the problems of our Indians. He was not one to trade on the political inexperience of these, our oldest citizens. We must, I suggest, take a new look at those areas where Indians and tourists outfitters are competing in the harvesting of our natural resources.

On the subject of our Indians I should like to say a few words. I recognize the fact that I have talked at great length on this subject in this House as did Albert Wren, my predecessor. I am not one who appreciates repetition, as is for example, my hon. friend from Woodbine. In this case, however, I feel that I must reiterate what has been said in the past.

We must recognize the fact that most of our Indian population in the north is living, at best, at a bare subsistence level. Moreover, we must recognize as a fact that this is a problem which should be of concern to our provincial government. We must not negate responsibility under the cloak of the separation of power found in The British North America Act. If our civil rights legislation is to mean anything we must start now to provide these wonderful people with the opportunities most of us take for granted.

I should like to draw the attention of this House to the refreshing, almost enlightening approach of the Manitoba government in the past decade. I doubt that many in this House, particularly in the Treasury benches, have heard of Mr. Jean H. Lagasse or of the Lagasse report. If such is the case, I would suggest with respect, as we say in the court-rooms, that this report should be on the reading list of almost all in the Cabinet who have a real interest in the welfare of our Indian population.

By way of information, I should like briefly to discuss this report and its ramifications. In 1956 the Manitoba Legislature passed a resolution requesting the government to consider the advisability of having a study of the difficult conditions under which the Indian and Métis population of that province was living. Acting on this suggestion, the Manitoba government appointed Mr. Jean H. Lagasse to conduct a study of the Indian and Métis population and to report on his findings. Mr. Lagasse was instructed to make every effort to determine if there might be any way to expedite the social and economic integration of these minority and underprivileged groups. Let me quote if I may from a short portion of chapter one of the report finally prepared by Mr. Lagasse:

On the one hand, there was pride in that these citizens belong to a people who had contributed greatly to the early development of the west. On the other hand there was regret, and perhaps guilt, because this population was now scattered in the most unproductive areas of the province, existing at best, in a condition of independence created by physical and cultural isolation, and at worst, in idleness, hunger and disease.

Those speeches also expressed the belief that, given an adequate programme of understanding and assistance, the people of Indian background could still recapture the spirit of initiative and courage which they displayed before the coming of the white man or, in the case of the Métis, before Manitoba joined Confederation.

Finally, frequent remarks were made throughout the debate [in the Manitoba House] requesting that this study be as exhaustive as possible in order that it become the basis for a sound and, if necessary, an elaborate programme of rehabilitation.

In the interests of brevity, which is perhaps not a recognized attribute in this House, I would say only that the two central themes of Mr. Lagasse's report were:

1. The Indians and Métis have a lower standard of living than that acceptable to the rest of the Canadian population; and
2. A new approach must be used to solve their problems, as past attempts to assist these people had not succeeded in reducing the number living in substandard conditions.

The report went on to make a number of constructive recommendations, some of which I would like to draw to the attention of this House. It recommended:

That the provincial government appoint an interdepartmental committee on Indian and Métis affairs headed by a full-time chairman.

It recommended:

That the provincial government provide vocational training facilities especially designed for those whose educational background is not sufficient to qualify them for apprenticeship training nor for acceptance at the Manitoba Technical Institute.

It is recommended that The Department of Industry and Commerce assist in increasing employment opportunities in Indian and Métis settlements by strongly promoting:

- (a) The development of light industries in or near Indian or Métis settlements.
- (b) The creation of new markets for local resources.
- (c) The expansion of business enterprises presently operating in or near Indian or Métis settlements.
- (d) The creation of Métis- and Indian-owned business operations especially where local natural resources were available.

Mr. Lagasse went on to suggest:

That the provincial government assist Indians and Metis to obtain employment by establishing a special service designed to:

- (a) Gather and maintain up-to-date information about job opportunities adapted to their skills.
- (b) Interpret to prospective employers the capacities of Indians and Métis for work.
- (c) Transmit information about job opportunities to unemployed Indians and Métis.
- (d) Assist, if necessary, in their transportation to the site of employment.

(e) In co-operation with The Department of Labour, The Department of Education and the Indian Affairs Branch, to provide a special training programme to equip Indians and Métis for full-time employment.

The report went on to recommend:

That the provincial government maintain an up-to-date record of the unemployed in Métis and Indian communities and of agricultural labour requirements with a view to securing maximum employment for that population.

It recommended:

That the provincial government establish a community development programme to help people of Indian ancestry solve their own problems.

That some of these recommendations have no application to Ontario, I concede. But what is important is that the then Manitoba government recognized and accepted a moral and social responsibility. It is time that we in this province did likewise. I suggest that we consider a similar inquiry in this province and a similar constructive approach.

We have, so far, in this province given little more than a token recognition of the urgency of this situation. Last year, for example, as a result perhaps of suggestions I made in this House, the hon. Minister advised that he had ordered the organization of a course for young Indians for a one-month period during the summer. It was the intention of the department, the hon. Minister said, to give these people training for future work in the department. We must recognize this as a step in the right direction as we must all concede that our Indian population is better qualified than others in many of the functions carried on by this department. I am sorry that I have heard no more of this venture and would be grateful if the hon. Minister could give me some report of the results as well as news of any similar projects he envisages in the future.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I should like to say something about conservation at this point, with specific reference to the conservation of our forest-based natural resources. I am cognizant of the fact that this is a field in which none of us sitting in this House is an expert, or perhaps even qualified to discuss. I acknowledge that even professional foresters are not in general agreement on reforestation or regeneration practices; and for that reason I will try not to indulge in the sweeping generalizations employed by the hon. members to my left.

But of one thing I am positively certain, Mr. Chairman. That is, that it is our duty to offer to our children the same opportunities that have been given to us. This, to me, is the true meaning of conservation. This entails a rational and reasonable use of those resources left to us, but which might not be available to our children if we do not use them wisely. So much now we are enjoying a prosperity for which our children will receive the bill. In good times, as I might call them, our province goes further and further into debt. I do not refer only to our financial position. I refer as well to the short-sighted exploitation of our forest products. Trees or forest products unwisely disposed of are as much a debt to our children as is our provincial debt.

Of this proposition there can be no argument, as most of us have seen the results of government weakness in the past.

I will briefly review, if I may, the history of reforestation and/or regeneration of the great woodlands of our province. In the early 1900s our provincial government became first aware of the developing desert of farmed out agricultural lands in southern Ontario. As a result, the government, as it then was, established a few tree nurseries and purchased a portion of these lands which were then replanted. Subsequently, the government made arrangements with municipal and county governments, who were to purchase and manage these areas so as to obviate any direct provincial participation in land reclamation schemes. This was the policy that basically prevailed, for a number of reasons, including the depression until the last decade.

In short, reforestation or regeneration efforts by the government were confined to privately owned, or municipally owned lands, in southern Ontario.

In the early 1950s this government recognized finally that direct government intervention was desperately needed. As a result, and with federal assistance, there was an increase in emphasis on a programme of regeneration in our usable forests. Legislation was then passed attempting to transfer basic responsibility for reforestation to those licensees actually cutting the wood. This programme, as we now know, basically proved a failure, as was evidenced by the passage of legislation in this House in 1962 which returned basic responsibility for reforestation back to the province. The fact remains, however, that generally, no real attempt was made until this decade to keep cutover areas in this province productive.

This, as I see it—recognizing of course, that I have of necessity greatly oversimplified past developments—is where the department now stands. One thing should be made clear, nevertheless. Mandatory reforestation is not in itself the answer to the general problem. Of my own knowledge, I am certain that artificial regeneration of our cutover forests in much of this province is unnecessary and wasteful. Many of these areas will naturally regenerate as quickly, or even more quickly, than they would with a compulsory reforestation programme. This is all the more true with the recent development of more efficient cutting practices, including strip cutting and scarification, as well as a number of other procedures which are in an experimental stage.

The fact remains, that in general, our paper industries are cutting and hauling in areas farther and farther from the mills—in some cases up to two or three hundred miles. This situation, if allowed to continue, would certainly mean the end of our pulp and paper mills in the north within a very few years. It has now become imperative that our government take a number of steps to alleviate and correct this situation. A few suggestions I have, are:

- (1) Fostering, encouraging and perhaps conducting a programme to remove scrub growth near paper mills and replanting the desired species of trees;

- (2) An even more energetic and enthusiastic effort to encourage private industry to carry out more extensive regeneration programmes;

- (3) A complete reappraisal of present government timber grants with emphasis on the better use of lands that will not be utilized by the licensees within the foreseeable future.

- (4) An increased effort to acquaint the public as well as industry with the problems that we have, and will result from continued exploitation of our forest resources, coupled with an expanded study of better cutting methods for all forest industries.

I should like to turn now to the actual operations of this department—or to put it another way—I propose to discuss what the government is doing rather than what it is not doing. In my very few years of public office I have noticed two basic defects in the fundamental management of The Department of Lands and Forests. To specifically ascribe these faults only to this one branch of the government would be unfair and misleading, as much of our governmental functions are beset with the same problems. I refer specifically to the increasing thinking that economy is not too serious an object in government thinking. We see more and more examples of penny-wise, pound-foolish management. We see more and more money being spent to build an image. It would seem to me that Mr. White's book on The Making of a President must be mandatory reading for all Cabinet Ministers. So much better could these monies be used in research projects, or even pay increases. It is shocking indeed to compare the salaries of men in public service with their equivalents in industry.

I do not hold our civil service responsible for this trend. It is only the end product of the natural evolution of a government that has been too long in power. Policy is nothing more than day-to-day decisions made as the problems arise. There is no real imagination, enthusiasm or dedication flowing down from top level.

In short, as I have said in the past, too often this department has been exploited as a political arm of government. For many years, as we all know, the pork barrel was an essential element in our political structure. Perhaps I am naive, but I felt, and still feel that the old practices are dying. Perhaps I am not too observant, but I was under the impression that when this department was administered by the former Minister there was virtually no playing dirty politics.

Whatever have been my impression then, it is somewhat different now. I know of numerous examples where the efficiency and integrity of this department were, and are, being sacrificed to gain a political end. I resent seeing the vast resources of government utilized so as to enrich a few political friends. I hate to see ordinary citizens denied privileges extended to a favoured few.

And what disturbs me, as well, Mr. Chairman, is the disservice that is being done to the civil servants working in the department. You do not enhance their prestige in the eyes of the public by using them as pawns in the game of political chess. You do not improve department morale and pride by negating the decisions and recommendations of your own experts, trained in the field.

Those are a few general remarks. I should like to, just in closing, comment very briefly on the problem that now exists with the cutting permits that are issued under the authority of The Crown Timber Act. I spoke on this last year, as did a number of hon. members, by reason of the problem that arose at Kapuskasing. I think the hon. Minister should now know the numerous abuses that are taking place under the guise of The Crown Timber Act and these cutting permits. We know of trading of permits, of boot-legging of permits and exploitation of workers. I suggest to the hon. Minister that unless a complete review of these cutting permits, and the cutting permit policy, is made within a very short period we are going to have another problem of the magnitude that we had in Kapuskasing.

Now in closing, I should like to say one thing: I think that any good department can outlast any bad Minister.

Mr. E. G. Freeman (Fort William): Mr. Chairman, in rising to speak in the debate on The Department of Lands and Forests, I would like to preface my remarks by some excerpts from a book that I have taken from the legislative library. I think some words may be of interest to some of the hon. members here. It reads:

In many parts of Canada the forests provide the principal means of livelihood. In all of Canada the forest is an important factor in industrial, commercial and business activities. No member of Canada's population may say that his life is not affected by the benefits that flow from this natural national resource. How important it is then that Canada and Canadians be conscious of their dependence upon the forests. How important it is that this consciousness be coupled with the conviction that this source of wealth must be maintained and developed to serve continuously the people of this and other lands. But conviction alone will not suffice. Convictions may be coupled with action and must be coupled with action if the desired result is to be obtained. Action must flow from the people through representatives to constituted authority and from authority back to the people through unit organization authorized to direct forest activities under a clearly expressed policy of forest administration.

None should be more concerned about this matter from the point of view of self-interest than those whose work is in the woods or in industry dependent for its raw material upon the forest. None have more at stake.

To speak with a loud voice without knowledge is to court ridicule. Consciousness of a need comes from observation and thought stimulated often by the thoughts of others. Conviction comes by knowledge of the facts. Action through self-interest will follow as the day the night when conviction has a factual foundation. The purpose that we should strive for is that of a wakening consciousness, marshalling facts and showing a way to action in the fundamental national problem of forest conservation and increased forest use.

I believe, in studying those words, Mr. Chairman, that they possess words of wisdom that we would all, as members of this Legislature, do well to give heed to.

I do not believe that I need say to those who have done any degree of thinking in this province over the past many years that the forest policy as adopted by previous administrations in Ontario has not by any means been sufficient to keep our forests in a decent state of production. Certainly they have done nothing whatever in a really effective way toward regenerative measures over a planned period of time.

I was rather interested, really, to hear the hon. member for Kenora mention in his opening remarks that he recognized the fact that the party of which he is a member was partly responsible for the condition our forests are in today. I believe in accepting that degree of responsibility that the hon. gentleman does himself a great deal of credit and his party a great deal of credit as well.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): He is a fine fellow. He speaks well of you, too.

Mr. Freeman: I think he likes me. I like you too, Vern. This will be a mutual admiration society very shortly.

However, this is an extremely serious matter, Mr. Chairman, and I think you will realize and recognize the fact that it may be necessary for me at this time in presenting the case for northwestern Ontario and the people who are interested in the forest work in our part of the province, to repeat excerpts from some statements that I have made in the recent past.

Because of the fact, in the first place, that these are basic statements, and then again, too, because I feel that they have a very great value as soundly thought-out and planned statements in regard to our part of the country, I think I might say, perhaps to those who are in the House at the present time, who may not have been exposed to this type of thinking recently, that the uncontrolled cutting of forests on a liquidation basis has characterized almost all logging operations in Ontario for more than 100 years. This, I think, we all recognize and realize.

This practice began in the southern part of the province and is being extended at an increasing rate into the boreal forests of northern Ontario. The consequences are manifest in the near-extinction of such valuable timbers as white pine, which is almost entirely gone now; in serious soil losses through erosion; in growing flood control and water pollution problems, and in the lowering of water tables.

This is felt by people who have given a great deal of time to the study of the forest situation as it exists—and most of our forests in this province at the present time exists west of Sudbury, Kapuskasing, North Bay and through that part of the country. Granted, there is a great deal of it which can be called virgin forest. It has never been exploited because of inaccessibility to a great extent and the fact, of course, that it is much, much too far from the mills for use on a basis that would make it possible for the mills to harvest that wood.

However, the day is coming undoubtedly when this wood is going to have to be harvested, because of the fact, principally, that regenerative activities have not been carried out, Mr. Chairman, and are not being carried out on a sound and planned basis in those areas which already have been cut over to a very great extent. The extremely bad feature of this cutting which has been done over the past many years is that it has been what is called a clean cut, that is everything within a certain area has been taken down, destroyed. In many cases this wood that was required by the ultimate purchasers was interspersed very heavily with woods which were not wanted by prospective purchasers.

The result of that was that many, at that time unwanted trees, were destroyed in the process of harvesting a 35 per cent, 40 per cent or 50 per cent harvest of the desired woods. I will leave it to your imaginations to understand just how long this type of condition can proceed, just how long it can continue.

At the present rate of consumption of our wood industries, our pulp and paper mills, our veneer mills, our log industries and so on, we are harvesting considerably more wood than is being regenerated each year. If the figures were presented to you as they have been by foresters trained in this work to those people who are interested in our part of the province, I think they would astound you and they would appal you.

I am sure the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests will agree with me—he has been over a great deal of this country in the past short period of time—that to a very great extent this type of forestation has not been regarded with too careful or cautious an eye by the authorities. The result of it is that much more wood has been destroyed than has actually been harvested for profitable operation.

If this continues, it will be only a short period of time until northwestern Ontario is going to be in the position that eastern Ontario and southern Ontario are in today with regard to forest growth and soil erosion and water depletion. We are approaching that situation to some extent at the present time. I would warn this government, and I am sure that it realizes it, too, that it is its duty to take immediate steps, practical steps, long-range steps, planned over a long period of time, if necessary—and when I speak of that long period of time, I mean in effect from 20 to 40 years. Trees do not grow overnight and if we hope in this part of Canada to produce a desired type of wood culture, that wood culture is going to have to be realistically planned to produce the wanted type of forest growth.

I outlined very briefly in the House not too long ago, a suggested plan, and it has been given the unqualified approval of many of the senior employees of The Department of Lands and Forests as a practical step in the right direction with regard to safeguarding the forests we have at the present time and improving and regenerating the forest areas which need that type of attention.

I would like to repeat it. I have added some additional information that I have received within the last few days from these people. I would like to say to you, starting with these words, that to a very large extent the economic well-being of the lakehead area in Ontario is dependent on the forest-based industries. This includes among others, pulp and paper mills, sawmills, veneer mills, wood processing plants and numerous independent woodworking contractors and wood-producing contractors, large and small.

In connection with this, I would like to call to the hon. Minister's attention the fact that we are beginning to see again a situation which faced us some years ago in connection with subcontractors. They are ambitious types undoubtedly, and are now approaching the permittee type of timber operator. With a contract from one of the timber companies they are going to the small wood producer who is in a position to produce, let us say, 100 cords from his farm lot. They say to him that they are offering $17 a cord today. They have the contract, and the small permittee has little or no opportunity to sell this wood to the paper mills or to the users of the raw material.

The subcontractors have this contract to get, say, 20,000 or 25,000 or 30,000 cords. They name their own price, and the farm-lot operator takes it or leaves it. With the condition of most of those farmers in today's picture, with the very little agricultural production from their land, they are in a position where they have to take it. There is no other alternative. I suggest that this condition should be corrected—

An hon. member: Or lump it.

Mr. Freeman: Or "lump" it is an excellent word. That is precisely what they do, they lump it in most cases. Their life is not one of ease, believe me; they work hard to get that $17 or so a cord. Then they have cutting costs to take out of that.

The group I speak for in northwestern Ontario feels that the government should immediately initiate policies directly toward these objectives: The production of maximum yields of high-quality fibre from all accessible forest soils, both freehold and publicly owned. We would say it is contrary to both provincial and national long-term interests to permit in aggregate, extensive areas in an idle, unproductive condition. We say that ownership should not confer this right and it must be recognized that a sound forest policy will necessitate some encroachment upon property rights as currently constituted. Again the restoration to productivity of all idle private, municipal and Crown lands by a large-scale reforestation programme, particularly within areas accessible to existing mills. We feel the government should review the present timber licences to free these limits held in excess of present and contemplated mill capacity; thereby making limits available for further development of secondary industries or the use by secondary and ancillary industry of species and log types not used by the present holders of limit licences.

Now by this, Mr. Chairman, we do not mean that we feel that any limitation should be placed upon the reasonable requirements of those industries which are presently established in the raw material areas. We feel certainly that these industries create employment for the economic welfare of the area and of the province; these mills should have all the raw material that they can use over a reasonable period of time. But we feel that we have a perfect right to insist that a review be made, a very thoroughgoing review, and that in cases where timber companies hold large properties awaiting development if, and when they see fit, that this matter should receive the attention of the government, and that redress should be done if it is necessary. I believe in many cases it will be found by this department, and by the hon. Minister in charge, to be necessary.

In relation to the requirement that a holder of a timber licence must build a basic road structure, without which it is impossible to implement a modern forest management plan with sustained yield cutting, we feel the government should share the cost of building such a structure, on an agreed basis, through financial arrangements that would make it possible for the work to be paid for within a reasonable period of time through the use which the road would give to more accessible lands and to more forest products. These forest products could be brought out in larger amounts, greater quantities from these more accessible areas and would be of the type of wood that the companies need and require to produce a certain quality or type of paper.

I have mentioned in the House before that at the Lakehead at the present time we have—and The Department of Education of this province is to be congratulated—within the Lakehead College laboratory facilities which are presently not being utilized to the extent to which they could be used. There has been established at the Lakehead College a small class in forestry. We who have studied this problem to some extent believe that if these interested forest students, and students who are interested in chemistry, could be given an opportunity and access to the laboratory facilities to experiment with various undesired wood types at the present time, that it is altogether reasonable and possible that some preliminary success might attend their efforts. And if this did come about, and the facilities at the Lakehead were not sufficient to go further with the chemical experimentations, then I am sure that many of the large companies who are well equipped and well qualified to carry on this laboratory work would be very glad to do so.

I believe that it is altogether possible—many people agree with me—that within a very short period of time, a matter of a few years, ways and means would be found for the use of many of the so-called “junk” forest species at the present time. These species are not being used. They are being cut down or destroyed.

In many instances where we have had limits which are being held over long periods of time, we know from those who have walked short distances through the various forest areas that a very great number of fine trees have become over-mature and they have rotted or fallen. We have lost the opportunity to make use of this wood. This has all been in line with this same system of unrestricted cutting, just going in and making a clean cut without thought of what is going to happen in a few years. Again, if the clean cut were made, which might be good tree farming, if the clean cut were made and then proper regenerative measures were used to rebuild that forest as it should be, it would then have some degree of merit.

But to destroy the forest without making any effort to bring a programme into existence that would bring about the regeneration of that area over a reasonable period of time, is nothing short of criminal.

We do not, however, contend that the rehabilitation of forest lands adjacent to the Lakehead will cure all the ills of the area. We know perfectly well they will not. There is much more that must be done up there to improve the forest situation, the agricultural situation and the secondary industry situation. But it is only just recently—within the last few years—that any secondary industry people had a desire to get into the Lakehead area and get raw materials from the production of forest growth. They had very little or no hope of gaining or getting a sufficient guarantee of forest resources to carry on their work over a reasonable period of time.

There has been a little bit of improvement in this situation. I believe, too, the present hon. Minister of Lands and Forests has had his hand in this and that he has assisted these proposed secondary industries to gain at least some opportunity for access to resources. This is a step in the right direction and I think could be carried very much further by The Department of Lands and Forests. We hope and pray that it will.

There are some areas, too, Mr. Chairman, that I would like to take a brief moment or two to discuss, through you, with the hon. Minister. The hon. Minister will agree, and I am sure most of the hon. members know, that in the not-too-distant period of time—in the last 15 years or so—we have had established in the Thunder Bay district forest villages or forest towns, actually. They are very nice forest towns such as Terrace Bay, Marathon and Long Lac, which is a timber town. Marathon and Terrace Bay are paper towns concerned basically with paper production. The opening up of mining areas, such as Manitouwadge and others which have opened in the not-too-distant past, are bringing more wealth to the province and to the people in that area. But there is still much opportunity for the establishment of so-called forest villages or forest towns. I call the attention of the hon. members particularly to the Ogoki section north of the Nipigon watershed, most of which is virgin territory. It will undoubtedly bring much more wealth to the province in the very near future if work is done and attention is given to it.

There was another matter I am sure that the hon. Minister is interested in, Mr. Chairman. That is the feeling of the hunters who live in northwestern Ontario. In fact, I believe representations have been made to the department that certain species of game are in a sad state of depletion. I am not referring, Mr. Chairman, to moose or deer. My own observations, and information that I have received from conservation officers, and whose word I am quite willing to accept, leads me to believe that the moose and deer population is at an excellent level.

But certain bird life and that sort of thing is in a very sad state of depletion. I do not know, Mr. Chairman, whether the hon. Minister has had it recommended to him in the recent past that restrictions should be placed on the hunting of certain types of bird life in that part of Ontario or not. If representations have not been made to the hon. Minister, I would feel that I am instructed by the people interested at the Lakehead in suggesting this course to him, because this is undoubtedly of very serious concern to many of the people who are members of various sports clubs in the Lakehead area. I am sure that a very close look by conservation officers might result in some information to the hon. Minister that might cause him to take some action in this respect.

Now I know that the hon. member for Kenora covered some territory in his remarks, which is exactly what I would have to say about our part of the country. Therefore, it need not be repeated. I would suggest to the hon. members that as the hon. Minister stated in his opening remarks, that those of you who have not visited northwestern Ontario and seen its potential are missing something. The hon. members owe it to themselves, they owe it to the province. I think that if they visited that part of the country they would enjoy themselves enormously. I would guarantee them six fish, say, if I had to catch them by hand. I am sure the hon. members would have no difficulty in landing fish up there; we even have fish for people like the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Troy).

There is another matter, Mr. Chairman, that I would like to bring to the attention of the House at this time. I do not know exactly how far this matter has gone; I do not have too much knowledge about it because it is only within the last few days that I have been on the telephone with various people in Fort William and Port Arthur with regard to this matter. The hon. Minister might give this House any information on this matter. It may even have something to do with the hon. Minister of Tourism and Information (Mr. Auld) in some way, perhaps a very important way. It may also have something to do, and I am sure it will have something to do, with the hon. Minister of Highways (Mr. MacNaughton), but under the circumstances, I think it particularly affects The Department of Lands and Forests at this time.

I am referring to some acreage along the Pigeon river in the borderline section between northwestern Ontario and the United States where a new bridge was just recently opened. I believe the old bridge is closed to traffic and the new bridge is now in operation. Along this on the Canadian side of this international bridge, there is a block of land comprising, I believe, some 2,600 acres more or less.

As I understand it, this land is presently owned by a Mr. Lloyd Johnson, who is a lawyer in Duluth, Minnesota. Mr. Johnson has owned this land for quite some time. He has attempted, to my knowledge, over the past several years, to develop it as summer home sites along the various lakeshore bays and so on. He has had only moderate success with that because of the distance that this land is from a heavily populated centre. I think it is interesting. It brings back the days of carpetbagging in the United States after the Civil War when, as we read, they went down to the southern States and took advantage of—

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Like the book.

Mr. Freeman: The book was an aftermath of the actual fact. The Carpetbaggers was actually based on that. If you read the book it will probably give you some idea of what the present situation is. Mr. Johnson some years ago bought the approximately 2,600 acres of land, I believe, from the province of Ontario, naturally, for the sum of $15,000. I think the pencil will show you that is slightly under $6 an acre. I am told, and I am told on very good authority—I hope it is not right, I hope it is an untruth and improper information—that negotiations are presently in effect with Mr. Johnson, represented by Mr. J. C. Robinette, a lawyer of the city of Toronto. He is now quite willing to part with this very valuable land to the province of Ontario for the sum of $5 million—just around $2,000 an acre.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Not bad for ten years.

Mr. Freeman: That is carpetbagging at its best, I think. I am sure, however, that neither the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests, nor any other hon. Minister of this government, would permit himself to be bilked in this fashion.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Well, just let me on that point—

Mr. Freeman: I would like to hear the hon. Minister.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I understand that there are some expropriation proceedings now being undertaken by Public Works and I imagine it is for the same land my hon. friend refers to. It would be done in that way if it is done at all. Actually I have nothing to do with it at all.

Mr. Freeman: Thank you, Mr. Minister. I am somewhat reassured that the negotiations have not gone to the extent where any serious consideration is being given to an extortionate price of this kind. I would sincerely hope that if the land is purchased by the government of the province of Ontario that a fair and just price be given to the American owner of the land, if the land is valuable to the province of Ontario and to the departments within the province of Ontario. I assure the hon. Minister or the hon. Ministers concerned with this expropriation or with this proposed land purchase, that if any large price is paid for it there will be loud screams of anguish from everybody in northwestern Ontario.

I would like to say, too, to the hon. Minister, through you, Mr. Chairman, that we appreciate the fact that The Department of Lands and Forests has taken steps in recent years—the last two or three years, in fact, I believe—to open up more park areas and recreation areas in our part of the country. I believe that this will be money well invested and that more areas and more parks should be opened as soon as possible by the department in desirable locations. I believe the money expended by the government in this type of work will come back tenfold in a very short period of time.

I would ask the hon. Minister that thought be given to this problem of forest regeneration. I am sure he will agree this is a tremendously serious problem, not only to us in our part of the province, but to all of the people in this province. If an imaginative programme is not undertaken in the very near future, I would feel that this government is repeating the performance of its predecessors of the different parties in letting one of our greatest, perhaps the greatest, natural resource get away from us to the point where it will be almost impossible for us to support the mills which we presently have in our part of the province and to support the economy which we have in our part of the province.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Mr. Chairman, I might direct my remarks for a few moments to some of the comments of the two hon. gentlemen who have just spoken and who are speaking for their parties and who are all interested in the development of the north. I would like to say, as I said at the beginning in my own remarks, that I felt that a lot of the criticism was due to misinformation. I am much fortified in that in listening to my hon. friend here who just sat down. I want to make it clear first of all that of course the very principles which he is advocating are sound and proper, but the fact of the matter is it is exactly, in many respects at any rate, what is actually going on. I want to take this opportunity to clear this up for the benefit not only of the hon. members of this House but also for many people in this province who have not already understood the situation.

Back in 1943, this was a serious situation. The previous administration had gone through a period of difficult times earlier in its regime. There had been bankruptcies in the pulp and paper industry and some of the biggest companies today were in bankruptcy at that time, in the 1930s. There had been, over the years—with that largesse that people thought about our forests in those days and the idea that they were limitless and all that sort of thing—a lot of things done in those days that looking at it now, did not amount to good management or management at all.

But in 1943, with all of this problem in front of the government of the day, and after a review, many of the contracts that were in existence and agreements that were in existence at that time were cancelled by order-in-council. I have a list of them here. Some seven or eight contracts covering many thousands of square miles were cancelled. The hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Oliver) knows that there was a very important inquiry set up under General Kennedy, a very painstaking investigation conducted and certain recommendations made. I have the report on my desk here. It is amazing how many sections of that report have actually gone into operation, although not everything was accepted by the government.

Down through those years, since about the early 1950s, there has been a tremendous change and I think everybody in this House should realize it. Just to illustrate it, and also perhaps to understand things a little better myself, I asked for some of these management contracts. There are Crown management contracts to the number of some 77 and there are some 80 or thereabouts company management contracts which have the approval of the Crown. The two together add up to something like 150 contracts. I have one in my hand here and I am going to take three or four of them one by one, to give the House an idea of just what has been done and what is going on.

I want to say, sir, that some 182,000 square miles of economically possible areas for the use of timber are covered by these 150 contracts. I think I can say, and the timber branch manager's report is right in front of me here, I think I can say without fear of contradiction that practically all of the economically useable area at this time is under this type of management. I think that is something that we ought to get into our heads in this House. The terms that are contained in here are no secret. If my hon. friend wants to come and look at some of these some time, I have got 150 of them that I brought up to the office here in the last week or so and I intend to look at every one of them myself, in detail.

But I think I can say now—and I expect I shall be able to say when I have gone through them—that perhaps there are a few things here and there we should do but I think I can say now that if we were to carry out the intention and the terms and the instructions and the technical knowledge contained in these documents, that we would meet everything that my hon. friends have said here in relation to good forest management.

Mr. MacDonald: That is a big if.

Mr. Freeman: If they are carried out!

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I have here, for example, the interim management and operating plan for Northern Light Lake management unit for the period 1961-1965. This is the preliminary one, and the rewriting of it is to take place in the next year or two for a longer period of time. That is right out in the Port Arthur area. I have here initial management plans for the Black Lake management unit, which is down around Nipigon in the area of the hon. Minister of Mines (Mr. Wardrope). I have here the management plan for the Ontario limits and freehold of Spruce Falls Power and Paper Company Limited woodlands, revised in April 1959 and again, in the course of the next short while, under revision.

We have, Mr. Chairman, over 200 foresters, qualified degree foresters, who are working on these contracts day in and day out as their whole occupation. A number of them are here at Downsview, and in every one of the 22 districts there are a certain number of them assigned to nothing else but this sort of work.

Mr. Freeman: I wonder if I could ask the hon. Minister a question?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Yes, of course.

Mr. Freeman: You mentioned Northern Light Lake. I have been over that area very thoroughly, over a great deal of the lake, and as you probably know it is a very large lake. Part of it is on the American shore in the United States and part of it is in Canada. The Department of Highways put the highway in for you last year, along Northern Light Lake, they finished it last fall.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Into Northern Light Lake?

Mr. Freeman: Into Northern Light Lake—an excellent spot for boat ramps, by the way, because the shoreline lends itself to boat ramps for that type of sport fishing. But does the hon. Minister realize how many American people come up the Gun Flint Trail and go into Northern Light Lake on the American side, although the resorts in some cases are occupied by Canadian operators? Many of those Americans come in there, and when they come over towards the Canadian side, they have their motor boats and their fish boats and so on and all their equipment, and they spend days on the Canadian side, but they do not use anything that is made in Canada.

Mr. Troy: Do they bring all their gas?

Mr. Freeman: They bring all their gas, bring their Coca Cola and Pepsi Cola and Seven Up and all the rest of it. They even bring their eggs and butter and bread. I doubt if they bring any whiskey, because I think most of them are too careful to buy any. They drink any given amount.

But this situation, I think, Mr. Chairman, is something that exists not only on this lake but on several other lakes in that area. Looking at a map of that part of Ontario I think that it is actually illusory, because the maps, regardless of the care that the people in The Department of Lands and Forests pay to drawing these various maps, leave many hundreds of lakes out of the drawing. Through Northern Light Lake, for instance, you can get into a vast area in northwestern Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I am glad to have that interjection, but perhaps that is just one of the tourist problems. It is the exception rather than the rule, because I imagine the American tourist by and large is a pretty useful thing to our economy both in northwestern Ontario and here.

I have also in my hand another one of these contracts, The Great Lakes Paper Company Limited forest management plan and operating plan. This is one that the company itself prepared and our people go over it and approve of it and check it to make sure it is being followed. This happens to be the Black Sturgeon limit. It is a big limit, over 1,000 square miles.

Again another one here, the English River limit of the Great Lakes paper. I could go on. I did produce, as I say, 150 of these documents for the visual observation of the House. I will just produce two more. One is a management plan covering timber licences set out here of Hay and Company Limited in the district of Algoma. This happens to be a different type. This has to do with a company engaged in the veneer business and that sort of thing.

Again, we have tried to get in all of these contracts and all of these management documents, all of these elements that go for good management. I feel that by and large what I said earlier will stand the test. When I was making my original statement, I made some fairly, if you analyze them, some fairly strong statements of our resources and what we are doing. I think it can stand the test of inquiry.

Of course it has to stand the test of inquiry, that is what the hon. gentlemen opposite are there for, to do it. I do not, in saying this, want to say that I think everything is perfection by any means. I agree with the hon. member for Fort William that the point he raised about greater uses is important. We ourselves are doing research on that. The companies are doing research and there are many possibilities.

Just one thing comes to my mind at the moment and that is that at this very time there is some very serious investigation going on into the use of pipelines, pipelines for the transmitting for miles of wood products right to the mill from the tree, with chips perhaps, actually being treated by chemicals as they come through the pipe and perhaps arriving at their destination partly, if not completely, mixed and matured for whatever purpose they want them. All these sort of things are going on.

We have an intelligent wood industry and we have, I think I can say, very intelligent Lands and Forests personnel in this field.

I might just say one other thing, about the progress which is being indicated and which I announced in part here in the House and which has been announced from time to time in the press by the companies concerned—for example, the Domtar Newsprint Limited at Red Rock, the Spruce Falls Power and Paper Company at Kapuskasing, the Abitibi Power and Paper Company at Smooth Rock Falls; the plywood and veneer industry in several places; sawmill industries in such places as Whitman Lumber Company Mill near North Bay, Levesque Mill at Hearst, Boreal Timber Limited mill at Port Arthur, Chapleau Lumber Company at Chapleau, Missinabie Mill near Chapleau.

There is a trend toward building modern and more efficient mills to replace old mills in all these places and really great progress. The Great Lakes Paper Company has perhaps the largest project in the $31 million, 200,000-ton per year pulp and paper mill addition which they are putting in.

Now, what this adds up to, I think, as shown by the survey, is that there are at present 12 large pulp and paper companies in Ontario with 17 mills scattered across Ontario and with about 50 per cent, I think, of production coming from northwestern Ontario and the other half coming from the rest of Ontario. The licences they hold are constantly under review. In this last year one or two have been completed. This coming year there are others coming up.

We are putting into these licences what we think is the best thinking at the moment; but above everything else, there is in the statute itself, the power which was put in when that report I mentioned came down, and in the legislation that followed it there was written in the right of the Minister to come in in any instance, no matter what, if there are good grounds for it, in changing any terms in regard to actual needs and agreements.

That is an extremely important thing. What we find in practice is that, by negotiation, by discussion and where the secondary industry type of the logging industry wants certain areas to work over in the licences that are mainly used for pulp and paper, we negotiate. We ask them to negotiate with each other. We ask them to enter into third party agreements. We put pressure, where necessary, to see that those third party agreements are fair.

In a very few cases where there is no production—the hon. member for York South I think, Mr. Chairman, said something in the Economics estimates about a case where they are not actually in production. If he wants to raise it again, I will discuss it. But he chose to raise it with the hon. Minister of Economics and Development (Mr. Randall). But in that type of situation we have separate agreements, and where we consider it advisable we make the agreements directly with the parties operating in the area. In other words, we do distinguish between non-operating, non-producing mill type of pulp and paper industry and the type that is hopeful, or that has gained certain production rights, made certain deposits and certain plans which they have to enter into production within a reasonable time.

With that background and with the great advance in the pulp and paper industry, and with a very considerable advance in the new type of mills in the other industry, in the logging industry in the very competitive world market, we all have to be on our toes. This department will do its best, I can assure hon. members, to help in any way to make the best use of our timber. But I do not want to sit down or leave this particular part of this discussion without saying that we are a most favoured province in many ways. We have adequate resources to take care of anything that is foreseeable at the moment in the way of expansion because of the fact that we have not got the markets at present. That may be because we are young. We have a small population area.

We have a lot of future ahead of us, whereas other parts of the world are in quite a different position. If we were in the same position, population-wise and development-wise as some other parts of the world, we might have to be doing a lot different from what we are doing here. I do not for a moment say that certain types of management in certain other areas of the world may not be better, but they are not suited necessarily to our broad conditions as they exist at the present time.

I say to you, sir, and I say it to the hon. members of this House, that we have undertaken since this Kennedy report, a step-by-step plan to increase the reforestation and to increase the number of trees although actually, about 65 per cent of any reforestation is done naturally. It is nature that looks after 65 per cent of it. We do not have to do 100 per cent, or anything like 100 per cent.

But we are with our tree planting, with our nurseries. We are up this year, I think, to something like 43 million trees. Forty-three million trees are being planted.

We can say with confidence that within approximately 12 years from now, on the basis of the continued planning as indicated by these management contracts, that we will be providing 100 per cent replacement on the 400,000 acres or thereabouts that are being cut over each year. One hundred per cent.

In the meantime, at the present time we are probably between 85 per cent and 90 per cent as a result of what is going on. Also in the meantime, what is actually being cut is only half the allowable cut. So from a practical standpoint, we are certainly not behind the eight-ball at all. It would be rather foolish to spend money unnecessarily if you can reach the same end result by a process such as I have mentioned.

It is not too easy to get millions and millions of trees overnight, but to the extent that our nurseries are capable of production, the cones that we get and make use of, and all that sort of thing, we are moving right along. Within the next few years we will have reached the point where we can see definite replacement, along with natural growth, of 100 per cent, accounted for. I think that is good, sound policy under the present circumstance.

There were one or two other questions raised. I may answer them more in detail. I am sure, as we go along with the votes some of these points will come back again in detail in respect to particular points.

Mr. Gibson: Mr. Chairman, I am not sure that I am in order here or not. During the hon. Minister's introductory remarks he made specific reference to an advisory committee on Indians. Does that come under main office? I cannot find it anywhere else, and there is an advisory committee referred to.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: No, I think it is one of these voluntary setups. It is not provided for by statute or anything of that sort.

Mr. Gibson: When can I discuss it?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: The hon. member is speaking of the Indian Advisory Committee?

Mr. Gibson: No, I am speaking of the advisory committee on Indians, using the hon. Minister's own words.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Yes. That has just recently been set up.

Mr. Gibson: What I would like to know, Mr. Chairman, is, who is on this committee?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Who is on it?

Mr. Gibson: Yes, who is on it? Where do these people come from, and what are their functions?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I will be glad to inform the House of the names of the personnel on the committee. It is made up of the following: Mr. John Yesno, Central Patricia; Mr. Gus Debassige, Manitoulin Island; Mrs. Flora Tobobundung, Parry Island; Mrs. Elliot Moses, Brantford; Mr. Lawrence Chuchoo, Moosonee; Mr. Fred Green, Kenora—I imagine the hon. member for Kenora knows Mr. Green, he is one of the very respected chiefs out there; Mr. R. M. Hill, Tyendinegan Reserve; and sitting as an observer helping us, Mr. George Armstrong, captain of the Maple Leafs hockey team who is known as Chief Armstrong.

Mr. Gibson: May I ask the hon. Minister how often this committee gets together? Secondly, is there any possibility of getting a person on this committee with no political stripe from the area north of Red Lake?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I would be glad if the hon. member has a suggestion, for him to let me have it. I will be glad to consider it.

Mr. Gibson: Mr. Chairman, just one other question. How often do these people get together to advise you?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: They were just really organized within the last six weeks or so. I think they have had three meetings. One of them, I know, was out in Kenora.

Mr. Troy: To continue that. What is an Indian under this committee?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I am not trying to distinguish. The point that I am trying to make to this committee is that I am going to, I hope, have the thinking of the people who are living the lives of the Indians, and who understand the Indian population. And not what, in the past, may have been a paternal kind of an attitude for them.

Mr. Troy: Does the hon. Minister consider a half-breed who lives, say in the city of Toronto, lives the life of an Indian?

Mr. MacDonald: On the basis of conduct, we have got one in this House.

Mr. Chairman: Order.

Mr. Troy: Has the hon. Minister got a liaison man in his department?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Oh, yes. Yes, we have several liaison people in the department. If you want to know the actual responsibility in this field, the assistant deputy, Mr. Bayly, is in charge of the general responsibility. Under him Mr. Ormand and Mr. Cam Currie is very well known to the Indians and speaks the Indian language, or at least some of it, and we have Mr. Don Selby who is from one of the bands up at Lake Simcoe.

Mr. Troy: Does this committee also have a liaison with the committee that is already set up by The Department of Public Welfare?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Oh, yes. As a matter of fact I have here a 20-page document which I am sure my hon. friend does not want me to read, outlining the work done by the various departments of the government in relation to matters pertaining to the Indians.

Mr. Troy: Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Well, I mean, if Mr. Chairman would permit it, I would be glad to put it on the record for the purpose of getting it into Hansard, but I do not want to read it.

Mr. Chairman: May we take it as read?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Well, if the House is willing and I may table this, I would be glad to do it.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Dovercourt): Mr. Chairman, on this question of an Indian advisory council, I am wondering about the terms of reference. When I was with a federal department, and on various committees I could see that if there were not clear-cut terms of reference, sometimes these could have become really a showcase. I was wondering if the hon. Minister could give us the terms of reference.

I also notice in the remarks of my hon. colleague where he referred to the approach of the Manitoba government to Indians and Métis in connection with the report by Jean Lagasse. Again, when you move on into Saskatchewan—and this takes us back a number of years—you see approaches it has worked out in order to encourage co-ops and so on.

I think if one looks at the north with the federal government, one looks at the work that is done with Eskimos and the encouragement for local industry in the Arctic. I ask, sir, with respect to the advisory council, is it going to be an economic advisory council or just on a broad general basis about cultural life?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I think I should point out this is something really to assist the Minister of Lands and Forests. It is not outside The Department of Lands and Forests but we have a lot of opportunities to develop, I think, within the department, useful qualities to provide work for the Indians. I think that they themselves should be able to tell us the most practical way of doing this, more so than we could get from other sources. That was the thinking behind it, and they operate now as a committee, and they tell us from time to time what they think.

Mr. Thompson: If I could pin this down, sir, your committee is really to advise you in your role as the Minister of Lands and Forests and the effects that your decisions as a Minister would have on the Indians?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I would say it is within the department at the moment in that way because I have no authority to go outside the department. But we may find that some of the suggestions may be very useful, and other branches and other departments might be interested in some of the suggestions.

Mr. Thompson: Then, sir, for example, the suggestion made by my hon. friend about the study by Mr. Lagasse—I do not know if the hon. Minister has a copy of his speech—I was wondering if any of the points are pertinent to your advisory council?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: We are going to have a look at anything he has suggested.

Mr. Thompson: I beg the hon. Minister's pardon?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: We will have a look at anything Mr. Lagasse has suggested. Mr.

Bayly is in the wings and I am sure he has made a note of it already.

Mr. E. Sargent (Grey North): May I ask the hon. Minister the policy insofar as closed seasons are concerned, particularly the sudden decision to have a closed season, April 22 to May 15, in the Point au Baril and Parry Sound areas? This sudden decision has left approximately 50 fishermen at odds to know what to do with their investment, costing several thousand dollars. They have lost revenue, not to mention employment. At a meeting of the Parry Sound District Fishermen's Association, well attended by Department of Lands and Forests representatives, it was stated by Mr. Carmen Douglas of The Department of Lands and Forests that there would be no closed season this year. I would like to ask the hon. Minister his policy in this regard.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: It is closed at the moment and there is a special meeting to be held with the fishermen's association, which is coming in here next week to discuss this problem with us. But at the moment, until May 15 the season is closed.

Mr. Sargent: To pursue—

Hon. Mr. Roberts: That is done by a Minister's order actually, that closing.

Mr. Sargent: I would like to ask the hon. Minister the power that a conservation officer has. Is it a fact that he can arrest, seize, break into any building including a home, and all he needs to have is a suspicion that an offence has been committed, a power which was given to him and far surpasses that of a police officer under the Criminal Code and surely does not give a person the protection of the Bill of Rights? I would like to ask the hon. Minister his views of these powers.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: My hon. friend can read the Act as well as I can. The Act set out what the powers are and I suggest that he read it. If he does not like it, he can bring in an amendment, but at the moment, that is the statute and that is what we are operating under.

Mr. Sargent: In this regard I would like to cite a very glaring piece of business that is going on in the department—

Mr. Chairman: I believe the member is out of order. We are still on vote 1101.

Mr. Sargent: What does this come under, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Chairman: Vote 1102.

Mr. MacDonald: If he wants to complete this—

Mr. Chairman: He is on fish and wildlife.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, the point I have to raise is a policy issue. I do not think it fits in with any other department, at least I am not aware if it does and therefore I would like to raise it at this stage.

Back on the estimates of the hon. Minister of Tourism and Information, I raised this issue and the new hon. Attorney General intervened because it affects his bailiwick. At that time I asked him to communicate with the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests so he might be in a position to give us some comment. I am referring to the considerable public discussion that has arisen in the area north of Sault Ste. Marie with regard to the size of the tracts of land that have been given to the Algoma Central Railroad.

Mr. Chairman, I want to throw this issue into the context that I think should capture our attention—that is the government has for about a year and a half been drifting with this issue. I have here a copy of a set of minutes of a breakfast meeting that was held with the hon. Minister and others of The Department of Lands and Forests at the Royal Edward Hotel in Fort William, Wednesday, November 28, 1962. Representing the department was a number of well-known departmental officials and representing the NOTO was a group of people.

The minutes spell out the whole background of this issue in pretty militant terms. For example, their descriptions of the permits and the licensing by the Algoma Central Railroad are as follows:

The ACR owned all the land by grant early in this century except the pine thereon. They have set up a land-use permit and in 1962 levied a charge for these permits. They do not own the game and fish but the permits are being levied for permission to pass over their land.

The department has discontinued stocking any waters in this vast area but this does not hurt the ACR, it only affects the operations conducted by licensed camp owners in the area. It is felt that the department will not stand for any attempt by this railway company to issue hunting licences. The ACR has made several attempts to implement the issuing of hunting licences but it appears this will not be allowed.

A little later on they say:

This entire territory was given to the Algoma Central Railroad by grant in 1900 at the rate of 1,700 acres per mile of track built, which was originally supposed to go to Hudson Bay.

That would give them a fair tract of territory, I would suggest.

One million acres of this land was returned to the Crown in 1941 and the rest of the grant is at the rate of $1 per year.

Then there is one rather interesting paragraph here that shows the mood of the meeting. It says:

The Minister is sure alive to this situation and will contact this company in the near future as the government is opposed to anyone having exclusive use of any large tract of land. There will be a meeting in January called by the Algoma Central Railroad and the department will attend, as well as most affected licence operators. It is assumed that the NOTO will be represented.

I am informed that this meeting was never called. Fifteen months have gone by and nothing more has been done on the issue other than—

Hon. Mr. Roberts: The hon. member should not say what he was informed, because he was misinformed. If the hon. member asks a question, I will answer it, but when he starts on a preliminary of what he was informed about, he was misinformed. If the hon. member wants the answer to what has happened, I will give it to him. I presume that is what the hon. member wants.

Mr. MacDonald: Very good.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: This particular situation has been one of some considerable difficulty. There have been several meetings and this matter has been under careful study and I will very briefly state the position as I see it at this moment.

The Algoma Central Railway was granted 1.7 million acres by the Crown in the latter part of the 19th century as part inducement to build a railway to serve Sault Ste. Marie, and it was given with exemption from taxation. In 1925, The Provincial Land Tax Act was enacted. By 1940, the Algoma Central Railway owed the government $2.25 million for taxes, partly on the land and partly other types of taxes. There was an agreement made on March 18, 1940, ratified by the Legislature —those were the days of the former Liberal administration. Obligations were wiped out and about one half of the lands were re-conveyed to the Crown. Further tax exemption was given to the Algoma Central Railway in 1941.

In 1962, the company began the permit system for fishing and hunting on its lands. They started to charge $3.25 per licence. Objections were received. The company issued 5,000 permits in 1963, which would be roughly about $16,000. We have been endeavouring to get the company to withdraw from this field, but have not been successful. It has asked $100,000 annually for a five-year period during which it wants to review the value of the lands in the event of them being taken over by the government.

This, in my view, as far as the $100,000 annually is concerned, is completely unreasonable. Acquisition of these lands at a fair figure for the province is under consideration, as is also the advisability of removing this exemption from taxation. Whatever the situation may have been in 1940 it is difficult for me—and I think for my hon. colleagues also—in 1964 to see any justification for the exemption from land taxation when so many others with big and small holdings must pay the land tax. These matters are receiving the active attention of the government at this time and I think I can say we are not bluffing, we intend to see that this thing is followed through.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I might ask the hon. Minister whether in view of a representation that was made from no less a body than the West Algoma Progressive-Conservative Association some months ago, that these lands should be reverted to the Crown—as indeed a million acres of them did at some earlier stage—

Hon. Mr. Roberts: It was 800,000.

Mr. MacDonald: Is the government considering that there should be such action as is necessary to have these lands revert to the Crown?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Well, of course they reverted previously because there was $2.25 million owing and it was a settlement. Today, of course, we are not in that position of having any money owing.

Mr. MacDonald: In other words, the one million or 800,000 acres reversion was for the accumulation of taxes?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: That is right. The present position is that the acquisition of the lands at a fair value might be a solution and it is being looked into. But also, it is a question of whether this land tax, this provincial land tax, should not now be made applicable to those acres the same as it is applicable to everybody else.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, all I can say, apart from those interesting revelations, that the original arrangement with this company which was worked by a Liberal government in 1940, is that I hope the government is going to be as tough as the hon. Minister appears to be today. If there ever was a case of unmitigated arrogance in terms of attitude: here is a company which accumulated over $2 million in back debts—I would like to see the little fellow around Ontario, the average man who could accumulate over $2 million in back debts or the equivalent thereof, in terms of his assets, get away with it for any length of time—and all they did was to hand back a million of the acres that they got for nothing to begin with, they had had it for a one dollar grant.

This is a hangover from the days of feudalism that is completely intolerable. That this company should now come back and in effect try to hold up the government for $100,000 grant annually is preposterous. I hope the hon. Minister is just as tough and blustery when he is talking to them as he is with us today in the House.

I just want to draw attention to the kind of thing that is happening, apart from the licensing and imposing permits by unilateral action as though it was a great feudal tract of territory and all the serfs just have to sort of obey the dictates of the matter. This is the kind of attitude that has been manifested.

There were two resort operators in the area by the name of Cannon and Christensen. Their rent for 1964 was due in advance. Take note of this: their rent is due in advance, to a company that had over $2 million in back taxes unpaid at one stage in its history. Notice of eviction was received by these operators on January 23 when their camps were under four feet of snow.

Mr. Culver, another operator, only owed his government land tax, his lease to the ACR was paid. Cannon paid $395 a year for one acre and Nels Christensen paid $750 per year for 4.7 acres. This is nearly $165 per acre, three times what the land is worth to buy, and yet this is a year's rental.

Now I assume the hon. Minister is aware of these things. If he is not aware of them, I think this is just one more bit of evidence of the unmitigated arrogance of a company that has been given attractive territory like this and is trying to operate on it as though it were a feudal domain. We shall look forward with interest to just how firm the government is in coming to an equitable solution in terms of the people of the area and the interests of the province.

Vote 1101 agreed to.

On vote 1102:

Mr. A. V. Walker (Oshawa): Mr. Chairman, under vote 1102 I would like to bring to the attention of this House and have placed on the record a matter which is of considerable concern. It does not particularly concern anything in my riding, but it certainly concerns a great many of the fishermen, of which there are many hundreds in my riding.

That is, of course, the matter which has come before The Department of Lands and Forests on behalf of the Ontario Federation of Anglers and Hunters. It is a matter with which they are indeed very concerned, and I refer to the locks which are being built to create the existing marine railway situated at Severn Falls, Swift River and on the Trent-Severn waterway. Replacement of the marine railways on the Severn River between Lake Couchiching and Georgian Bay will undoubtedly result sooner or later in sea lamprey and other species not found in Lake Simcoe gaining access to the lake.

Conditions in Lake Simcoe and some of its tributary streams, Mr. Chairman, are suitable for the reproduction, survival and growth of this type of specie. If the lamprey reaches Lake Simcoe it can be expected to result in establishment of a self-perpetuating population. The establishment of sea lamprey in Lake Simcoe would almost certainly have a detrimental effect on some of the fish there, particularly lake trout. The lamprey have already had a very detrimental effect in the Great Lakes as far as the lake trout are concerned.

Experiments are, of course, now in progress in Lake Superior which suggest that some control of these lamprey populations in the Great Lakes will be possible. The level at which it may be possible, either economically or otherwise, is not yet known and there is no evidence that the sea lamprey can be eradicated once it has been introduced. Perpetual control will be necessary and the cost of this cannot now be estimated, but will undoubtedly be very considerable.

The effect of other foreign species of fish such as alewife and other types of ferocious type fish which will gain access to Lake Simcoe via the proposed locks cannot be forecast. However, they will create a totally new set of conditions which will definitely affect the fish life in this very popular fishing area.

The Federation of Anglers and Hunters has presented a brief to the federal Minister of Transport, which I hold in my hand. It is interesting to note that at least three officials of our own provincial Department of Lands and Forests have given strong support to this brief which has been presented. It is estimated that Lake Simcoe, Lake Couchiching and Sparrow Lake are among the most heavily fished inland waters in Ontario. Lake Simcoe is particularly productive, maintaining large families of aquatic life in spite of the heavy fishing pressures each year.

A breakdown in the brief of the Federation of Anglers and Hunters dealing with money spent by fishermen in this area under several different headings, estimates that at least $5 million per year is spent with many, many hundreds of citizens enjoying the fishing in this particular area. Much of this revenue would disappear if the fish population in these lakes was depleted and we already have proof that this can happen because of the effect that it has had in the Great Lakes.

The question may well be asked, what additional revenue can we logically anticipate by replacing the marine railways with locks rather than have a modern, efficient marine railway? In view of the fact that marine railways are not always a limiting factor in the size of boats that can navigate the Severn River, we also must consider the depth of water, narrow cuts, and the currents which make this area very dangerous for large cruisers. It is estimated that not more than 150 larger boats per year would use this waterway. Bearing in mind that these larger boats, Mr. Chairman, are nearly self-sufficient, being able to carry almost all necessary supplies for the trip, a figure of $200 expenditure per boat appears probable. This would give an additional revenue of $30,000. Even if the figure were ten times this amount it would not begin to offset the possible loss of the present revenue from fishing. The cost of installing an efficient marine railway would be approximately one-eighth of the cost of building these locks. It would appear certainly that there is much to be lost in this matter and so little to be gained.

I would this afternoon like to urge The Department of Lands and Forests to give every consideration to this matter which is of such great concern to this important body, and not only this important body but the many thousands of anglers who use this lake.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: May I say to the hon. member for Oshawa, whose voice directed to me is pleasant to hear, as was the voice of the previous hon. member—in both cases not offensive—that I am glad to answer in this tone.

The Severn River locks would, of course, be more convenient to certain users if they could be enlarged, and the marine railway, that is the portage angle, were done away with. But as my hon. friend has said, and I endorse this, the danger of lamprey getting into those inland lakes if the lock system replaced entirely the present system is too great for us, at least in this department, to do other than warn and inform the federal authorities that that danger is in our view extremely great, and they should make a decision that will make certain that the lamprey will not get through.

The joint committee of experts that looked into this was composed of representatives of both this department and the federal counterpart, and the federal authority is aware of their united finding in that respect.

There is, however, one alternative that I understand is being examined—how costly it would be I have no idea, but it is interesting to know that the alternative is to make the water hot enough in the area of the locks to be lethal to the lamprey. That would mean, sir, it would be kept constantly at a temperature something in excess of 80 degrees Fahrenheit. Whether that is feasible as an alternative from the cost standpoint, I cannot say, but in any event we are on record that we are opposed to anything being done there that would let these lamprey get in.

Mr. MacDonald: I wonder, Mr. Chairman, if we are going on to another topic, whether I may come back to this for a minute. The hon. Minister knows I have been in communication with him because of representations made by a sportsmen's club in my own riding. May I ask the hon. Minister, does exclusive jurisdiction over this rest with the federal government because it is a navigable water?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Yes, the actual construction work that goes on in navigable waters is exclusively federal and that cost is borne by the federal government. The Trent system is a federal undertaking.

Mr. MacDonald: Am I right then in concluding that all the provincial government can do is warn and complain and plead and so on, but in the final analysis if the federal government decides to proceed we must accept its decision?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: The hon. member might be asking a nice point of constitutional law, but I would think in the field that was confined to the federal authority or given to it explicitly, in the final analysis its decision would govern. My deputy thinks you could stop it by some injunction method, but I would not want to give that as an opinion off the cuff.

Mr. MacDonald: I just want to make a final comment, Mr. Chairman, that if you are looking for a field to test the constitutional issue, I think this would be a good one to move into. I will not repeat the case that the hon. member for Oshawa has presented, but it strikes me as being nonsensical that this kind of a structure should even be considered, opening up the prospect, which apparently everybody can see, of the lamprey getting into a whole group of inland waters. It is such a piece of folly that one wonders why it would be contemplated seriously when the consequences are known. Therefore, I repeat, since the hon. Minister is in good fighting trim and there is no leadership race, so that he will be looking for an outlet for his fighting capacities, that I urge him with the full support of certainly myself, and I judge the hon. member for Oshawa, to make this a constitutional issue and fight it through to the Supreme Court.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I do not know what difference the Opposition's support would make.

Mr. Troy: The hon. Minister said something about some people on the "offensive list" over here. I do not know if I am on the interdicted list or not. Nevertheless, I have a couple of questions.

The first one refers to a grant to Thomas Jones; what would that be for? It is not the Tom Jones we read about in the press.

An hon. member: What else?

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Troy: Seriously, Mr. Minister, I would like to know why you or your department in Nipissing set May 15 for the opening of the pike season, then May 16 for the opening of the pickerel season. Did you expect that those who caught the pickerel on Friday, May 15, and knowing that it was against the law to fish pickerel on that day, would return them to the lake? I know the people who live there would but I do not know if those who come from other areas would. We have hundreds coming up there at that time. What was the reason behind that decision?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: It was really the pickerel date that was changed, not the wall-eye, and the pickerel one was changed to suit what we thought would be the largest number of people for a good weekend.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, they would be fishing in the same water for one type of fish one day. Then the one that they come after, I think it is the second day, on the Saturday—

An hon. member: They do not work on Saturdays. If you catch a pickerel on Friday, you put your name on it and throw it back.

Mr. Troy: Then there is another question—

An hon. member: What was the answer to that one?

Mr. Troy: It is a constitutional matter. The season for pickerel in certain waters, for example, in southern Ontario or south of Nipissing. Was it May 1?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I am making my hon. friend wait almost as long as he would have to wait for the fish himself. May 9 is the date on that.

Mr. Troy: I believe, then, in the district of Parry Sound you are able to fish on May 9? Is there a difference in that district?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: What is the hon. member's point? I do not—

Mr. Troy: The point is that part of Lake Nipissing is in the district of Parry Sound. People came down into certain sections of Lake Nipissing and were lifting the pickerel out in their hands in the spawning season, ruining forever the possibility of the propagation of millions of fish.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Well, if the hon. member has some complaint, will he make it? Then I would know what he is talking about.

Mr. Troy: It is too late, sir, to make the complaint now because the damage is done. Whether it was the fault of the department or God that gave us warmer weather than we expected, but the result was that for millions of fish the propagation was destroyed, because of the fact of geography probably.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member has any problem between now and the 9th—what is this? the 7th? 6th?

He has two days yet if he wants something. Come and see Dr. Clark. He will accommodate the hon. member in any way he can.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Chairman, I concur with the hon. member for York South when he intimated there is arrogance in this department. I do not believe, in all fairness, that the hon. Minister himself, would tolerate the situation that is going on in the area of Parry Sound insofar as commercial fishing is concerned. There is nothing in his budget that is relevant or points out what I am going to tell the House about now, but I think it is a matter of importance that we know what is going on from your officials, Mr. Minister.

This is a letter from the son of a constituent of mine who fishes in the Parry Sound area. A commercial fisherman, this writer is a police constable and he says, in effect, with regards to his father:

I would ask, sir, if you could give him any help. It would certainly be appreciated as he for the past 3 years has had a very rough time in the Pointe au Baril area. He has fished all his life in these waters, knows them very well, and has made his living at this trade. He has made a study of fishing and has had some good and bad years.

During the past three months I had the pleasure of attending the Ontario Police School down at Aylmer, and I think one of the most discussed subjects was the power of the authority given to a conservation officer; the fact that he can arrest, seize, break into any building, including a home, and all he needs to have is a suspicion that an offence has been committed. A power which is given to him far surpasses that of a police officer in the Criminal Code, and surely does not give a person the protection included in the Bill of Rights.

During the last year my father was having trouble with The Department of Lands and Forests at Parry Sound. I went to see how far he was inside the stated lines for fishing, and after several checks were made it should have been obvious to the officer in question that my father had not broken the fishing law. And I also cannot help but feel that, due to all of the extra worry and concern caused by this trouble, it certainly hastened the death of my mother in November in Parry Sound. I also fail to understand how one branch of The Department of Lands and Forests can make and enforce any law which they feel should be done.

He goes on to say: "It's a sorry mess" and so on.

Now the facts of this case: For over 50 years the fishing line was set and recognized by The Department of Game and Fisheries and the commercial fishermen in this area. It was suddenly changed by The Department of Lands and Forests in Parry Sound in the year 1962. At this time, a special meeting of the Fishermen's Association was called for the Parry Sound area and this time it was the wish of the commercial fishermen in this area that the line remain as it was and had been over a period of years. But if this new line was set up, it would cut off from the commercial fisherman a vast amount of fishing grounds.

However, at this time, it was suggested by The Department of Lands and Forests that if the commercial fisherman in the Parry Sound area would consent to this change of the line, that the department there would grant them special privileges in the fall. The letter goes on to show the mechanics of this. Summing it up, he says:

In the spring of the year 1962 I began my fishing operations on the south grounds of my area. It was during this period that The Department of Lands and Forests personnel came out from Parry Sound and set trap nets in every channel used by the fish coming out to the outside waters from their feeding beds, which are in the waters along the inside islands during the winter months. While in the process of doing this, boats operated by these men, these department men, got tangled up in my nets, tearing them and cutting them in two, which cost me many dollars to repair.

As a result of this action I was forced to move my operation to the north grounds of my area, which later proved very costly as far as The Department of Lands and Forests was concerned, as only a very short time later, while in the operation of lifting my nets outside of the set line, The Department of Lands and Forests boat came alongside my boat and the officer, one Mr. McVey, stated that I was inside the line, everything I had was under seizure and that I was being charged for this offence.

I then put a buoy on my nets, leaving them exactly where they were, and went ashore; going to a telephone which was about six miles away. I phoned to The Department of Lands and Forests office in Parry Sound, talking to a Mr. Adamson, who understood the waters. He refused to do so, stating that I would have to abide by the decision of the man there.

I then phoned my lawyer and told him of the event. He advised me to get an airplane and a good camera man and have him fly the line and take pictures of the location of the nets. Later I was informed by the department in their office, in the presence of my lawyer, that the charges had been withdrawn. They, the officials themselves, were not too sure of the exact location of the line and at this time they still wanted to extend the line further out. My lawyer would not let them do this. However, this cost me many, many hundreds of dollars plus the time lost in the operation of my business. Then in the following year of 1963, in the month of June, and by the same officer I was accused again of being inside the set line. Twelve of my nets are under seizure. I was being charged and would be summoned to court.

However, I was informed that the summons which I had been served with was being withdrawn as it was on the wrong charge and another summons would be issued in this offence. So, after several trips to Parry Sound, which is over 50 miles from Pointe au Baril, the cost of taking my men, plus the many days lost in operation, on August 30 I was found not guilty of this charge. However, the cost again was many hundreds of dollars and yet in both of these offences I was within my rights.

Had I been found guilty of these minor offences I would have lost my licence and many, many thousands of dollars would have been lost as well as a lifetime of work.

Now, he says:

—as the year 1964 approaches, being in this commercial fishing business I cannot help but wonder will these things happen again? I have also been informed that the Lands and Forests at Parry Sound are again going to put trap nets in all the channels leading to outside grounds, and are once again going to take the spawns from the fish which are so badly needed to restock our own waters, and send them in to inland lakes.

I, therefore, cannot help but feel that until such time as this spawn is put back into the area from which it is taken, the rapid decline of the fishing in this Georgian Bay area will continue. It will affect both commercial and tourist fishing.

This learned man in his field, a commercial fisherman, who is highly regarded, lists a whole list of inequities here, which raise glaring questions. I will give them to the hon. Minister and not take the time of the House to ask him now—

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Mr. Chairman, if I may interrupt for a moment. I understand that this commercial fishermen's group has already made an appointment to be here on May 14 to discuss a lot of these problems. We intend to talk to it then.

Mr. Sargent: The point is, Mr. Chairman, when these things are brought up in this House, the hon. Minister always has an answer: they are going to have a meeting.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: That happens to have been set up before you brought it up. As a matter of fact it is on request of the commercial fishermen's association.

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Chairman, irrespective, as my hon. friend knows, of whether a committee is to meet some time in the future or not, that does not disqualify my hon. friend from Grey North from asking him very pertinent questions relative to this vote in these departmental estimates.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: The leader of the Opposition's submission is good. The hon. member for Grey North made the statement he did not want to take up the time of the House and I got up and said it would not be necessary. I said it because we have already got an appointment to see these people.

Mr. Oliver: Now, my hon. friend from Grey North said nothing of the kind.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: That is what I understood.

Mr. Oliver: Toward the later part of his remarks he said he had an appendix to the document which contained other inequities as his informant saw them. Prior to that he had stated a very precise case against the department which calls, I suggest, for information from the hon. Minister in reply to that charge for that information.

Mr. Sargent: That is correct.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: All these matters will be discussed. What the hon. gentleman referred to is not unknown to the department. The department people have had lots of discussions on previous occasions. But the line set in Georgian Bay—and it is one of these winding lines; there are many islands, as you know, in that area—is intended to keep commercial and sport fishing separate. It is a real problem, I can assure my hon. friend, to work out something that will meet those two situations. As far as the netting by our own department is concerned, that is done for spawn taking, tagging and technical purposes only.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Chairman, it would seem to me that more and more small people are being hurt by bureaucracy and such goings-on as I have related here. As I said before, I know the House is trying to get through its business on this vote, but these are very glaring questions in this department and I will forward them to the hon. Minister. The point is that this man, a small businessman, has no recourse for this loss of money. I would like to see a man like this sue the government for loss of money in a case like this. It is a great injustice and as the hon. Minister says, we will have a meeting about it. I think there should be an investigation and this man be given a square deal.

Vote 1102 agreed to.

Vote 1103 agreed to.

Vote 1104 agreed to.

On vote 1105:

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I have two items. Without going into detail, Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister will recall that I inquired of him last year with regard to the situation at Wasaga Beach and this has continued as a running battle in the intervening year. I have here a letter to a local paper in which the chairman or the president of the chamber of commerce in the area is chastising the local hon. member (Mr. Evans) rather firmly for accepting statements from the parks integration board as being the majority view of the community, when the chairman or president contends they were only minority views. I do not want to repeat all the basic elements of this to the hon. Minister because I think he is aware of them, but the latest information that the people interested in it have received over the signature of the deputy Minister is to the effect that it is still under consideration. What is the picture at Wasaga Beach?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Wasaga Beach, Mr. Chairman, is one of the great beaches of this province—

Mr. MacDonald: This I knew. What is the political picture?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: There will be thousands and thousands of cars coming there, we hope pretty soon now, for this season. The situation I think at the moment is reasonably satisfactory. Arrangements are being worked out gradually and it is a big problem, because of what was found and what grew up there before any real attempt was made to develop this as a beach under the control of an authority beyond the local community. Nature is helping this a bit because with the low water—this is certainly not desirable everywhere, but with the low water that exists this year, there is far more beach exposed than would be the average exposure. That is helping considerably.

We are in the midst of a study by an expert from the University of Toronto on the feasibility of building up the beach itself, and if that turns out to be feasible it may save a lot of money. The alternative to that would be to gradually acquire a great deal of property and solve the problems for the future that way.

In the meantime a road has been established and exits have been made to the satisfaction of the hon. member for the district, who knows that area probably better than anybody else in the House—he and the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Letherby). I think I can say we are entering into 1964 with a fairly good situation.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, all I can say is that if what has happened has got the approval of the local members this will certainly arouse the ire of a considerable group of people who have been in touch with me now for well over a year in regard to this. Basically the problem as they presented it to me—businessmen and others who are on the beach—is that The Department of Highways, in attempting to cope with what it deemed an unsatisfactory situation, cut off most of the streets going down to the beach. There are only one or two roads to get in, and this has resulted in a great drop in business and continuing dissatisfaction.

A letter from the former Attorney General (Mr. Cass) to one of the people who had written in said that this was under study by The Department of Lands and Forests through the parks integration board. Here I have a letter dated March 4 of this year over the signature of F. A. McDougall saying:

As indicated in your letter of February 10, the question of Wasaga Beach was discussed in the Legislature on February 25, 1963, and at that time our Minister stated that they were having a careful study made of the whole picture at Wasaga Beach. We expect within the very near future to consider plans of this area and present them to the Ontario Parks Integration Board. Until such time as these plans are approved we are not in a position to advise you of the department's position with regard to any individual property in this area.

That is the end of the letter.

Is the hon. Minister's statement, to which we have just listened, in effect a report of these studies that were outlined in the letter from the deputy Minister, or does he ignore the studies completely? Is this something else?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: The letter is quite right. When these things move I can assure the hon. member they do not move overnight on a problem of that sort. But they do move and they move through the parks integration board. The latest move by the parks integration board was authority for the acquisition of some 34 acres of property in that area in relation to the general problem, which will go part way at least in helping to solve some of the urgent problems. We believe on balance that it is working out satisfactorily and I prefer to take that view. Perhaps the hon. members concerned would like to say something about it; I should say they probably know more about it than either of us.

Mr. J. P. Spence (Kent East): Mr. Chairman, under this vote 1105, which brings up parks of the province, I might say, that in my riding I am very fortunate to have Rondeau Provincial Park. It is one of the parks at which I think the hon. Minister said last year there were more admissions than at all other parks in the province.

I might say we do appreciate the improvements that have been made at Rondeau Park, but, of course, we have some problems there, too. One of the problems that concerns a large number of leaseholders in Rondeau Park is the renewal of leases. I have been advised by the leaseholders' association that these new leases that will be granted will contain no clause that these leases will be renewed. If, as I understand it, this is the department's policy or future plan for Rondeau Park, this is a great concern to these leaseholders. I believe the leaseholders' association has waited on the department a number of times trying to get the policy of the government in regard to leases in Rondeau Park.

These leaseholders have built beautiful cottages, ranging in price from $30,000 down to as low as $6,000. These cottages, with their lovely flower beds, add a great deal to the scenic beauty of Rondeau Park. However, there is a growing concern on the part of the leaseholders that the government plans to adopt the policy of not renewing their leases as they fall due.

I think two years ago a delegation of the leaseholders' association attended here on the day the estimates of this department were being presented in the House by the then Minister, who is now the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr. Spooner). This delegation requested an interview with the Minister as they had several questions they wished to put to him, but unfortunately it was impossible for him to grant this request. However, certain officials of the department did meet with the delegation, who were assured that their questions would be answered.

I have now been informed that the leaseholders' association has received no answers whatsoever up to the present time. I would like to have the hon. Minister outline, if he can, his future plans with regard to the leases in Rondeau Park.

Another matter I would like to discuss while I am on my feet, Mr. Chairman, is Rondeau Bay. I might say that over the past number of years this bay has grown up with weeds and has been a great concern to all the people in that area, because this bay is one of the attractions which draws tourists to the provincial park. This condition seems to be worsening. We do appreciate that this department has given a grant of $2,000 for the cutting of these weeds, but this is no permanent solution. I believe I have asked on numerous other occasions if the department could suggest some other means, such as a chemical, which we could use in an attempt to destroy these weeds. We have been cutting them but this does not seem to solve the problem.

I understand that this bay is now the responsibility of the provincial government, although previously it was under the jurisdiction of the federal government. Over the years it has become a serious problem as nobody seemed to want to accept responsibility for the condition. However, I understand that this department now has control over Rondeau Bay and we would like to see some action in finding a permanent solution to the problem of controlling this unsightly condition.

I have another question which I would like to ask the hon. Minister. I understand that it is his intention to increase the fishing licence to $3 or over. I hope that is not right. It may be only rumour, but it is causing concern to many people in that area.

Maybe I am giving too many questions to the hon. Minister, but another problem is in regard to the placing of gates at the entrance to Rondeau Park. I have an article here from the Chatham Daily News. It says: "Rondeau Park Gates May Curb Vandalism."

Now this is something new for us in the riding of Kent East to have gates placed at the entrance. In the evening these gates will be closed and only those who have cottages, or are campers, or those on business, will be able to enter. I feel that this is unfair to other people living in the district who are very proud of the provincial park and enjoy driving any visitors they may be entertaining through the park in the evenings.

I understand the leaseholders are very much in favour of this and that the campers are very much in favour of this; but then an article appears in the Chatham Daily News which says "Rondeau Park Gates May Curb Vandalism!"

We have provincial police stationed at Rondeau Park. I feel that we have as fine a police force as there is in the Dominion of Canada and the province of Ontario, and I believe a lot of those young people who attend Rondeau Park are from the towns and villages in that surrounding area. I do not hear too much of vandalism in these towns and villages, the police have complete control of them. I wonder if the hon. Minister could outline to me the reason for the gates, why the police cannot cope with this situation at Rondeau Park.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: The remarks of the hon. member for Kent East are appreciated. I might mention that Rondeau, second to Wasaga, is the largest attended park in the province. Last year I think something like 647,000 people were counted there. We have 500-odd campsites, which means that more than 2,000 people can camp there at a time.

The policy is, of course, gradually to clear out the leaseholds in parks of this sort because of the overall benefit to the public generally by getting more and more area in such suitable locations. But some of these leases, I understand, are to run for quite a long period of time yet and we are trying to be as diplomatic as possible in dealing with the people concerned. I hope to get down to the park before very long—even before this month is out I hope to be in that area—and I hope my hon. friend would perhaps join me and at that time we will have a look around at some of these things.

Mr. Spence: I should appreciate it.

Mr. D. A. Evans (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Chairman, in regard to the remarks made by the hon. member for York South about the Wasaga Beach area, I think when The Department of Lands and Forests took over the Wasaga Beach area they got into a very difficult situation. It is a lot different to set up a park in an area which has a lot of business places, a lot of cottages, than it is to set up a park where there is just the bush area, or lakes or streams or whatever it might be.

The Department of Lands and Forests run into a lot of difficulty at Wasaga Beach because there is private enterprise and many cottages there. In order to develop this area into a park, they found that certainly there were going to be many people who were going to be hurt in a certain way, by cutting off roads and things like that. I might say that before they took over this park there were no washroom facilities. Since the department has taken it over, it will be found that there are adequate washroom facilities in the area. The beach is a lot cleaner. Many more people go to that beach today than did several years ago.

The hon. member mentioned about the roads being cut off, I have thought about this many, many times. It has been brought to my attention. I believe that possibly a lot of people have been hurt. I know of several cases, and people have mentioned to me about their business places where the road has been cut off along the beach. This year the department has agreed to open up some roads. They found it is possible to do this. But it must be remembered in the Wasaga Beach area there is a high water mark. At the present time our beach is about 560 feet wide, but sometimes, for instance back in 1952, the beach was only wide enough for one car.

So through the efforts of the department they have now, as the hon. Minister has mentioned, employed a professor from the University of Toronto studying the feasibility of widening the beach. I think that possibly this can be done.

Out in Vancouver last year I discovered that there is a thousand-acre park that was built on sand dunes. I think it is quite feasible at the Wasaga Beach area that it can be widened so that there could be a road running the full extent of the beach. We must remember that it is the greatest beach, probably, on the North American continent. I would like to congratulate The Department of Lands and Forests on the terrific job they are doing and the very fine co-operation I have had from them.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Chairman: Order.

Mr. G. Bukator (Niagara Falls): Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the hon. Minister about the parks integration board. Does that come under this vote?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I do not know about this vote. They have their own.

Mr. Bukator: I realize that but there are the funds that go from Hydro and that the hon. Minister gets into his funds, I believe, some $600,000 a year diverted for water rental.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: That is one of the things that was taken away from The Department of Lands and Forests. It goes directly to the Treasury and, therefore, we do not have the benefit of even showing it.

Mr. Bukator: I was wondering where that figure would be revealed. I stand to be corrected, and the vice-chairman of Hydro always puts me right, but is it some $600,000 does he recall?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I will check that.

Mr. Bukator: I am curious. If this is true, several years ago I had several of the Ministers who were good enough to come to Fort Erie and look at the possibility of obtaining a large section of land there at Old Erie Beach. As a matter of fact, I will take that back a step further. I mention this to the hon. members annually. The former Prime Minister, hon. Mr. Frost, when I was asking a similar question said: "You make sense and I would like to talk to you about this matter in my office." I would like now to reveal the personnel of that particular group at that meeting. The Prime Minister said then that he would like to talk with us. We met with the chairman of the parks commission at that time, Charles Daley, I believe it was. Mr. Clark, who was the executive secretary to the Prime Minister; my good friend the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Morningstar) and myself.

We discussed the possibility of purchasing the land for park purposes. In my evening paper in Niagara Falls there was a bit of land for sale just up the river from that on Lake Erie, some 500-odd feet with a home on it. Mind you, it is a substantial home, but they are asking $100,000 for these 11 acres. It is a fantastic figure and I doubt very much whether anybody will buy it except maybe some wealthy person who can afford that kind of an estate.

But down the river from that, or along Lake Erie, there is over 50 acres that could be purchased for a much smaller figure per acre. Your people did attend a meeting and they were good enough to come to our area.

I am going to try to recall the members of the government who were there then. I stand to be corrected, because most of you will remember. But hon. Mr. Allan, the Treasurer at that time was there; I believe Mr. Morningstar was there, and the present hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs who was the Minister of Lands and Forests at that time. No doubt he will recall visiting Erie Beach.

We looked at this site and it got to this stage that your people were good enough, after Mr. Frost turned to Mr. Daley and said: "Buy it." Mr. Daley at that time said: "You are taking my money from me, over $600,000, and I guess less than $200,000 would buy that large park."

Now there would be a large park at Niagara-on-the-Lake, adjoining the Niagara Parks Commission land. There would be another outlet similar to that adjoining, not only the park land, but right close to our neighbours in Buffalo. I am talking now of Old Erie Beach.

Your people were there, and I do believe an appraiser was sent out. He looked over the proposition and they decided then that the cost was too great. They could not afford to buy it because this party who owned the land was asking too much money. But there would be a beautiful park, Mr. Minister, in that area.

He may remember the old original Erie Beach. It had many concessions, many concrete walks through it, a large pavilion. They are all there now, mind you. They are pretty well beaten by the weather, but they could be recovered. There are many beautiful trees and you could have, I think, even a park where trailers could come in and people could enjoy this.

The reason I bring this to the attention of the hon. Minister is because I have complained in this House so often—and I did it sincerely. I feel that between the Ontario Hydro and the Niagara Parks Commission, they have taken from us many dollars that I believe they should pay in taxes.

Take the parks commission, if you will, with the annual report tabled here some two weeks ago. From the concessions alone in the Niagara Parks system, they have netted $230,000-odd. Now mind you, they are in direct opposition to private enterprise. They do a good job. Most of the hon. members no doubt have been through the park. We are proud of it. I think it is a wonderful park and it will be there for all time to come. They will eventually expand it. I hope the government purchases Erie Beach when the hon. members get travelling about the province on their tour. I am sure it would be found this would be a good addition. The funds come from that area, in any case. But if the parks commission is going to do business in their souvenir stores and in the restaurants in direct opposition to private enterprise, I believe they should pay their taxes. When they have made $230,000-odd net, they could very easily pay the portion that others have to pay to bear the cost.

I might say, in connection with that, that because of the dollars that originate from water rentals from the Hydro, they end up in the parks integration board. The money there I suppose is dispersed throughout the whole province.

Well, this is good. I do not think any one area should try to get all that it feels it should have, but I think this is a reasonable request. I might say to the hon. Minister that we feel that the least the Hydro, the parks commission and his people should look at is that the Hydro should pay taxes the same as the Canadian Niagara does. The second thing is that the parks commission should pay taxes when it does business in direct opposition to private enterprise in our area. And the third thing is that the hon. Minister should take a good look at that Fort Erie end because the money originates there. You have a profit, and you could purchase valuable land for our citizens to enjoy in the future. It is an excellent section of land and there is at least 50 acres that could be purchased there, I would say, very cheaply at this time.

I would like the hon. Minister to assure me, if he will—I know that he owes me no concession whatsoever—but when he is in that area, I would like very much to show him what we have there. I do believe it would be a great addition to the parks system.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I am glad to hear the remarks of the hon. member and I might say that I think there will be a meeting of the parks integration board in Niagara Falls within—I think it is set up for some time within the next month anyway. I would be very pleased to invite the hon. member to attend as part of that meeting in any event, and discuss these things with the board.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, since some people want to get out of here as soon as possible I will go over this one very quickly. I presume under basic organization, vote 1110, I can ask a question about surveys and lands.

Now that we are on parks, I would like to find out the position of the parks branch in regard to Antoine Park along the Ottawa River in Mattawan township. Will the department continue to consider it in the full capacity of a provincial park—that is the Antoine, the small park along the river? It is a very valuable asset to the people of Mattawa.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: That is a small park, a 23-acre park. What is it the hon. member would like to know about it?

Mr. Troy: I know at one time it was thought that the parks branch would get rid of that to the municipality in which it is situated, but that little township would not possibly be able to handle it. Will the hon. Minister still keep it as a provincial park and continue to have it in the same capacity as the others regardless of its size?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: It is obviously a park. I do not know how we acquired it in the first place, but it is obviously a park. We got it from Highways, I think, as some surplus ground, something of that order. Actually, it is not at all of the size of a provincial park. We have a yardstick of 500 acres when possible and I do not see how we can do much about a 23-acre project there, if the hon. member is suggesting we should develop it further.

Mr. Troy: No, not any further development, but keep it within the hon. Minister's department. The people of the area want the park because it is quite an asset to the community and they do not want to get rid of it to the township.

Could the hon. Minister give me the progress made in regard to the projected park in Haddo township?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Haddo is a reserved park. Actually, these things have to take certain priorities. I do not think the hon. member is suffering in his area from lack of parks. There is a lovely park at Marten River, there is a lovely park in Champlain Park. We have Haddo reserved and it can be developed in due course, but we have to have priorities for development.

Mr. Troy: The only thing is that the Marten River camp is at a much different place than Haddo, and it would be very fine—

Hon. Mr. Roberts: It is a good big acreage there, as the hon. member knows—

Mr. Troy: Yes, a good big acreage. And so is the section near the Nickel Belt and Sudbury area and up Highway 69. What is the attitude of the department with regard to Algonquin Park? I know last fall there seemed to be feelers out in the press of the possibility of opening this up to some extent with access roads. I believe the hon. Minister issued a release in that regard to sound out public opinion. What is the present position of the hon. Minister in regard to Algonquin as a wilderness area? I am at the same time thinking as I read the monthly reports—or weekly, I forget which they are—from the branch in the Pembroke area, that there seems to be quite a number of access roads going in in that section of the park.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Would the hon. member just indicate if he thinks there is a lack of access or an excess of access or what? He is trying to lead me into some answer and then he will not like it no matter what it is.

Mr. Troy: No, there has been concern about keeping Algonquin as one of the few wilderness areas. Some organizations across the province, a great number of people, are concerned that there are going to be access roads opened up and projects of that nature. What is the opinion of the department? Some feel that there should be a highway going from southern Ontario through Haliburton county and that section, through the park, up to Highway 17, then on to 533 and up to northern Ontario. What is the feeling of the hon. Minister about opening up Algonquin with roads?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: The answer there is that we have about 2,900 square miles in this great park and it is a tremendous park. It has been kept on the basis of the natural beauty and the right to go in there and travel by canoe and get lots of solitude if you want it, and we do not want to destroy that.

On the other hand, we also realize that in the change that has taken place over the years there are far more people travelling now to see such places as this. They want to have access as much as possible to the area into which they want to get, even in the park. We have to move with the times, but at the same time we have to preserve that original concept of the park. There is thinking constantly going on that is gradually changing, I think.

My deputy may check me here if I say too much, because he is one of these men who had a lot to do with that park. He is very devoted to the park and to the principles that brought the park into being. We do not want to run roads in there that would in any way do away with the original concept, but at the same time we are realizing that more and more people want them. I am sure that the hon. Minister of Tourism and Information wants them. And, sir, we all want people to have the chance to see the great parks of our country that are available and we are trying to make them available. Now, we are not going to put a brand-new road through there or anything of that sort, but there may be gradually new points of access into the park itself and perhaps even new development so that more people will get into the interior of the park than do so at the present time.

Mr. MacDonald: Will there be any change from what the status quo is—

Hon. Mr. Roberts: The what?

Mr. MacDonald: I said, will there be any change from the status quo as we have known it for years?

Mr. Troy: The hon. Minister has said that there are quite a number of the recommendations being considered. I presume he is referring to that report of the 1959 committee of which Major General Kennedy, I believe, was the chairman. Did he refer to the committee in which Mr. J. F. MacFarland was chairman and Howard Kennedy was vice-chairman? Did the hon. Minister refer to that particular report?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I was referring to the report of the Ontario Royal Commission on Forestry, 1947. Howard Kennedy was the chairman.

Mr. Troy: Yes. Then he was vice-chairman of another one, the public lands investigation committee, and that committee was set up to recommend about parks and mining in parks. This committee apparently gave a strong recommendation that such be done, as it pointed out the great amount of land—that is public lands—with so few square miles, comparatively, under mining. Is there any change yet in your opinion about opening up provincial parks to mining?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I think that statement has been made pretty clearly by the hon. Prime Minister and others—

Mr. Troy: I know, but clear statements have been made one week and we have found out a week after things happened—

Mr. MacDonald: If the hon. Minister of Mines (Mr. Wardrope) is not opposed to it.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): There is no change.

Mr. Troy: No change. Thank you.

Mr. S. Farquhar (Algoma-Manitoulin): Mr. Chairman, I have a question to ask the hon. Minister under this vote. But before I do, I am pleased to commend the hon. Minister and his department for the continued action in developing a park in Elliot Lake, and also the donation by the department to the wildlife museum there. It has become fairly evident in Elliot Lake that very shortly we are not going to have much else but parks and some wildlife.

In this connection, and for that reason, I feel like inviting the hon. members of this House to visit this park, since in this area we do not get very excited about anything smaller than a 24-pound trout.

Mr. Chairman, it has come to my attention, in connection with the provincial park, that there has been some correspondence from the federal parks branch to the effect that there is some thinking of developing a national park in that area. In that respect I am going to have to ask the hon. Minister and his department for even a little further co-operation.

It has come to my attention that there is at this point, or has been, some correspondence between the federal parks branch and the hon. Minister and I would like to ask—I have not heard anything recently about it—I would like to ask if negotiations are continuing between the two governments in this connection.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I think the answer would be yes. As a matter of fact, when the question of a national park was raised—and obviously in this province where we now have 85 provincial parks, we are not really searching for national parks which are operated on somewhat different methods than ours—but when this question of a national park was brought up and when it was recognized that the Rt. hon. Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Pearson), recently so appointed, comes from, or rather occupies his seat in the House of Commons, in a territory that takes in this area, it seemed to me that if there was any one particular place where a national park might be fitting it might be in a riding represented by the Rt. hon. Prime Minister of Canada. We indicated our desire to co-operate if, at the federal level, this is still something that they want to pursue.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Prince Edward-Lennox.

Mr. N. Whitney (Prince Edward-Lennox): Mr. Chairman, I was very pleased to hear the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests announce today that his department would proceed with the development of the Sandbanks Park in Prince Edward county. Local municipal councils and local people have long urged that this be done. We feel that this will be a great development that will benefit the people of Ontario, particularly our own local residents.

I might say that we are fortunate in that it is practically all Crown land. In a recent press release I believe that the hon. Minister described it very appropriately, and I would like to repeat his description of it:

The hon. A. Kelso Roberts, QC, has announced that development work will start this spring on Sandbanks provincial park in Prince Edward county near Wellington.

This is a unique flow sand peninsula, 1,200 acres in area and five miles long which separates Lake Ontario and Yeo Lake.

I might say that Yeo Lake is more commonly known as West Lake. Yeo was the original name, but by usage it has become known as West Lake.

The western side of the property is a magnificent five-mile white sand beach and behind this lies a chain of dunes some of which are 90 feet high.

I might say that on the West Lake side, or the Yeo Lake side, there probably would be another five miles of sand beach available which could be developed when needed. The sand comes right to the water's edge and probably extends beneath the surface of the water. A really huge development awaits us there in the future.

Less than 100 years ago the sand banks were covered with trees, a mixed forest of hardwoods and cedar. A small settlement had grown up along the south end of the peninsula which included a brick factory and a hotel. The settlers cut the trees which grew nearby and in so doing let loose an enemy that would drive them out. The thin top soil was blown away and then the wind began to move the dunes at a frightening speed up to 40 feet per year. The sand moved against the settlement and finally swallowed it. Somewhere beneath the present dunes lie houses, a road, a hotel and a factory.

Farmers started to plant trees in the early 1900's in an effort to halt the sands. In 1921 the Sandbanks Forestry Station was established and snow fences were erected and millions of poplar, Scotch pine and other species were planted. None of these prevailed against the sand and the dunes continued to march eastward. Sporadic plantings and other methods were tried during the period up to 1957.

In that year an all-out effort was made and using snow fences, mulching with straw and brush, and planting Carolina poplar, Scotch pine, and black locust, a large enough area was covered to finally halt the sand. Further successful plantings were made in 1958 and 1959. In the period from 1960 to the present most of the moving sand areas have been successfully planted.

It is planned to construct a bridge at Wellington to join the mainland to the northern tip of the Sandbanks. From there a paved road will meander through the dunes and at suitable intervals lookouts and parking lots will be provided.

Any part of the road will be within walking distance of the long white beach. Camp grounds are planned for the southern end among the plantations which were established there. The Sandbanks will be 120 miles by road from downtown Metro and should be able to comfortably accommodate 30,000 bathers at a time.

It will be a fine companion park to nearby Outlet Beach which handled 300,000 visitors and 17,000 campers in 1963 and popular Presqu'île Park, 35 miles west, which accommodated 287,000 visitors and 30,000 campers last summer. The Sandbanks is the finest public beach on the Canadian shores of Lake Ontario and should prove to be a very popular playground for seekers of sand, sun and water.

I know that most local people will welcome this announcement.

I am aware that efforts are presently being made to make an agreement with the federal government in regard to the bridge that will be necessary as an approach to the sand dunes from the northern end at Wellington. Although direct access will presently be available from the southern end, it will add much if this bridge can be constructed and I do hope that the two governments will be able to arrive at a satisfactory agreement.

I would also hope that the federal government would give consideration at the same time to improving the harbour facilities at Wellington, perhaps constructing docks and a harbour for small boats because I feel that West Lake in itself—I have travelled around it in a boat and viewed these sand dunes—is something exceptional. As the hon. Minister has said, the dunes sometimes reach 90 feet in height and no one would imagine there was anything of that kind in Canada. I think you might almost imagine it was the Sahara Desert when you view these huge mounds of sand from the water. I think this would all be a terrific asset, not only to our local people but to the people of the province as a whole and that it will, being unique as it is, serve the people well for many years to come.

Mr. R. M. Whicher (Bruce): Mr. Chairman, I wanted to ask the hon. Minister a question I have asked for, I believe this is the ninth time. Not this hon. Minister, but other Ministers, each and every year I have asked, has he any report as to the possibility of a provincial park in the Bruce peninsula?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: It would be a little premature but I will let the hon. member in on a secret. We are about to recommend about a 20,000-acre area in there for further development as a possible park if the more senior branches of authority will go for it.

Mr. Whicher: Who is the senior branch? Is it the hon. Prime Minister?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: No, the parks integration board—it has to go there and has to go to a few other places. Therefore it is only because I like you so well that I am telling you all this.

Mr. Whicher: If I can get a park I am quite willing to like you, too. This has been going on for so many years and there have been accusations made as many of the hon. members know. I hasten to say that I do not believe this to be true—that because I happen to be the member for that area, it has held up the possibility of a provincial park in the Bruce peninsula. I am the first one to admit—and I have on many occasions given the department credit for its parks policy in the province of Ontario—that it has done a remarkable job. I think that there are many wonderful parks scattered all over the province, but I would be certainly negligent in not pointing out once more that one of the nicest places—I do not want to get into any argument with any of the hon. members—but one of the nicest tourist localities in the province of Ontario is in the Bruce peninsula.

When articles and editorials are written in the paper saying that because of me this park is being held up, to say the least, it hurts my feelings somewhat. I do not know if it hurts me politically or not, but I would really like most sincerely to ask the hon. Minister—and I know that the hon. Prime Minister is interested in this area because he used to summer up there as a boy and we are certainly glad to have him up there again.

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. Minister of Highways should go up.

Mr. Whicher: If the hon. Minister of Highways will bring him up we will bump over the roads together.

I am going to read this editorial—it will only take a minute, Mr. Chairman—to show you the feeling that is in the area that because I happen to be a Liberal member there is no park in this, one of the finest places in Ontario. Once more, before I read it, I hasten to say that I do not believe it, but I am going to read it to show the hon. Minister that it is one of the finest places, and the feeling not only locally, but in the area surrounding Bruce county, is that they feel I am holding this thing up. So if you can help me once again, Mr. Minister, I will certainly like you for all time to come.

The article was written in the Owen Sound Times on September 30, 1963, only five days after a great date in this province, and it is headed:

QUEEN'S PARK NEGLECTS BRUCE PENINSULA

For some time now it has appeared that the provincial government has neglected the Bruce peninsula, largely because its sitting member has been a member of the Opposition. Perhaps the fact that Ross Whicher at times has been an outspoken critic of the Progressive-Conservative government has made those who control such matters reluctant to give more than token aid to what is one of the province's finest summer resort areas. It has been said that at least one of those who must pass on such matters has established himself as a watchdog lest Mr. Whicher should receive credit for provincial expenditures in that area.

Mr. Chairman, I hasten to say I do not want any credit, all I would like is a park. To quote again:

Whether or not there is any truth to such claims, Queen's Park has been noticeably deaf to frequent urgings that the government should purchase land still remaining available along the Lake Huron and Georgian Bay shorelines, that it may be safeguarded for public use in future generations. Early last spring, Lands and Forests Minister Kelso Roberts addressing the Sauble conservation authority's annual meeting very definitely promised that his department would take such action. To date that promise has not been kept.

The Bruce peninsula, with its long shoreline, its many lakes and its large acreage of forest lands, offers an ideal summer playground not only for the people of this district but for people of the thickly populated areas to the south. Within a two-hour-or-so drive from Metropolitan Toronto, Windsor and other similarly crowded areas it provides an ideal family-type holiday playground. There are already large cottage, cabin, hotel and motel establishments.

Private enterprise has done a thorough job and so far has not commercialized the area to too great an extent. But to date there has been comparatively little public land safeguarded for future years. Increasingly long shoreline areas are being purchased for strictly private purposes. While Bruce North, and now Grey North, is represented by a Liberal, the Progressive-Conservative government will do well to remember that the Bruce peninsula development will benefit those of all political persuasions or none, should it be their purpose to continue to neglect this area.

Mr. Chairman, the only thing is that they have been considering it for nine years and while I have the patience of Job with this government, I might as well have it because I am not getting up to date very fast, either in roads or in parks.

I have flown over the area with the former Minister of Lands and Forests. We went up to Tobermory and had a fine time and he said, "My, that would be a nice park down there; my that would be another one over there," but we never got the park. Seeing that we now have 85 in the province of Ontario, Mr. Chairman, I appeal directly to the present hon. Minister of Lands and Forests, and I hope that the hon. Prime Minister will lend a kindly ear, too, that this area be not neglected any longer insofar as parks are concerned.

An hon. member: How are you doing with the nuclear power plant?

Mr. Whicher: We are doing very well with the nuclear plant.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I would say to my hon. friend that I have a memorandum here, of four or five pages on that grand county he is talking about and we have got all sorts of ideas. Really we are going to do our best.

Mr. Whicher: We have not got—

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Mr. Chairman, I can assure the hon. member that I personally would do nothing to block any effort of this type that might be recommended to me. I recall my first trip to the Bruce Peninsula as a relatively small boy. I was 14 years old. We had different regulations in those days. Perhaps I should not go into such detail, but I was equipped with a .22 rifle and a fishing rod and $10 worth of food. I was able to stay up there in a tent with a couple of people my own size and age for about three weeks. Now, can you still do this sort of thing in the Bruce peninsula? That is what I would like to know.

Mr. Whicher: I think so. If you come it will not cost you anything.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I spent several very pleasant weeks over a period of years doing this sort of thing in the Bruce peninsula. I doubt that the fish are quite as plentiful now—

Mr. MacDonald: But what about the parks?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Well now, I am only setting up the point here. I personally am not going to look with disfavour upon any proposition such as the hon. member suggests and I just want to give my hon. friend this assurance.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Whicher: I am not going to spoil it. I will certainly take that as read.

Mr. Chairman, I have one other question to ask the hon. Minister. Would this be the vote where I ask about the grant that you give for municipal parks? I am thinking about the Cape Croker Indian reservation that the hon. Minister is aware of. Is this where I would ask about that?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I think that is under the conservation authority. That has gone with conservation authority work to the other department.

Mr. Troy: Has the Act been amended to that effect?

Mr. Chairman, I have a question. I would like to get information. Under what vote would I ask a question with regard to your department's sign painting?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Under basic organization—field trips.

Mr. Troy: I could get that under basic organization—

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Vote 1110.

Mr. Troy: Thank you.

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. Minister just one question? When you said that he had gone to the conservation authority, which I know would be correct, would he be the hon. Minister to whom I should ask about the purchase of the land on Cape Croker reservation?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: It is one of those parks that comes under the conservation authority projects.

Vote 1105 agreed to.

Vote 1106 agreed to.

On vote 1107:

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a few comments. The hon. Minister, I know, would feel neglected if I did not make some comments on timber management.

The hon. Minister really came out fighting this afternoon. I must say that from my observation of the hon. gentleman, he fights most vigorously when his case is weakest. I was not surprised that he came out fighting this afternoon and that he devoted most of his time in defending the timber management policy and the reforestation and the number of trees that had been grown and things of that nature. I listened to him rather carefully, as usual, because I find him interesting, entertaining and provocative.

He stated, for example, that we can expect nature to do the regeneration job to the extent of 65 per cent. A lot of other people disagree with this, but I am going to accept the hon. Minister's comment this afternoon that you can expect nature to do 65 per cent of the regeneration. That means that you must consider artificial regeneration for 35 per cent. Last year's cut was 460,000 acres. Thirty-five per cent of that is 161,000. If you had to have full reforestation, it is at least 1,000 trees per acre and 161,000 acres means 161,000,000 trees.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Wait a minute. There are a lot of other methods of reforestation of a nature beyond just the natural—

Mr. MacDonald: I am aware of that.

Hon. Mr. Roberts:—scarification and all these other things. There are a lot of other elements besides the actual putting in of trees.

Mr. MacDonald: Yes, but I would like this hon. Minister, sir, or some other Minister sometime, to explain what he means, "other than scarification," which is perhaps one of the means of achieving this. I just want to say without going into great length—because I have dealt with this in years gone by—that this government is not meeting its obligations, notwithstanding the hon. Minister's vigorous defence.

For example, I was interested in noting that the number of trees that are produced this year—at least last year—as recorded in the little book that you have given us, is 43 million. My colleague, the hon. member for Fort William put a question on the order paper a little earlier this year. He got a reply to the effect that the number of trees planted on Crown lands in the year 1963-64 was only 30 million. Then he asked the question—

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Forty-three million.

Mr. MacDonald: Forty-three million, I agree, is the total. The number of trees that were planted by private corporations; grown on their nurseries and planted on licensed premises, Mr. Chairman, amounted to 2,204,000, just a shade over two million.

He asked the question as to how many trees six of the major companies had produced. You will find the reply in Hansard. On April 29, for anyone who wants to check on it. It makes very interesting reading: Spruce Falls, 1,022,000; Great Lakes, nil; Marathon, nil; Ontario and Minnesota, nil; Abitibi, nil; Kimberly-Clark, 1,182,000. So that of the six large companies, two of them are doing something. The other four are growing and planting nil on licensed land.

For the hon. Minister to get up and give the vigorous defence he can, in face of that record, I think is just a shocking attempt to cover up the facts. In fact, Mr. Chairman, I went back into the record a few months ago for another purpose and found it rather useful to recall what one of the hon. Minister's predecessors had to say. Back in the year 1956—to be found in Hansard at 1261-62 of that year—the then Minister of Lands and Forests, Mr. Mapledoram, made this comment in reference to an appropriation of $705,000. He said:

This will allow us to prepare for a planning programme of 100 million trees annually, which will conform to the size of the task in hand, and to carry out silviculture treatment of 28,000 to 30,000 acres.

In other words, years ago when we started these discussions—certainly I have been raising it every year with the Minister—we got an admission that 100 million trees a year were necessary for the task at hand. Here we have this year a total of 43 million trees with only 30 million going on Crown land. The figure for last year was 43 million. The figure for the year before was 49 million; the year before that it was 41 million; the year before that it was 33 million; and the year before that it was 25 million.

So, in six or seven years we have crept up into the 40's and we have stalled there. The hon. Minister suggests that we are doing a good job. I suggest that it is nonsense to argue that you are doing a good job. I suggest that it is nonsense to argue that you are doing a good job in the face of these figures.

However, let me get around to the timber management programme, in which the hon. Minister is now in the process of educating himself by reviewing them all. He brought them out for our visual inspection this afternoon.

On page 1061-62 of Hansard of the year 1958, the then Minister of Lands and Forests, Mr. Mapledoram, again had this to say. I invite the hon. Minister to listen to this rather carefully and note the year, 1958:

Now I can say to the hon. members that this year we have the plan—

he has been working to a plan for a long time. This year he had the plan:

—but I do think we now have the basic plan and we are now in the process of getting ready to sign yearly agreements on what shall, or shall not be, done in a specific area. So we have agreed on the principle of one-year contracts and the companies have agreed to go along with us.

That was 1958. Now I tell you, Mr. Chairman, how fast this government moves. This principle and this programme that they agreed on in 1958 took exactly four years to implement. In the year 1962, the hon. Minister's predecessor came into the House and announced that they had implemented a basic switch in policy. Ever since 1953, when there had been amendments to The Crown Timber Act, and when this government had absolved the companies of all responsibility for regeneration on land cut over up until that point, and assumed it as a responsibility for the Crown; from 1953 on there was a responsibility on the company to present its annual cut programme and to present its programme for regeneration.

By 1962 the government had conceded that this was not operating. In fact, we have proof here in figures from the companies that most of them just are not doing anything by way of producing trees for actual reforestation. So, in 1962, the government confessed that in still another chapter they had basically failed. They changed their programme.

Their programme was that they were going to enter into a yearly contract with each company. There was at least this element of logic in it, that the difference in climatic conditions and soil conditions results in a different programme needed for each area. You cannot have a standard that applies all across the board. So, in theory, if the government were moving vigorously, and if you had an annual contract with each company, this might be the logical and the correct way to approach it.

But last year, which was one year after the government had put the new programme into effect, I went through a very tortuous series of questions with the present hon. Minister as to exactly what had happened in that intervening year after the new programme. I believe I have it clarified in rough terms. I want to put the question to the hon. Minister to bring it up to date. There were something like 200 licence limits of at least 50 square miles. If a licence limit is below 50 square miles, apparently this new one-year contract does not apply. Indeed I want to ask the hon. Minister, as my first question, what is the commitment to regeneration if the licensed limit is less than 50 square miles?

However, let me move forward. For the ones that were over 50 square miles, of which there were 200 of them in the province, in the first year of the new programme they had signed precisely 41 agreements. So that 159 of the 200 in that category simply had signed no contracts at all in the first year and we were still drifting. I have two questions to put to the hon. Minister to try to bring this picture up to date. What is the regeneration commitment on the small limits of less than 50 square miles? Second, on the larger limits of over 50 square miles, with how many has he now got a yearly contract?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: The answer, with regard to regeneration of the 50 square mile or less, is that is done by the government itself. There is no obligation on the person who cuts in that smaller area, directly, in that connection, to regenerate.

With regard to the larger picture, which is the important picture, we have been working since the 1962 legislation, which now permits the Minister to enter into agreements with licensees for the purpose of carrying out regeneration work. On January 29, sir, the Treasury board approved such an agreement with one of the larger pulp and paper companies which is now really the basis, or the precedent, from which we will work. This particular agreement provides for cost sharing by the federal government and the company involved, each putting up $15 per thousand trees and the province being responsible for $25 per thousand trees, making a total of $55 per thousand.

Arrangements with respect to spraying in these areas is provided on the same kind of sharing; the company, the federal government and the province in this case will pay $2 each, on a $6 per acre basis. This is, we believe, now a precedent, or a pattern of agreement, which will develop quite rapidly.

We have some 22 of these agreements at the present time—no, I am sorry—two of these agreements at the present time, of these larger ones.

Mr. MacDonald: How many licence holders are there with over 50 square miles?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: How many?

Mr. MacDonald: Yes. We guessed at a figure of 200 last year. I think it is time we got it accurate.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: We have a total of some 51 agreements, applicable to some 6,000 trees. I think that is the overall figure for which my hon. friend is asking.

But the point I want to make, to again reply to what I think my hon. friend—and he may be doing this quite honestly, I am not doubting his honesty, but I think he is moving from a wrong basis.

I have tried to get before this House the fact that we have adequate resources at the present time; far more resources on the hoof, so to speak, in the bush, than there is any demand or any economic market for at the present time. We believe that the system we are using, which gradually will bring us up to 100 per cent completion for what is cut out over a period of some years yet ahead, is far more sensible from an economical standpoint than to try to be there years ahead of time, when already there are all sorts of reserves that are not being cut today that one could go to if one wanted to. Now surely, if it is going to cost $55 a thousand to get this thing done for the future, you do not want to do a whole lot, thousands of those, long before they are needed.

Now that is, in actual practice, the theory to which we are working. We differ very materially in our basis of understanding between the hon. member's view and my view, and I stand by my view.

Mr. MacDonald: May I just make a brief comment, and I do not want to get into a vigorous battle with the hon. Minister—I shall complete my remarks between now and six o'clock.

The hon. Minister is ignoring the case advanced by foresters—and there is a good group of them who are interested in this whole field, who are responsible for the kind of programme that my hon. colleague has put on the record twice already. The basis of their case is that the economic area for cutting close to the mills, accessible to the lake-head area, for example, is increasingly cut off. The cutting is being driven farther back into the hinterland. Now, it is all very well for the hon. Minister to talk about accessible areas, or areas that can be cut and limits that are available and so on, but increasingly they are not the accessible areas.

I understand the different approach that the hon. Minister is putting forward, but I submit to the hon. Minister that his reply is a political reply. The foresters in the field—I am almost tempted to say apart from those in the head office here who have to live with the politicians on this issue—do not agree; and they are disagreeing more and more. However, this is an old theme and I shall leave it there, but I will be back to it next year.

I have one final question to put to the hon. Minister. If the objective was 100 million trees a year, spelled out by his predecessor in 1958 and therefore, I presume, reflecting the thinking of the department, will the hon. Minister explain to me—

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): Not in 1958.

Mr. MacDonald: It was 1958, yes. The objective that was spelled out by the hon. Minister in 1958 was 100 million trees.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: That was before my time and I was Minister in 1958. That was 1956 and the hon. member referred to Mr. Mapledoram.

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. Minister is right. I am sorry, he is right. It was 1956. All right!

The objective—

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Do not blame those who were not responsible for that.

Mr. MacDonald: My question to the hon. Minister is this: If this is the objective, how does he explain to me the fact that there has not been a new forestry station established for the development of seedlings since the year 1958?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Does the hon. member mean a nursery?

Mr. MacDonald: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: For one thing, the capacity of the nurseries has been increased, and there is a very excellent seeding plant up here at Angus which is being opened this summer. I would like my hon. friend to come up and see how they operate up there. That is the seedling plant, not a seedling plant, a seed extraction plant.

Again I come back, and I see it is six o'clock but I am not going to recede one bit, I say that we are doing this business, we are meeting all requirements and we are looking ahead for the normal length of trees. We are going to be able to supply 100 per cent of the needs of this province for the foreseeable future; and that is a sound policy.

Mr. Chairman: It is now 6 of the clock. I will leave the chair and we will resume the debate at 8 o'clock.

It being 6 o'clock, p.m., the House took recess.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF LANDS AND FORESTS

On vote 1107:

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Mr. Chairman, through you to the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests (Mr. Roberts), there are certain things I am concerned with in regard to the timber branch.

I know in my area—and I think it is the same thing in many other sections of northern Ontario—some of the lumber operators, particularly the people who operate sawmills, have been in operation for many years. In fact, I know in my own riding of Nipissing there is a firm that came up there in the early days; they lumbered and cut timber in the district of Parry Sound and then moved northward into Nipissing. It has been a family operation all their lives.

The great problem for them, and other small operators, is to get the timber. I know last fall a block of timber was opened in one of the townships in Nipissing—I believe it was Law township—and it was a pretty good stand of hardwood veneer timber.

I would like to ask the hon. Minister just what was the price paid, and who was the successful tenderer. I believe it was Hay and Company. I would like him to confirm that, and also what price they paid. I understand too there was quite a delay before the successful tenderer was announced. I wondered whether there were any new conditions brought up that caused the delay.

I would like to get first of all, before I continue, just what was the tender price of this company—I think it is Hay and Company in Law township. I do not know just what the number of the contract was.

Hon. A. K. Roberts (Minister of Lands and Forests): It will take a few minutes to get that.

Mr. Troy: There was some report to me that they paid about $40, and I presume it will cost them about $45 more to get the timber out; and then their selling price will be probably about $195, so they make a pretty fair profit. The thing is that these people who go in for the veneer logs are concerned with just the very best of material; then the small operator goes into such an area and much of what is left is just the rag tags, much of his material then is maybe No. 3, the type of lumber on which he does not make very much of a profit.

One thing we must consider too is that these small operators are in certain sections of the province, in the lumber areas, day in and day out. They employ a small number of men the year round and they add to their work force in the wintertime and in the summertime, too. They are an asset to our communities in northern Ontario. I understand at one time there were, I believe in this report of Major General Kennedy of 1947, certain recommendations about these lumber people in order that they might continue in operation. I am not referring to the great big operators the hon. Minister mentioned in his reply to the hon. member for York South (Mr. MacDonald) when he said that only two of them were doing any reforesting themselves. I mean these small people who have been in business for many years; the only way they can stay in business is to have an assurance of getting material to cut.

There are a great number of these jobbers who get licences each year; sometimes I think they use special inducements on occasion to get the licences. They have not any mills themselves, they just get out the good stuff and that is all there is to it.

Again, the problem is in the operation of these small lumber operators. I know one firm that all they can do with the slabs is throw them into the swamp. They could, however, carry out an operation and make use of these slabs, of all this material, if they had a chipper. Of course that is a fairly expensive piece of equipment, and it is not logical that they should spend the money for equipment unless they are assured of a continuing supply of timber.

As I say again, these large operators go in for the most expensive veneer, that is all they are interested in, and these small people have to go in and get the poor stuff.

I know it was mentioned by the hon. Minister earlier today that the Whitman people up on Highway 63 have a very expensive mill. It is a very fine operation. It is all automatic. There are only two men in the mill proper, the sawer and then the fellow who is on the edger. But it is the type of mill that requires practically a 24-hour day operation.

It is fairly expensive to erect and I believe he has to go away up to Lorrain township to get his timber. It is about 30 miles, 30 to 35, from his mill to the junction of Highway 63 and Highway 11. He goes up into Timiskaming, up into Lorrain township, maybe more than 100 miles. So he is transporting his logs to the mill for 150 miles or so.

Another thing that disturbs me is that a number of these big companies have rights to certain areas and the lumber operator, not only does he have to pay stumpage to the department, but he also pays a royalty to the people who have the licences there. I believe Consolidated is one of the outfits which have certain areas in Nipissing. They charge a royalty, I believe, of practically the same amount as paid by the lumbermen to the government. So it is sort of an absentee landlord type of thing. On the other hand, in Nipissing, where the Abitibi have large areas under their control, they do not cut themselves, there are always third party agreements. People get licences or a third party agreement with the Abitibi, but they have to pay a royalty I think of only about $2.50 or $3. But to this other firm, the Consolidated, I think the man who is operating there has to pay $11 or $12. Certainly something should be done about that by the department. There should be some assurance to these people who have been in business for years and years that they can have a yearly supply.

I notice in General Kennedy's report that consideration is taken of that. The trouble is, as I said at the very outset, that an outfit which is just interested in veneer logs goes in and gets the really good stuff and the small operator has to go and clean it up. A lot of it is poor material, at the best third grade. All the high grade is gone. It is highgrade in another way too.

Interjections by hon. members.

An hon. member: Carried!

Mr. Troy: No, no, the vote is not carried. There might be a little bit of callousness here, but I am concerned with small people and small firms in my area.

If I refer to my area, the same thing has happened in all the other areas across this province where there are lumber mills. I want to see that these people who have a stake in this country and a stake in our communities have an opportunity to continue in business.

I do not know what happened to the Abitibi people or how they got so much land. I believe that was in another era and they control all kinds of rights.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Troy: Well, as I say, I do not know, I am not responsible and I am not my brother's keeper in this regard, but I still want to feel that the lumbermen as well as the big pulp men will be able to continue in business.

As the former Minister of Lands and Forests (Mr. Spooner) knows, we have an operation down in Mattawa of the Weyerhaeuser people. They need timber. I understand that it was through the good offices of the former Minister of Lands and Forests that they were able to get the timber, and they need a continuing supply.

Just a moment, Mr. Chairman, I have not said all I have to say about timber.

An hon. member: Carried!

Mr. Troy: No, there are other people that have comments. This is too important an item to just be brushed off with a simple "carried."

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I have for the hon. member for Nipissing information that the Hay and Company licence is D2329 and covers 11.8 square miles in Law township. This was the successful tender. The rates: spruce, $10 per 1,000 board measure; yellow birch, $40 per 1,000 board measure; white birch, $15 per 1,000, and maple, $20. The pulpwood part of it: spruce, $3.50 per cord; balsam, $2 per cord; and white birch, $1.50 per cord.

Mr. Troy: The only thing Hay and Company was interested in, I understood, was the $40 stuff, the really good, choice stuff. Then somebody goes out and cleans up and it just happens that much of the material is, as the hon. Minister said, $1.50. There must be, as I say again, in the department, a policy so that these small lumber people who are operating—not just jobbers, but people who have been in business for years and years—still have their plants. They want to continue and they want to take advantage of all the materials of the log, including the slab. In order to get some profit out of that they have to have equipment, like a chipper, and that costs money. So they cannot commit themselves to outlays, such as for a chipper, unless they are assured that there will be a continuing supply to them.

Then again they want consideration on this system of royalties to big operators who have a lot of timber and who do not cut it themselves, but allow other people to do so under a third party agreement. The latter have to pay practically as much to these lumber people as they do to the government.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I would like to say this. Third party agreements are under the supervision of the department and the rates that are fixed there are rates that we have to look into. If they are excessive we cut them down. That is the practice that we go on.

This is a competitive area. Some of these older areas where there were a lot of sawmills originally—probably more than there should have been—were one of the reasons that we put this Act through this year. It was to keep a closer control over the number of mills in an area in relation to the amount of timber that is there. We cannot make the timber in those areas, but as I said earlier, there is ample timber if the people want it. They can go to the areas where it can be obtained, and I am speaking of areas within the economic perimeter.

I think in the North Bay area, close in, perhaps they are at the point of saturation, as they might be in some parts of the Port Arthur area. Over a period of time they will come back in again, but the areas farther afield should also be cut if there is a certain demand. The market is limited and we do not just want our timber going to rot because people cannot get it close in. They have to sharpen their pencils and sharpen their wits and operate in the most modern way and at the best pricing possible and help to make the more remote areas economic in this competitive field.

Mr. Troy: Another question, Mr. Chairman. There is an operator who has a mill in my riding but his home is in the riding of the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. A. Johnston). I understand he made arrangements with The Department of Lands and Forests timber branch people to get a certain block. Then when it was checked out with the district office it was found out that there is a road in there, which one of the year-by-year operators had built several years ago. The question was, would they give the applicant the permit and let him use the road that someone else built?

It is on Crown land. Does an operator who goes in and puts a road in for an operation, control it in perpetuity? Can someone else not go in and use that road?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Can the hon. member identify the area about which he was speaking?

Mr. Troy: The person who wanted the timber was a Mr. Larochelle. The hon. member for Parry Sound was discussing it with me and usually his problems are of kindred concern to his constituents as well as mine. Mr. Larochelle of Callander, has a mill at Mud Lake. If the road into that block of timber that is left was put in by a jobber two or three years ago, does he still have a right to hold the timber just because he put a road in?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: As a matter of fact, if the cut is finished and the party's licence is out and he has left the area, he has no claim to the road. On the other hand, if he is continuing his cut and has put the road in at his own expense, he would have—

Mr. Troy: That is reasonable and that is what I hope. So that the man will—

Some hon. members: Carried.

Mr. Troy: No, no. There is more.

Mr. Chairman: The Minister of Mines.

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): Mr. Chairman, I rise in this debate to congratulate the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests. I have noticed what a much different man he is since he took over Lands and Forests, he really has a great sense of humour.

I was up in the district of Mr. Chairman a little while ago—the Fort Frances district—and he was telling a meeting there that any time you caught a fish in Rainy Lake that was less than 24 inches between the eyes, you threw it back in. The Minnesota governor from Minneapolis was there and he said, "You know, I hear you have a Department of Economics and Development." He said, "They go a long way in what they attract to Canada and how they label the Canadian goods." He said, "I was fishing in Lake Superior not so long ago and caught a six-pound trout and I noticed a little metal tag on its fin. I looked at it very closely and it said, 'Made in Ontario.'"

Those are stories that they tell up in that area, and I want to compliment the hon. Minister on his sense of humour.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): The hon. Minister said that in speaking about fish and wildlife a couple of hours ago.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: I know, but I am speaking on vote 1107. I will come to that and tell the hon. member something about timber.

I want to congratulate the hon. Minister on the fine job he is doing and I also want to say a word about the staff of The Department of Lands and Forests. My association in running sawmills and taking out ties goes back over many years, as these gentlemen know. I know the deputy Minister, who has been a very faithful servant of this department for more years than I can remember, is a man that any government would be proud to have as a servant. I can look around me here at a group of men that I worked with for many years. When I hear criticism levelled at them, and the way they have run the timber industry in this province, I know it certainly stems from insufficient knowledge on the part of those who make the charges.

I think that I am entitled to speak on timber because in my area there are some ten pulp and paper mills. If any hon. member can match that I would like to see where he is. Six of those mills are right in my own constituency. They are big mills, employing hundreds and hundreds of men—thousands, I would say, when you consider that both in the bush and the mill they turn out about $225 million of wooden gold every year for this province.

I will go on to say, certainly they make mistakes. We all do. But these are mistakes that are corrected. They are made because they are striving at all times to better the pulp and paper and the sawmilling industries in this province. I heard the hon. member for Nipissing speak about chippers. Right in my own city the Northern Wood Preservers have enormous chippers. There is not one thing wasted in that log, not even the bark. It is used for making liquor for the pulp mills for certain glues they use.

My friend, the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Freeman), mentioned reforestation, and I agree with him on many matters. The hon. Minister agrees as well. We know that reforestation is necessary, and great strides have been made in that field. When the hon. member for York South got up and talked about 43 million trees being planted by the government he forgot to take in the many trees that the companies plant themselves—and the Boy Scout camps and other organizations that plant trees. He does not know anything about that. How could he know when he sits in Toronto 95 per cent of his time. He reads criticism in the papers, in books and so on, and takes it for granted. If he would go out and get some practical knowledge we would probably listen to him a lot more.

Mr. Bryden: He got an answer from the department on that point.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Just for a minute, Mr. Chairman, speaking of timber, I would like to take the minds of some of the Opposition back to when I first started in the sawmilling business in Port Arthur. That was in the 1930s. I was an alderman in the city of Port Arthur.

We had at that time to give tax concessions to the Abitibi mill in our city and the Provincial Paper Mill in order to get a very few manhours per day for our men. These were tax concessions from the city to keep those mills running part time. The Liberals, my hon. friends, were in power in Ontario until 1943, when Premier Drew came in. He established the policy of no more export of raw pulpwood. Do you remember that? That is something that my party can be proud of.

It is the reason why there are ten pulp and paper mills working in my district when there was only one, which was not running, at the time the 1943 election was held. That policy has proved one of the greatest things that this government ever did in this province for the development of this great pulpwood industry which is pouring, as I say, $225 million into our area.

We talk about the sawmilling business, about Northern Wood Preservers, Seaman's big mill at Hudson and in Port Arthur; the hon. member for Kenora's (Mr. Gibson's) riding where there are fine sawmills; and down in Fort Frances there is a pulp mill and so on. Why? Because timber is supplied to all these mills so they can turn out wood products. It is the reason why The Department of Lands and Forests of Ontario should be given full credit and its men given full credit for doing a marvellous job in every facet of that industry.

When I hear criticism about petty things, petty little things that do not mean anything, it is simply clouding the issue, which is really a very fine picture of development. They make mistakes. We all do. But certainly the benefits they bring to this province far outweigh any mistakes that they may make.

Mr. R. M. Whicher (Bruce): Just do not say anything about my park.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: No. Well, there is one thing the hon. member must remember. When you get a promise from a Minister on this side of the House, you can bank on it being fulfilled.

There is, Mr. Chairman, at the present time, the greatest upsurge in the pulp and paper business and in sawmilling in this province that this province has ever seen. I know that is so. A tremendous upsurge. And I think The Department of Lands and Forests, and its staff, are largely responsible. I want to thank them for the help they have always extended to me in my work in this province. All I wish to say to them is keep up the good work because this government is always behind the ladies and gentlemen in that department.

There are two or three things I would like to mention to the hon. members, two or three things that the hon. member for York South chastised me for saying in this House. There is the $31 million addition to the new mill being built in Fort William plus a $31 million addition to the Great Lakes Paper Company. The hon. member for Fort William knows all about it. It is a marvellous addition to this industry, a large addition costing millions is being built to the Provincial Paper mill in my own city.

Also Marathon Paper has a large addition there and a new sawmill; and Seaman's sawmill at the Lakehead, on the lakeshore in Port Arthur, a $14.5 million expansion of the plant of Domtar Ltd. Newprint at Red Rock, just a little east of my city; a $550,000 sawmill and chipping plant for Jim Mathieu Lumber Company at Sapawe, just a little west of me; a $1.25 million process conversion programme at the Ontario Minnesota Pulp and Paper Company Limited at Kenora.

Many of these things the hon. Minister of Economics and Development (Mr. Randall) mentioned previously. We are now making vehicles up there for harvesting and hauling of trees, pressure-treated timber, jute and plastic bags, new grades of fine paper, and new types of paper bags. All these things have become reality due to the policy of The Department of Lands and Forests of this government.

I thank you, Mr. Chairman, for letting me make these few remarks. These are factual things which have already been accomplished. So, gentlemen, when you criticize over on that side of the House that the pulp and paper and timber business is going to pieces, just read your figures properly. Get some knowledge and you will not get up on your feet and say the things you do.

Mr. Troy: Well, as somebody has said the hon. Minister of Mines is the anchor man on this team.

An hon. member: Do not be too hard on him.

Mr. Troy: Sir, I would like to ask the hon. Minister: In the report of General Kennedy, he had recommended that there must be at least six million acres in southern Ontario that should be reforested because it is not suitable for other purposes. I can remember, as I mentioned before in this House years and years ago, hearing the dean of forestry at the University of Toronto say that there are vast acres, many square miles of land, particularly in the Muskoka, Parry Sound and Nipissing area that should be taken out of agricultural production and reforested.

As I have also mentioned, I have seen the forests in Europe. They are regular parks and they have been harvesting timber there for centuries, even away back to the Roman days. Still their yield per acre is much ahead of ours. I just wonder what was done in regard to reforestation of areas in many sections of southern Ontario and sections of northern Ontario that should not be agricultural lands at all but should be reforested.

The problem now is that the department of conservation, which had a happy place in The Department of Lands and Forests, is taken over by some department altogether. It got off the rails in a certain department and then it was put into Lands and Forests, which I think is its natural habitat, but now it is in Energy and Resources Management. Conservation has many relations with your department, but I presume the charge was not your responsibility. It comes under the department or the conservation authority.

Mr. A. H. Cowling (High Park): This is the timber vote!

Mr. Troy: I do not know what you are talking about.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bryden: Is the hon. Minister going to comment on what the hon. member has said?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I would merely make this comment, and this is repetitious to some extent, as I said it in another context earlier. If the timber resources of Ontario were in the centre of Europe, we should have every stick of the whole 2.7 million cubic feet of it used up; we should have no problem at all. But we are over here on another hemisphere with much freer breathing space and I would rather be here looking for markets than over there in the centre of Europe with all this timber.

So far as the plant of trees on private lands is concerned, if the hon. member will take a look at page 148 of this 1964 pamphlet, which was distributed yesterday, he will see the disposition of nursery stock. He will see that a very large amount of it is going into forests managed by the department in southern Ontario for the most part. He will see that a lot of trees are planted on private lands—9.5 million or so in the last year, recorded there. This is going on all over the province.

Mr. Chairman, we are not neglecting one single section of the whole 22 districts in which we are operating.

Mr. Troy: I just asked a simple question. Do not get riled.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I hasten to rise, in case the last remark from the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests might precipitate the hon. Minister of Mines into rising again. I understand on reliable authority that after the next election he is planning to run for president of the civil service association.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I would like at this time to refer once again, and when I use the term "once again" I am referring to a series of sessions, to the thorny question of licences or permits granted to settlers. This matter has been before the House on several occasions in the past year. Unfortunately it is necessary to raise it again because the explanation and answers given by the Ministers in past years were far from satisfactory.

The matter has a special urgency at this time, Mr. Chairman, because it is a part of a much larger problem which I referred to at some length under the estimates of The Department of the Attorney General. It is an integral part of the present condition of labour unrest that exists in the Kapuskasing area of northern Ontario, and has existed there for a year or two.

It is unfortunate that this present situation exists. The union that operates in this industry—the Lumber and Sawmills Workers Union—is a union with a long record of achievements to its credit. In fact, I believe that until the unfortunate occurrences of a year or so ago, it had not had a single strike since 1946, even though we all know it operates in an industry in which problems of labour relations are of more than average difficulty. Because of negligence and mismanagement by this government and several of its departments, the situation was created in which a strike occurred a year and a half ago. We all know that in the course of that strike some most unfortunate occurrences took place, culminating in the death by shooting of three men.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have detailed what I consider to be the responsibility of The Attorney General's Department in this area. I will not deal with that phase, but there is another important phase and that is the matter of settlers' permits or licences. Fundamentally, the mishandling by The Department of Lands and Forests of this question over the years has been a major cause of discontent and tension in that area and we cannot—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order, order!

Mr. Bryden: We will not restore the sort of harmony and good spirit that is essential to good labour relations until this issue is satisfactorily resolved. Last year the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests made a fairly lengthy statement of the policy of his department in this field. I would say that this statement—and I have read it again today—describes the situation as it exists in the mind of God sitting in head office in Toronto. It does not describe the situation that exists in the field, according to information that I have received.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bryden: I will in a few moments, Mr. Chairman, place before this House detailed information to indicate how the policy of the department, as declared by the hon. Minister, is not in fact carried out in the field. I would say to this House that what is happening and what has been happening for some time in relation to the issue of settlers' licences in the Kapuskasing area, has been to create a situation whereby the major pulp companies, acting through jobbers, can exploit settlers to undermine the bargaining position of their own employees. They apparently do it without any interference from The Department of Lands and Forests—if not with the blessing of that department.

The pulp companies are using the settlers to undermine the employees, and even worse, they have pitted settler against wage-earner to the point where—

Mr. Chairman Order! In my opinion, settlers' licences in relation to the cutting of pulp wood, and the timber operations of the pulp and paper mill in that area should be dealt with on that basis and not on any other basis. There are two separate identities.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I would suggest to you, though, that you cannot isolate the consequences of a policy from the policy itself.

Mr. R. A. Eagleson (Lakeshore): It is The Department of Labour.

Mr. Bryden: This has nothing to do with The Department of Labour. There are aspects of this problem that are clearly of great interest to The Department of Labour, but the policy relating to the issue of timber licences is strictly a policy of The Department of Lands and Forests, and The Department of Lands and Forests has to take the consequences of what I would describe as the maladministration of its policy.

Mr. Whicher: They are all against you.

Mr. Bryden: That is nothing new. Whenever they are against me, I know that I am on the right track.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I would like to indicate, as briefly as I can, the policy of the department as outlined by the hon. Minister, and then show what I think are its deficiencies. To avoid the possibility of misrepresenting him, I am going to quote some extracts from what he said to this House last year, on February 20. I will start by quoting a sentence from page 874 of the Hansard for that day:

In a limited number of sections of northern Ontario where the land has been settled relatively recently, as an aid to the annual income to be gained by a settler, The Department of Lands and Forests instituted into government policy a system for the cutting of wood on Crown lands by settlers.

He also indicated on page 876 that:

In the regulations as to eligibility it is pointed out that the widows are considered as a permanently incapable settler class and that particular class is entitled to come under this scheme to a certain extent.

So far, I do not think anybody could object to the policy. The department has attempted to aid settlers. The original purpose of the policy—let us put it this way—was to aid settlers by licensing them to cut a limited amount of pulp wood in the off season so that they could supplement their income in the period when there was nothing else coming into their households. I think that the normal policy is to limit the amount that any one settler is licensed to cut to 100 cords.

Now, the hon. Minister also outlined another aspect of policy and—

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Is that right or wrong? Is that good or bad that those widows get the contracts?

Mr. Bryden: I said that the purposes of the policy are unexceptionable. I have no objection to the purposes. It is the application that I object to, for reasons that I will indicate in a moment.

A second phase or further development of this policy is, I think, fairly outlined in the following extracts from the hon. Minister's statement of last year, which I will quote:

The department in its cutting licence rights to the pulp company would require that the latter buy from the settlers certain quantities of the timber.

In other words, it not only gave cutting rights to the settler but it also tried to arrange that there would be a market for his product. And in elaboration of this policy the hon. Minister explained somewhat more fully further down on page 875:

It will be seen therefore at once that the operation I have outlined is to see that these settlers have an opportunity of disposing of some pulp wood to the mills. Then someone familiar with the logging business, the hon. leader, referred to this—the hon. gentleman referred to was Mr. Wintermeyer, the then leader of the Opposition:

—the hon. leader referred to this, but I think he had a wrong slant on it, and I would ask him to please pay attention to this because I believe this is the actual situation—someone familiar with the logging business—such as, for example, some small licensee operating in a township himself, or some settler or contractor—knowing the capacity of other settlers in the township area concerned, would ascertain in any given year the number of settlers in his area who had qualified for cutting 100 cords of wood from the Crown land in the Kapuskasing management area. He would then discuss the matter with the pulp company concerned—in this particular case the Spruce Falls Pulp and Paper Company—and obtain from that company the required number of cords—they used the card system—which would represent the willingness of the company to buy 100 cords as per each card from one of the settlers through the head of the group, on the understanding that The Department of Lands and Forests would indicate its approval on the cards.

This card would be presented to the department along with the attendance by the bona-fide licensees in person—the ones to be covered by the group of cards—and these licences would then be made out to the individual bona-fide licensee. Cards would be stamped with the approval of the government and the cards would be handed to the company. The licences would go to the bona-fide settlers. The group leader for his work and services would make an arrangement with the licensee for some charge.

We now see the element of company control. A settler cannot get a licence unless he has a card from the company. The company hands the cards out to certain agents who act as brokers. So the original policy now becomes a policy whereby a settler, we are told, may get a licence if he can get a card from a broker who, in turn, has got it from the company.

This has led to the exploitation of the settlers. These brokers have a control over the situation.

The net result is that the company pays much less to settlers than it would have to pay when it harvests its own timber through its own employees. I believe the figures are something like this: The cost to the company of harvesting its own timber with its own employees is about $28 to $30, whereas the settlers get somewhere around $16, $18, or $20. These poor fellows are exploited. Their need is taken advantage of to undercut, as I said, the employees of the company and weaken their bargaining position.

However, the matter becomes more—shall I say the trap—becomes even tighter in view of the way in which the policy of issuing licences is administered. Now, sir, the hon. Minister in his statement last year outlined it in a way that one could not object to—and I would like to refer to what he said. But before I do that, I would like to quote a relevant section from The Crown Timber Act; section 16, subsection one provides:

A licence shall not be assigned, pledged or charged without the consent in writing of the Minister, and permission to cut timber on a licensed area shall not be granted by a licensee without the consent in writing of the Minister, and he is not under any circumstances bound to give such consent and he may impose such terms and conditions as he deems proper.

Subsection two—an assignment, pledge or charge of the licence for permission to cut on a licensed area does not have any force or validity unless the Minister has consented thereto in writing.

That is the statutory provision, Mr. Chairman, and if it were observed it would guarantee that the original policy was actually carried out in accordance with its original intent. That was to give a certain supplement to bona-fide settlers.

The hon. Minister in his statement last year amplified what is contained in the statute. He explained it as follows:

In normal cases it would be expected that the settler licensee would do his own cutting and he might even do his own skidding. He might also do his own hauling, although it would not follow necessarily. In some cases he would not even do his skidding, and in some few cases for reasons that would have to be satisfactory in the long run to the government he might not cut all the allowable cut himself. Or he might arrange under exceptional circumstances, for someone else to do the cutting.

In the latter case he would probably make the type of deal that would enable him to make a small profit in the transaction. This, of course, would be the exception to the practice.

The licence issued by the department would not be assignable. If a settler for some good reason could not complete his cut—for example, if he had an accident—he could possibly get the department at the local level to issue a new licence to some bona-fide settler.

So the hon. Minister's own explanation of the statute and the policy of the department is that permits are issued to settlers and it is expected that the cutting will be done by the settlers themselves. Only in quite exceptional circumstances would there be any variation from that practice.

If this practice had been followed, as I say, I think the original intent would have been carried out. However, it is interesting to see what has happened. To some degree this is indicated in the hon. Minister's own statement. Continuing from where I left off reading, he said:

In the season 1962-63, that is from April 1, 1962, to date, licences—and there is a parenthesis here:

—now I have got three different types of licences so I am giving these figures in groups—under the group system I have just mentioned were issued for a total of 27 groups, 440 licences. In addition to that, certain store co-operative groups received a total, in six groups, of 101 licences. I might say that these general store co-operative groups are made up of general stores along Highway 11 which helped to finance the settlers concerned and they themselves sometimes do some of the work such as hauling. It is a co-operative effort—

Mr. Chairman, I would like to interject here that the so-called co-operatives have nothing to do with co-operatives in the sense in which the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Oliver) would understand them. They are not co-operatives, they are the old company store deal. A man in a store gets a bunch of permits, which are supposed to be issued to settlers, but he in effect gets control over them. Then he has a bunch of men to cut the permits. The hon. Minister said a little later that in total, 706 licences for pulpwood and saw logs were issued in the period, and 652 of the licences were pulpwood licences. He also said:

I would also stress, in explaining this system, the fact that the department, through its inspectors, knows pretty well from time to time who is doing the cutting. If they have reason to believe that there is in any particular case a series of transactions not in keeping with the regulations and the purpose of these cutting permits, they restrict or cancel or refuse to renew the permits.

This is the idyllic situation painted by the hon. Minister in his statement last year. It was a prepared statement and I have no doubt he gave careful consideration to it and he intended it to represent the policy of the department.

So what are the facts, Mr. Chairman? I have here a list of 35 specific instances in the cutting year 1962-63, to which the hon. Minister was referring, where cutting was not done by the people to whom the permits were issued. Furthermore, some of these instances refer to more than one permit, so the number of permits involved is substantially more than 35; I have not counted them, but it is probably about 70. I also have in my hand a list of 180 instances in the 1962-63 season where licences were issued apparently in contravention of The Crown Timber Act, the regulations and the hon. Minister's stated policy. Yet the hon. Minister says the department is right on top of this situation and would know if anything were wrong.

In reference to these two lists, Mr. Chairman, which I will deal with in greater detail in a moment, I would like to make it clear that the people who gathered the information incorporated into these lists had no special powers of inquiry. They were simply people living in the area who found out what they could from their knowledge of people in the area. Obviously they would not have discovered all cases of the type that I am referring to. Nevertheless they would discover some.

But they had no facilities for conducting an exhaustive inquiry and therefore the lists could not possibly be exhaustive. Therefore, I think we should consider these lists not only as important in themselves, but perhaps even more important, as indicative of a widespread situation which is quite out of accord with the idyllic picture painted by the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests.

Take, first of all, the first list that I referred to, the list of instances my informants were able to discover where cutting was not done by the licensee, notwithstanding the announced policy of the department.

Arthur Beauvais, permit No. 17299, was sold to Frank Gallant. Philippe Briere of Val Rita cut the permit as Mr. Beauvais was working as a blacksmith in Frank Gallant's camp. Mr. Beauvais sold his permit for $150. Mr. Briere was paid $7 a cord for cutting.

Rosaire and Michel Boily, permit Nos. 17758 and 17757, both were working at Camp 78, Spruce Falls, and Gilles Boily cut the permits.

Fernand Boisvert was employed at Spruce Falls mill. He got a permit as a settler and hired Roland Castonguay to cut it.

Yvon Brisson obtained a settler's permit and sold it to J. E. Tremblay. Mr. Brisson was working in the camps. A Mr. Gaston Brixhe cut the permit.

Mrs. Yvonne Morin sold her permit to Gagnon of Mattice—Permit No. 17512. Gagnon hired Gaston Brunet at $8 per cord to cut same.

Jean Louis Cantin's Permit No. 17025, was sold to Ulysses Tremblay. Mr. Cantin was employed by Spruce Falls Woods. Lionel Gagnon at a rate of $7 per cord cut the permit.

Gerard St. Pierre's and Marie-Rose Laflamme's permits were sold to Gagnon of Mattice.

It is interesting to note, Mr. Chairman, how the same names keep recurring as the purchasers of these permits. They sold the permits to Gagnon at Mattice; Alfred Carrier and Antonio Carrier were hired to cut the permits at $8 per cord.

Mrs. Marguerita Bois' Permit No. 17225, was sold to Gagnon of Mattice and cut by Camille Carrier.

Bernard Gagnon's Permit No. 17051, was cut by Florian Carrier and Romeo Carrier at $8 per cord.

Gerard Charlebois was employed by Val Cote Co-op, and his brother Cyrille and Andre Leduc cut his permit.

Emile Duclos was cutting settlers' permits for Charles d'Amours at $7 per cord. He did not know whose permits he was cutting.

Edgar Landry was employed by Spruce Falls and obtained a permit. Edgar Duguay cut it at $7 per cord.

Real Fortier and his father Gaston of Hallebourg cut at least four settlers' permits at $7.25 per cord. They were hired by the Hallebourg Co-op.

These co-ops, as you will recall, Mr. Chairman, are not genuine co-ops at all; they consist of storekeepers who in effect traffic in these permits.

Mrs. Louis Philippe Latulippe's permit, No. 17479, was cut by Gaetan Garneau at $7.50 per cord. Mr. Latulippe was contracting from other settlers.

Emile Leduc's permit, No. 17480, a crippled man on welfare—

Mr. Cowling: Mr. Chairman, I wonder just on a point of information, are there quite a few names? If there is, could I suggest that it be tabled instead of reading if it is 120 names?

Mr. Bryden: No, this one is a short one, I am not going to read the other one.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, on a point of privilege, it seems that conditions here tonight are like the matinée on Saturday afternoon while the movie is on. I would like to hear what the hon. member for Woodbine has to say. I am close to him but I still have difficulty in hearing him because there is so much disturbance. Regardless of what we feel about the proceedings here, nevertheless we must remember it is the Legislature and we do not want to have it, as I say, like a matinée at the Capitol Theatre on Saturday afternoon.

Mr. Chairman: Please continue!

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, some hon. gentlemen a few minutes ago were suggesting that I was making charges without anything to back them up. Now that I am giving them the evidence, they do not want to hear it. This figures. It is nothing new.

Ernest Trepanier, who is a trapper, had a permit and hired Harmel Desbiens and Florian Gervais at $8 per day to help cut the wood allotted by permit.

Paul Legault hired Hector Guindon to cut his permit No. 17033 at $7 per cord. I have no doubt that is a very common French name, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman: Would the member sit down? How many more names have you got to read off?

Mr. Bryden: I have given about half of them, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman: Would you not consider submitting these names and placing them on the order table?

Mr. Bryden: Well, I am prepared to put them on the table, Mr. Chairman. I would like these particular names to be on the record. I have another list of 180 names and I will assure you that I am not going to read that list. But I will place a copy of it on the table, or give it to the hon. Minister as you may direct, sir.

Mr. Troy: If this concerns trafficking in licences, I think it should be heard.

Mr. Bryden: I cannot remember which one I left off at. If hon. members would stop interrupting me, it would not take so long.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bryden: Fidele Hebert, with permit No. 17145, receives $180 per month pension. Frank Gallant bought the permit and it was cut by Alfred Hebert at $7 per cord.

H. Mailloux sold his permit to Frank Gallant and it was cut by Maurice Hebert.

Alex Landry, holding permit No. 17117, was working for Spruce Falls Woods and his brother Alexie did the cutting.

Etienne Lelievre, with permit No. 17154, is an old-age pensioner. This permit was sold to Ulysses Tremblay and cut by Roger Lanteigne at $7 per cord.

Herve Leduc, permit No. 17459, was helped to cut by Andre Leduc. Andre Leduc also cut on the permits of Gerard Charlebois, Cyrille Charlebois, Herve Leduc and Armand Charlebois at $7.50 per cord. All the permits were bought by the Val Cote Co-op.

Jean Paul Leclerc's permit No. 17672 was cut by Renald Leduc at $7.50 per cord. Val Cote Co-op bought the permit. Mr. Leclerc could not cut his permit as he was employed by The Department of Highways.

Jean Denis Vallee's permit No. 17202 was sold to Gagnon of Mattice and cut by Eddy Letourneau at $7 per cord. Mr. Vallee was a contractor on hauling.

Gishlain Levesque cut unknown settlers' permits for Val Rita Co-op.

Rejean Nolet's permit No. 17667 and Simon Nolet's permit No. 17666 were cut by Germain Nolet, and Mattice Co-op was the buyer.

Arthur Garreau's permit No. 17444 was cut by Edward Pelletier and Frank Gallant was the buyer.

Lionel Couture's permit No. 17677 was cut by Jean Paul Provencal and Val Cote Co-op was the buyer.

Anatole Beauvais was employed at the Spruce Falls mill and the permit was cut by Albert Rousseau.

Donat Hebert's permit was cut by Romeo Saindon of Mattice.

Adelard Vallee was employed by the Newaygo Timber Company and his permit was cut by his brother, Ernest, for $8 per cord.

Sante DiPrimio's permit was cut by Rene Lamontagne and Odillon Lamontagne of Hallebourg. Mr. DiPrimio was employed by Newaygo Timber Company Limited and had no time to cut his permit.

Luc Nolet, holder of permit No. 17461, sold his permit to Mattice Co-op. He was paid $8 per cord by the Co-op for cutting same.

Lucien Michaud of Val Rita sold his permit to the Val Rita Co-op and was paid $6.50 per cord to cut same.

The co-ops and the brokers are the worst violators in the buying of permits.

Mr. Fillion of Departure Lake is one of the worst violators. We have unsigned reports that a family of four sons, along with the father, each received a 100-cord permit. Mr. Fillion employs moonlighters and school children to cut these permits that he buys.

The above are only a few cases of the selling and buying of settler permits. Although it is pronounced in the Kapuskasing area, all other areas such as Cochrane, Devonshire, Val Gagne, Matheson, Timmins, and so on, are just as bad.

Mr. Chairman, I now turn to the other list that I referred to. It is a list of 180 permits which, as far as I can see, without being a skilled practitioner in the law or anything approaching that, were issued in contravention of the Act and the regulations and the announced policy of the department in that they did not go to settlers who needed this supplementary income to maintain them. I will not read all of them, but I would like to take one or two examples, or rather several examples, from the list. And I will either give the copy of the whole statement to the hon. Minister or put it on the table.

The first one on the list is Mrs. Georges Alig of Moonbeam, Ontario, licence No. 24321, who draws mother's allowance and therefore is not eligible for a permit. Then, her son Florion Alig of Moonbeam, Ontario, holder of 24462, works for the Spruce Falls Pulp and Paper Company.

Through the list there are many who work for the Spruce Falls Pulp and Paper Company, or in some cases for Abitibi and various other employers in the area. They are not settlers in need of money to supplement their income over the year. They are employees. In fact, one of them, a man called Donat Bernard, has a year-round job with The Department of Highways. Why would a settler's permit be issued to a man in that category?

Some of them do not even live in the area.

Although the policy is supposed to apply to settlers in the area, one of them is the owner of the Fauquier Hotel. On what conceivable basis would a settler's permit be issued to a hotel owner? Another was issued to a woman. We heard the hon. Minister's explanation, which was reasonable as far as it went, that there was a policy of issuing permits to widows of settlers. I would certainly not object to that. But here we have one issued to a woman, Rolande Dumais, whose husband works at a mill. She is not a widow; she has a husband who has a job. This is permit No. 24317.

And so we go, Mr. Chairman, through much the same sort of cases, where people with regular jobs got settlers' permits ostensibly for the purpose of supplementing their income so that they could carry on as settlers. It is this laxity on the part of the department by which permits, apparently, are issued, almost broadcast. That — plus its policy that is ostensibly for the purpose of ensuring there is a market for the cut, but actually enables the companies to get control of the permits through brokers representing the companies — is the way the vise is tightened on the workers in the area, and on the settlers themselves.

What happens is that a man gets a job cutting for $7 a cord. He does not get the permit at all. He is hired by somebody else to cut a permit. Frequently the person who hires him is a co-op. I am suggesting to the hon. Minister that it is high time this situation were cleaned up. I would repeat that it is urgent for it to be cleaned up now, because the situation in the Kapuskasing area is still explosive. There is much resentment as a result of the grotesque handling by The Attorney General's Department of certain prosecutions following the deaths of three men. I appealed to the government previously, and many people have appealed to it, to set up a Royal commission to inquire into—

Mr. Chairman: Order, order!

Mr. Bryden: Just a minute, Mr. Chairman—to inquire into the whole matter, including the policy of The Department of Lands and Forests with regard to settlers permits. It is quite clear that the government is not going to set up a Royal commission. It will give no reason for its refusal, but it is not going to do it. I do not think it has a good reason. Many valid reasons have been presented to it and it simply sloughs them off, it pays no attention to them. So we will not get a Royal commission but I would make this one appeal, Mr. Chairman:

Would the government please do something while there is still time, about this disgraceful policy, which I have just outlined, so that at least this source of discontent can be removed in the future and in the negotiations which are now coming up the workers will not feel that they have this hanging over their heads?

Mr. Chairman: Order, order!

Mr. Bryden: Well, Mr. Chairman, this is a completely integral part — this permit system—

Mr. Chairman: I would ask the member to sit down. We are dealing with the policy of timber management and no other item.

Mr. Bryden: And I am saying that the policy of timber management of this government gives a weapon to the pulp and paper companies, which they have used to the detriment of their workers. If the policy is not changed, the workers will next go into negotiations with a threat hanging over their heads, which will certainly not create the sort of spirit that will produce harmonious settlement of their negotiations. I think this is a most desperately urgent matter, Mr. Chairman, and I would appeal to the hon. Minister to do something to rectify it.

I will now place on the table the documents from which I was quoting.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to spend very much time on this type of barrage of bulk statements thrown together with practically no weight behind them whatsoever. We were listening, perhaps, to the battle of Cochrane South last September. It is possible that these very comments were gleaned from the representative of the party for which my hon. friend stood in the election last September; but at any rate the winner in the election is over here. He speaks for the people of Cochrane North, and the candidate for the NDP was a very poor third, beating the Social Credit candidate only. Now that was pretty well settled on the local level and the local front at that time.

However, as far as this story and this situation is concerned, the forebears of the people who were there and did that voting went in there and opened up that country and went through a period when this was all part of the life of the community. You would go in there and knock it all out overnight! Well, we are not going to do any such thing, and you might as well understand that now.

We have talked with the representatives of the Lumber and Sawmill Workers and we get along very well with them. They do not need spokesmen like the hon. member in this House, who is doing them a disservice if he only knew it. We have taken the lists of names that have been submitted and they have been checked. Here is something more like the facts, instead of what the hon. member for Woodbine has been saying here: From the investigation of these 180 names, we found that in the department—and the deputy was responsible as well as the rest on this; and he is not the type of man who has very much wool pulled over his eyes—we found that 11 persons who had received district cutting licences were not eligible. They are classified as “steadily employed and not living on their patented lot six” “old age or invalid and not living on their patented lot five,” for a total of 11. And that is the fact, not all these figures and these names that the hon. member has been carrying all over the record here for the last half-hour.

Of the permits that were issued and involved, 1.5 per cent were cancelled. That represents the percentage and nothing like what the hon. member has been saying. It is nice to hear from over there what the hon. member thinks of the people of that area making a few extra dollars out of this type of work. We think they are entitled to do it and we are going to see that they get a fair shake as they have had in the past.

Several hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. Roberts: We are dealing in this matter on a reasonable basis and in the atmosphere in which we are dealing today, $22 is the price, not the figures the hon. member quoted for cutting. Eight hundred and twenty-seven permits were issued this winter and there has not been a single complaint with respect to the cutting that went on this year and we think that is a big improvement. That is the way to handle the situation, not screaming from the roof tops as the hon. member is doing, and particularly not knowing enough to stop, even when the decisions have been made at almost every level except his own.

Mr. Bryden: I think the violence of the hon. Minister's reply is an index of the validity of my point. Obviously he has very little of an answer. His whole fine statement of last year has been exploded higher than a kite by facts placed on the record. Of course, he goes off on his typical diversion, he wants to relate it to the election campaign, he wants to assert the proposition that might is right and that facts can be battered down if somebody happens to win an election. This is an ancient device by this government, but it does not alter the fact that facts are facts and they cannot be obscured in that manner. The hon. Minister has done everything possible to throw up a smokescreen, but the facts are still here.

He has said that I got these names from certain people of the same political viewpoint as mine in the constituency concerned. I will tell him that I did not get them from that source. He has told me that the Lumber and Sawmill Workers Union is a reliable union, which it is, and that it has been in contact with the government, which it has on many occasions, and that I should get information from them.

Well, I would like to inform the hon. Minister, Mr. Chairman, that the information I presented to the House came from the Lumber and Sawmill Workers Union and I think they know what they are talking about. I think they have sources through which they can get reliable information, and it was on the strength of that conviction that I undertook to read these cases into the record. The hon. Minister cannot get out from under by this sort of diversion. These are facts, they are solid facts, and—

An hon. member: Because the hon. member stated them?

Mr. Bryden: I have stated they have come from a thoroughly reliable source, a source which the hon. Minister himself admitted was reliable. The hon. Minister said that representatives of the Lumber and Sawmill Workers Union have been to see him many times. Perhaps he will tell me how many times they have been down to see his department over the years, asking it to clean up this situation regarding the issue of permits. The hon. Minister has done absolutely nothing about it at all.

There is practically nothing that this union—this responsible reputable union—has requested of this government that it has received, yet its requests have been fair and reasonable and most essential in the situation that exists there.

As a result, what would one expect them to do? They have come to the Opposition parties. I have no doubt they went to see my hon. friends in the Liberal party; they have certainly been to see us from time to time. They have always been courteous enough, as most organizations have been, to give us copies of the briefs that they have given to the government and to the various departments of the government, and to explain those briefs to us.

I have in my file briefs from this organization over a number of years. Year after year there has been this same request to enforce the law with regard to the issue of permits. It would appear that it is hopeless; the hon. Minister's mind is closed. He is not even prepared to consider facts. He is going to continue. I take it from what he said—I hope it is not true, but it seems to be the only possible conclusion—he is going to continue to allow these permits to be used as a device to be used by the big companies against their workers in the event that they get into a dispute. That is unfortunate.

Mr. E. G. Freeman (Fort William): On vote 1107, through you, Mr. Chairman, to the hon. Minister, I would like to bring the matter that there has been more and more talk about in northwestern Ontario over the last, to my knowledge, three or four years, but particularly in the last few months. This has to do with timber scaling. I am sure that the hon.

Minister of Lands and Forests is in possession of this information as well, but I think for the sake of the record that I should present it at this time.

The fact is that there was evidence of a tendency in many cases for company scalers to scale wood in the bush below or above the allowable average of five per cent. This could lead to a substantial loss of honestly earned income to cutters, and also a serious loss of revenue to the government in stumpage fees. Due to this fact, the present method of scaling wood in the bush is a constant source of friction. This I know to be so very true. I get complaints almost daily from woodlot farmers and from haulers and so on, who find that there is a $30, $40, $50 or $60 differential in the price that they should be getting and the price that they do get on delivery of the wood. This is important money to people who are in receipt of small sums of money as an income.

The present method of scaling wood in the bush is a constant source of friction among the paper companies, the scalers and the cutters. It is felt by the people in our part of the country in particular—and I presume it is true in the Kapuskasing and other areas of northwestern Ontario and northern Ontario, where pulpwood cutting is carried on at a large scale—that the Ontario government should review the present method of issuing scaling licences and consider the advisability of placing all wood scaling in the hands of government scalers, thus ensuring that all parties concerned receive an accurate scale and a fair and just distribution of the proceeds therefrom.

I would say, Mr. Chairman, and I have a feeling somehow that the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests will agree with me, that he must have received over the last many months, many complaints in regard to this type of thing. These are not isolated cases, these are not cases that one comes into contact with once or twice during a cutting season. They are situations which come to one's attention many times during the cutting season. It is particularly true in cases of woodlot farmers and it happens particularly, as my hon. colleague mentioned a while ago, with regard to these so-called co-operatives.

I think I mentioned briefly a little earlier when I spoke with regard to this type of merchandising wood and purchasing wood, that these people are not, strictly speaking, co-operatives. They are merchants in their own localities in a variety of types of merchandising, such as general stores and the like. The practice in so many cases is that the woodlot farmers go to these general stores and set up a credit account upon which they draw merchandise against the amount of money that they will be paid after their wood is delivered. Therefore, the merchant is in the position of a co-operative operator, as he calls himself. He is in a position to make a double profit. We have no quarrel personally if he is giving these people service and if he is dealing fairly with the people from whom he is purchasing this wood, in the scale of the wood—giving them an accurate scale, seeing that they get an accurate scale and also that they are paid a proper amount for the wood that they entrust to him for handling.

I would strongly recommend to the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests that if this matter has not been brought forcibly to his attention in the recent past, it is a matter which is well worth the scrutiny of the department. I believe he will find that he will have the gratitude of many people, men, women and children, in northwestern Ontario if he can come to a just and equitable solution to this particular matter.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I am very much alive, Mr. Chairman, to the problems of scaling. Actually, we have a standard system for Crown lands and sometimes settlers and others make agreements on their own on other methods of scaling. The Quebec system is sometimes used by agreement, by private arrangement. But the whole process of scaling in the light of all the new developments that are going on in the industry, the mechanical end of it and all that sort of thing, has been under review. I have here a preliminary report on scaling which was received just a few months ago from some of our experts in the field and we are very much alive to that question.

Mr. Chairman: Vote 1107 agreed to.

On vote 1108:

Mr. Troy: I am not finished with 1107 yet.

Mr. Chairman: Order! I have 1107 passed.

Mr. Troy: By whom? You just said "carried." It is the same thing as we have had in the years past.

Mr. Chairman: Order! If the hon. member wants to make a statement on this vote, we are prepared to allow him to do it.

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member has a question to ask on this vote, I would ask you please to go back to 1107.

Mr. Chairman: I will rule that we revert back to 1107, if the hon. member has a question to ask.

Mr. Troy: Yes. We had the same information given to us as was presented to the NDP. We had a delegation from Kapuskasing area and it made very serious charges.

What we are concerned with is this: Is the hon. Minister satisfied that the provisions in The Crown Timber Act in regard to that particular part of our problems were adhered to? He had 180 more permits issued and the hon. Minister says there were only 11 infractions. Does the hon. Minister deny then that every one of the others was on the up and up and all the provisions of The Crown Timber Act in those instances were adhered to?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: As I outlined, having discussed it with the other parties, having seen all the lists that they wanted looked into, and having looked into them, the people of our department came to the conclusion that 11 only came within the infractions and 1.5 per cent of the permits were cancelled on that basis. We always have a few because after all this is quite possible in that number. This year, as I say, we have had 800-odd permits granted. The cutting has gone along, so far as the department is concerned at any rate, without any undue problems or difficulties apparently, and without complaints being lodged. Therefore, we can assume that this year, perhaps as the result of some of this that has gone before, it is running smoothly. We are concerned with correcting errors in trying to keep this on a proper level. But we believe the people of that area want this method for the settler to have an extra source of income and to be kept within the proper range of the Act and the requirements of the Act. That is what we permit to be done.

Mr. Troy: Does the hon. Minister mean to tell me that those people who applied for those permits were settlers? What is his understanding and what is a "settler" under the department? A settler to me is one who is settled on a certain area and gets his settler's permit, but the people in this, reading these permits, are people from Kapuskasing, from towns and—

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Our analysis of the 180 has all but the 11 classified as in the eligible column. The 11 are not in the eligible column. The details are set out in the memorandum.

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask my hon. friend, under The Crown Timber Act is there any leeway or latitude allowed in determining the qualifications in respect to a settler? Is there anything in the Act to allow the department to give these cutting rights to other than settlers, or have you got to determine in the department that this man is a settler before you can properly give him a licence to cut?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Yes, the answer would be that there is discretion if one wanted to use it in relation to what might be called the fringe, fuel wood for example. Permits for fuel wood and that sort of thing can be granted to any settler or to anybody who needs fuel—

Mr. Oliver: Yes, but this is cutting pulpwood.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Well, one can get a permit for fuel wood, for example.

Mr. Troy: It is clear the answer does not reveal very much. Mr. Minister, has the E. B. Eddy Company a large area of timber under licence in the district of Timiskaming? How many square miles and how many acres has it and how much has it itself cut?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: The Eddy Company?

Mr. Troy: The E. B. Eddy Company from Ottawa and Hull.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: The Eddy Company Limited in the Elk Lake area had some 1,640 square miles under license. There is quite a story, of course, behind the Eddy Company. The original agreement, covering the Montreal River concession, was made back in 1907 with the J. R. Booth Company—Mr. Booth himself, I think at that time—for a period of 21 years. It was to expire in 1928. This agreement was subsequently assigned to J. R. Booth Limited.

By an agreement, sir, dated April 27, 1933, the latter was granted a new license for 21 years, dating from January 12, 1928 and expiring in 1949. This license was assigned to the E. B. Eddy Company Limited in 1946. After prolonged negotiations, the Eddy Company was granted licence A-106 for a term of 10 years—from February 15, 1953, expiring in 1963. A further licence has recently been issued for a ten-year period expiring in 1973.

I should say that the Booth operation in the area, was for sawlogs when it was held by that company. For a number of years, pulpwood from the area was used at the J. R.

Booth pulp mill at Ottawa. Since the closing of the large drives on the Ottawa River, it has proved uneconomic to operate the concession area for pulp wood.

The licence issued in 1963 for a ten-year period, contains the following provisos:

Provided that if the licensee does not honour, before the expiry date of this licence, build and have in operation a pulp mill capable of utilizing a minimum of 100,000 cords of wood per annum, at a location to be approved by the Minister, the Minister may refuse any extension of this licence; and the bonds referred to in clause three hereunder shall be forfeited to Her Majesty, and retained by her as liquidated damages and not as a penalty.

Provided further that if at any time during the term of this licence, a firm proposal is made to the Minister by a person other than the licensee to establish a mill for the purpose of utilizing the timber on the licensed area, and the licensee has not commenced construction of a pulp mill as herein provided, the licensee agrees that it will, within 60 days from the date of the Minister's notice to the licensee, either give a firm commitment to commence construction of a pulp mill as herein provided within 12 months from the date of the said notice, or it will, within the said 60 days, deliver up the licence to the Minister, whereupon the licence shall cease to have any force or effect. The Minister will forthwith return the bonds referred to in clause three of this licence to the licensee. In the event the licensee gives a firm commitment to commence construction of the said pulp mill within the 12-month period, it shall be required, at the time of the commitment, to deposit with the Treasurer of Ontario an additional $200,000 in cash, or bonds of the government of Canada, or of the province of Ontario, as security for the due performance of the obligation of the licensee in respect to the construction of the said mill.

And provided further that until such time as the licensee commences construction of the said pulp mill the Minister may, for the purpose of supplying the requirements of local industry, grant licences to cut any or all species of timber on any part or parts of the licensed area in which mature and over-mature stands of sawmill timber predominate. In issuing such licences the Minister will in as far as practicable preserve the pulp wood values for the mill to be constructed by the licensee.

It will be noted that the two objectives of the department are adequately provided for in this licence. One, the establishment of a pulp mill in the vicinity of the licensed area at the earliest possible date; and secondly, until such time as the pulp mill can be established, the licence provides for the utilization of all species and products, other than pulp wood, through licences issued by the department. This latter matter is under department consideration at the present time.

Now I would like to say, not because it has been asked directly, but because there was a statement made by the hon. member for York South when the hon. Minister of Economics and Development was before the House. A broad allegation was made that this company --middle man, as it was called--was in there making great profits at the expense of settlers. Nothing, really, could be further from the truth than that. The facts of the matter were as follows, and we have had a review of the ten-year period.

We have had the figures from their company's records of the sales; third party agreements receipts by them from the people who were cutting in the area over that period of time; and we have the charges, which amounted roughly to some $19,000-odd a year for fire charges and ground rent and that sort of thing. It amounted to something like $19,400. Then there were some additional charges which brought the whole up to $22,000 or $23,000. The end result of that ten-year period was that the company was able to recoup something like all but $60,000 of its own outlay. As a result of the charges which it made on a cordage basis from these people who were cutting. But the company did the actual management.

If the company had not been doing that, the department would have had to put people at work doing the management. On the analysis, it was felt that we got more for our money really, that way, than we would have had we done it ourselves. We have, as I read out a moment ago, the provision for doing it directly if we so desire. But in that case, of course, the charges would have to be made to cover those costs against the persons doing the cutting.

Actually, all of these contracts come under the review of the department. The thought that any one of these licensees could walk out and make great profits is not correct. At least if they did it, they would do it with the knowledge of the department because all of the prices are under the review of the department. And in this particular case, as I say, over the ten-year period as a result of these third party cuttings, it enabled the company to recoup some of its outlay. But in consideration for that, they had to do the management work.

There might be a question of whether we should deal directly, make our own charges and let the company pay the full amount. That might be a legitimate criticism. That is probably the better way of doing it. The door is very clearly open to do it that way if we figure that it is the better thing for us to do.

Those are the facts. My hon. friend blew this thing up as though great profits were being made by middlemen. In this particular case there was nothing in it whatever.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, in his reply to my question in regard to that licence the Eddy people have, the hon. Minister says they are licensed for the cutting of timber in that area. Are these third party agreements, or did the department itself give the licence, or did it make the agreements with the Eddy Company?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: There are five licences but in that area for the cutting of sawlogs and that type of thing. One of them is being processed at the present time. There are five agreements at the present time for a total of some seventeen million board feet of sawlogs outstanding.

Mr. Troy: And is the hon. Minister satisfied that the ten-year clause is okay?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Mr. Chairman, I would say to the hon. member that we have a rider in it that we can cancel it at any time on 60 days' notice if they do not go ahead with the mill and if we have an opportunity to have somebody else come in and put up a mill. We think that is good enough protection.

Mr. Troy: Now, just one last question: Is there anything to advise the House about the pulp mill that is a possibility in the Elliot Lake area? The hon. Minister will recall that some years ago when the Elliot Lake crisis was discussed here, the then Minister of Lands and Forests said that negotiations were under way for a possible mill at Blind River.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Well, there are certain negotiations at the present time in relation to that, but I can make no announcement at this moment, because it has not reached the point where I can say anything.

Mr. Troy: We are getting warm.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I hope so, I hope so.

Mr. R. Gisborn (Wentworth East): Mr. Chairman, in the light of the explanation the hon. Minister tried to make in regard to the issuing of pulp cutting permits, would he tell the House whether or not there are provisions in the Act that allow for the so-called broker or company agent to purchase these permits from the original holders, and contract to other work groups, and what relation the Act has to the original price paid to the broker?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: My hon. friend is not using the language that I would use in connection with this, because there is not any such thing as a broker in this at all. It is the E. B. Eddy Company itself holding the main licence, which is a big operating company, as my hon. friend probably knows, down in the Ottawa-Hull area.

An hon. member: He is talking about the Kapuskasing permits.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I am sorry, I thought the hon. member was pursuing the previous question. I will have to ask the hon. member to give me the question again.

Mr. Gisborn: My question to the hon. Minister is: are there provisions in the Act that govern the issuing of the permits to the so-called settler—are there provisions for what is known as a broker or company agent to pick up the permits from the original recipients and then set up work crews, take out the pulpwood, receive the going price—as has been mentioned $22 a cord from the company—and pay off to the work crews a certain rate under that rate? This is the question I want to know: Are there provisions in the Act for this kind of operation, because this is what is actually going on?

Mr. L. Letherby (Simcoe East): The rake-off!

Mr. Gisborn: That is right.

An hon. member: Do not be crude.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I would refer to section 26 of The Crown Timber Act, and it is a pretty broad section:

Notwithstanding anything in any general or special Act or in any regulation or in any licence or in any master plan, the Lieutenant-Governor in council having regard to reasonable business requirements of the licensee may cancel or vary any licence in respect of one or more parts of the licensed area or in respect of any type, size or species of timber designated by him.

And then it goes on to have certain provisions under sub-paragraph 2. But section 26 is the section if my hon. friend wants to look at it in detail; that is the all-inclusive section.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. G. E. Gomme (Lanark): The hon. member has asked his last question.

Mr. Troy: No, I happened to pick up the issue of—

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Do not start reading all last week's newspapers.

Mr. Troy: This may be of interest; it is on timber, and the resident of Sturgeon Falls, who contested the election last September for the NDP is classified here as an horticulturalist and an authority on reforestation. He proposed a number of things, particularly for reforestation and he is reported in this newspaper as saying the reforestation should take place in the fall when dormant seedlings are not injured by transplanting.

He explained that the average loss in spring reforestation was as high as 80 per cent because of the warm spring sun and the quick run-off of the water. Autumn planting would allow frost to fill in air pockets around the roots of tender seedlings. Thus, before the growing season begins, the young plants may gradually adapt to the new environment. In this way ample time is given for adaptation until the dormant plant becomes reactivated during the growing season in late spring and early summer.

What is the matter?

Mr. Chairman: Order, order! We are dealing with vote 1107.

Mr. Troy: This is timber, sir, is it not?

Mr. Chairman: This is reforestation that you are speaking on right now.

Mr. Troy: Well, I presume that is reforestation of—

Hon. Mr. Roberts: On the advice of my experts, I will tell the hon. member it is all right to plant in the fall but it is better to plant in the spring.

Mr. Troy: What is the hon. Minister's answer to this, then? He said that only 50 million of the hundred billion seedlings planted each year in Ontario have survived and on the other hand—

Mr. Gomme: Did he count them?

Mr. Troy: I do not know, I just—

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Our count would be 80 to 90.

Mr. Troy: Eighty to 90?

Mr. S. Farquhar (Algoma-Manitoulin): Mr. Chairman, without wanting to put a lot of words on the record tonight, I would like to suggest that the hon. Minister can possibly accept the fact that there are some small inequities in the granting of timber permits.

I refer to a situation in our area where a big timber operator—and I am quite familiar with this, and this request from a small operator is certainly evident in the hon. Minister's files—the large operator has taken a lot of timber, a lot of choice timber out of that country as compared to a small operator whose local mill is not operating at all. Being a small operator, he would not employ more than 20 or 30 men, but I would like to think that the hon. Minister could accept that everything, in spite of what the hon. Minister of Mines had to say in his speech, is not exactly as it should be any more than everything in The Department of Public Welfare is as it should be, because he made a speech on soup kitchens.

Now, I would like to ask the hon. Minister if there is a possibility of the department paying a little more attention, as much attention as possible, to the small operators and looking very closely at the local economy of some of these smaller people as compared to some of the big industries?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: This undoubtedly is what we would want to do and if there are any specific cases that my hon. friend wants to bring forward, we will certainly give them a special look.

Vote 1107 agreed to.

Vote 1108 agreed to.

Vote 1109 agreed to.

On vote 1110:

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, on this vote 1110, basic field services, in reading the report of the public lands investigation committee I find reference to re-surveys and re-establishment of surveys. Recently a resident in my riding sought to do some expansion of property that he owned and later found out that the survey was not correct, and I know that in another section of the riding a dam was built years ago by the Ontario Hydro, and the proper survey shows that it was not their property at all and that the survey was wrong.

In the recommendation of this expert committee it is pointed out that a minimum of at least $100,000 be provided annually in the estimates of the hon. Minister's department for re-survey, re-establishment and monumenting the original surveys. What is being done now in that regard?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: We are asking for some $50,000 extra in the estimates for re-surveys this year.

Mr. R. W. Gibson (Kenora): Mr. Chairman, I will be very brief. I wonder if the hon. Minister would undertake to advise—not here, but some time—if any monies were paid to George Green of Green Airways of Red Lake, by his department during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1963.

Secondly, just as an item of personal curiosity, on checking through the estimates under what would appear to be this vote, I find that something like $20,500 was paid to the Westbury Hotel and something like $4,900 was paid to the Royal York Hotel. I do not think there are any other hotels listed. Is there any rational basis on which the hotels in which the hon. Minister's people stay are chosen?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I would say to the hon. member that this department, as everybody knows, I think, is a business department. It has many business connections and has requirements that cover a broad area in relation to committees, to delegations and to many different associations which come here in groups from time to time and which are entertained by the department. I could give a list of the different types of things. We have something in the neighbourhood of between 40 and 50 occasions where this sort of arrangement is made. Such lists as appear on page 191 here of the pamphlet give a fairly representative list of the types of organizations that come in here. That item accounts for lunches and that sort of thing, which are held for large numbers of people, several thousands during the year.

Mr. Gibson: I am not questioning the amount that was spent, Mr. Chairman. What I want to know is, why the rather unusual distribution between these particular hotels? I have nothing against the Westbury Hotel and nothing against the Royal York Hotel or any other hotel, but it is about a 5-to-1 split in favour of the Westbury. I am just wondering why the Westbury was chosen rather than say, the Park Plaza.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: That is a good point. Perhaps I should think more about my own riding and bring more in to St. Patrick riding. Actually, the Westbury is not in my riding. It is in the riding of the hon. member for St. George (Mr. A. F. Lawrence) I think.

But the fact is that service at the Westbury Hotel, and habit—one gets into the habit of going to a place—are the reasons the Westbury seems to be favoured. I can assure the hon. member that there is no significance in it other than that, to my knowledge, in any shape or form. They have a reputation for serving a very good roast beef dinner and that type of thing.

Mr. Gibson: Will the hon. Minister undertake to provide—

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Also, the deputy points out to me that a reservation cannot be had just for the asking in the hotels of this city. Meeting rooms are required and so forth and reservations have to be made for them. To some extent also, the convenience of the location of the Westbury to the area of Queen's Park has set it apart.

Probably we should get a better distribution. We will have to look into that.

Mr. Gibson: Just to finalize this, will the hon. Minister provide me with the information about Mr. Green? I asked, sir, for information about Mr. Green and Green Airways and what the department had paid it, if anything, up to March 31, 1963. Will the hon. Minister have the department send me that information?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: None of us caught what the hon. member is asking for there, will he please—

Mr. Gibson: All I want is information. I want the department to forward to me, by mail if necessary, any amounts paid by The Department of Lands and Forests to George Green or Green Airways of Red Lake in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1963. I do not want it now.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, there is a piece of property in Sturgeon Falls that was originally intended—I notice the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs looking me over on this one—

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I answered that four or five years ago.

Mr. Troy: I know the hon. Minister did, but I want to know if anything is going to be done about it. It was all serviced and ready for a building. One of the projects that was to be carried on in that building was the preparation of signs for the parks and all the areas which the department owns. It is being done in the Pembroke area but has the hon. Minister any plans for the particular property in Sturgeon Falls that was purchased and for which services were installed? This property is not being used at all? This has not been answered, has it, Mr. Chairman?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I do not think we feel that there is any immediate need to change from Pembroke. Is the hon. member suggesting that we should change our paint shop? We feel that with the methods of transportation available today, it is working out well. I am sure that hon. members from that area would be the last to want to see us shifting that around.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, I asked the hon. Minister if he had any plans for the property which he had serviced with water and, I believe, sewage. This was, of course, early in 1959, but it never materialized.

In the monthly letter we get from the Pembroke district, there is an article about the terrific waste of trees at Christmas time. Trees are cut down and are not sold. They are just tossed away. They do not get to the market. After the Christmas season they are taken out to some dump and burned.

I know we must be careful here. We are up against Santa Claus. I am not talking about the Christmas trees of those who are in the business, but of needless cutting on Crown land. It seems a terrific waste of timber that might be merchantable later on.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: We try to keep track of this sort of thing on Crown lands. A lot of trees are cut on private lands and the owners would have to look after problems of that sort.

Mr. E. Sargent (Grey North): Mr. Chairman, I have a couple of questions for the hon. Minister. Is it a fact that all of the land bordering on Georgian Bay has been frozen and cannot be sold?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: That is correct. This is a temporary situation while a survey is being made in the whole Killarney-Georgian Bay area.

Mr. Sargent: How long will this condition remain?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: We would anticipate about a year.

Mr. Sargent: One year. I would like to ask the hon. Minister why they continue it if it is the policy of this department to replace beaver. I understand you have increased your beaver population greatly in the north—

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Not us.

Mr. Sargent: I did not put that very well. This is a serious matter. The fact is that my people tell me this increase in population of beaver is flooding many thousands of acres of land and they are building dams as high as 40 feet and holding back water. At these meetings, we may laugh at these people, but they are important to me. They are in the commercial fishing business but they have gone so far at meetings of their association as to call for a crash programme of bombing these dams to release this water into Georgian Bay.

We have seen documentaries on CBC where thousands of deer are lying down dead on the high hills because they cannot feed in the valleys. They are freezing to death on the high plateaus because there is no place to feed—this is all flooded by beaver. Is the hon. Minister doing anything about blocking this increase of beaver?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: In connection with the beaver, normally in the zones of the trappers, they pretty well manage their own beaver crop. When you get outside of that area you do get into trouble. The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. W. E. Johnston), he is not here at the moment, had a problem but they got a solution. I think the hon. member for Lanark also had a problem. They got a solution. Perhaps if you have got a problem up in Grey North and you get a little more experience, we can get a solution up there, too.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Minister, this is being facetious. I do not like this. This is important. We feel that the beaver population should be stemmed. I think I would like to have some intelligent thought from you on this matter. It is very important to the people in my area.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: If you have a special problem up there—some think fishing is better above the beaver dam—but if you have a special problem, come on over to my office. You have not been over there yet, anyway. Come over and talk to me.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, may we have a report from the hon. Minister on the operation of the new regulations regarding the fishing huts on inland lakes, like on Lake Simcoe and Temagami and Nipissing?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: The branch head tells me that it is working very satisfactorily, from our experience so far.

Mr. Troy: I might point out that the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Taylor) is rather bashful, but I notice a dispatch from New Lis-keard about a plastic ice fishing hut plant. I wonder if the department has had any information about this. I will tell him, Mr. Minister, to send it to your department for inclusion, maybe, in that bulletin that you send out. It is listed as a portable plastic ice fishing hut weighing 40 pounds. It folds down into a sled and can be put up in a few minutes. It is a little industry that may develop with a little publicity. With your signature on the bulletin it may go a long way in certain areas.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: It sounds like an interesting bit of equipment. Have you got the price there?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: What are you reading? The want ads?

Mr. Troy: I will be quite generous and I will not make the proper retort to that. No, it does not say here. I will ask the hon. member for Timiskaming to get in touch with the hon. Minister.

Mr. R. J. Boyer (Muskoka): Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. Minister a question with reference to a question which the hon. member for Grey North put, sir, as to sales of Crown lands on the shoreline of Georgian Bay? I understand that there was a one-year freeze on Crown land sales on the shoreline of the entire Great Lakes area. The hon. member referred to Georgian Bay only, but I wonder if the hon. Minister would say that this applies to the entire Great Lakes shoreline?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Yes. It is a freeze, so to speak, temporarily on the whole shoreline.

Mr. Troy: And are they sold by auction or tender? I know they are frozen now, but when they will be sold.

Resolutions concurred in.

Clerk of the House: Notice of motion No. 1 by Mr. R. A. H. Taylor,

Resolved

That the Ontario government take positive steps to salvage certain gold and base metal mining areas where through depletion production is rapidly being reduced and in some areas ceased completely; and to salvage the accumulated investment of individuals in these areas by:

1. Determining alternative industry suitable to these areas that will replace depleted mines.
2. By positive encouragement of these new industries to be developed in these selected areas.

Mr. R. A. H. Taylor (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, since tabling this resolution, I have had the opportunity to speak on this subject in the Throne debate and during the mining estimates. I will not repeat those remarks at this time. Also, there has very recently been presented to the committee on taxation a very complete and excellent brief on this subject by the Association of Mining Municipalities. I concur entirely with the points raised in this brief.

I would also like to refer the House to an editorial that appeared in the Toronto Globe and Mail on April 27, the concluding paragraph of which says:

Far too much has been done in the north on the short term—get in, get rich (or otherwise) and get out. Not nearly enough has been done in the north on a basis that looks to, and cares about, its future. It is on a long-term basis that the Ontario government should consider, and act upon, the reasoned request of the mining municipalities.

I present this resolution.

Hon. S. J. Randall (Minister of Economics and Development): Mr. Speaker, I think this is a very opportune time, before the closing session, to talk about the northland, because I think there are many things we can explain to the hon. members of this House, which are perhaps not realized—what is actually going on in the north. I have a report here that I am sure will answer the hon. member's questions and perhaps any doubts he may have as to this government's activities in the northland.

In the interests of the economic council, the northern development committee of the economic council has listed a substantial number of research projects bearing on economic conditions in northern Ontario of which nine have been selected and submitted to the Ontario Research Foundation for thorough investigation. Work on the following six projects is well advanced:

Possibilities for the development and expansion of the peat moss industry; expansion of existing markets and determination of possible new applications for refuse grain screenings. This has been completed.

Feasibility of establishing an abattoir at the Lakehead. This has been completed.

Assessment of the economic feasibility of a further development of the coarse fish industry in northern Ontario. This has been completed.

Possible application of jet smelting techniques in northern Ontario are still going on through the Ontario Research Foundation.

Commercial probable uses of gold mine tailings is also going on. I might say, concerning those reports that were completed, we forwarded them to the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Stewart) just last week because he has some reports of his own that we are working on jointly, and we think that out of these finished reports, plus what The Department of Agriculture is working on, we can get some action on these matters that have been referred to.

Research is about to commence on the following projects:

The possible development of the needle trade. I discussed this a few days ago during the estimates. We believe that there are many people in northern Ontario who could fill this skilled need in the needle trade and we are working on that at the present time.

The advantages of forest fertilization for the forest-based industries is another research programme that is under way, and prospects for co-operative market garden operations. We believe there are possibilities up there for this kind of a business to take place in northern Ontario.

On completion of this research work, the northern development committee proposes to assign further studies to the Ontario Research Foundation; where this research demonstrates development potential the committee intends to encourage the establishment and/or growth of the relevant economic activities. This may be expected to be of particular significance to the areas of northern Ontario that are experiencing the effects of mine closure and the depletion of mineral resources. In some areas, recent activity in Timmins has generated renewed interest in all parts of the northland.

The northern development committee has requested a grant of $5,000 from the Ontario economic council to support the northeastern Ontario development committee in preparation of an economic survey of the district of Timiskaming, which, in addition to an analysis of economic problems peculiar to the area, will also present recommendations for the overall improvement of the district's economy.

Since some mines in the area have been closed and others are nearing the end of their economic life, a survey of this nature may be expected to be of particular importance at this time. A similar survey on the district of Cochrane was completed last year with the financial support of the Ontario economic council to the northeastern Ontario development association. The northern development committee recognizes the importance of good transportation facilities for the growth of Ontario's northland. It has, therefore, under consideration, ways and means of accelerating highway construction and improvements and also has requested and obtained several studies on northern air transportation which are expected to prompt the committee to make specific recommendations.

Again, as I pointed out in my estimates, we are working with the federal authorities on the re-use and rehabilitation of these air fields, and I think there is something like 20 up there that could be used. But first of all, we have to find out whether passengers are going to come along and how much freight can be transported in these small planes through these various centres. So there is a survey going on to open up the area.

Now the interests of the special research and surveys branch of our department has also made a contribution to the north. In 1958 the branch published an economic survey of the northeastern Ontario economic region and this was followed in 1959 by a similar economic survey of the northwestern Ontario economic region. These surveys present a wealth of economic and statistical information relating to population, employment, natural resources, industrial production, transportation, tourism and other economic activities that make up the economic life of these regions.

The data thus assembled, Mr. Speaker, are analyzed and interpreted, major trends are indicated and on occasion reference is made to undeveloped potential. At present a re-survey of the northeastern Ontario economic region is underway. Teams of economists have visited all areas of the region and carried out extensive on-the-spot investigations. The results of this work are expected to be published before the end of this year. On completion, a similar re-survey will be made of the northwestern economic region. In addition, the branch has, during the past three years, completed a number of feasibility studies complete with recommendations dealing with economic problems in specific areas. For example, an extensive study on the development of alternative employment opportunities in the Bancroft-Bycroft area, which is experiencing the effects of a sharp decline in the uranium industry.

I might say that we have had two or three delegations down from Bancroft. We have been working with Father Henry and the industrial commissioners up there. I have been corresponding with the Rt. hon. Prime Minister of Canada and the hon. Mr. Drury, the Minister of Industry, and while they have made their announcement this week—and perhaps the announcement had to come along these lines—nonetheless I am quite sure that, as Rt. hon. Mr. Pearson stated, within a few weeks he hopes to make a very important announcement about the uranium areas and we, I assume, will know what that announcement is within a few days.

A study on northeastern Ontario with particular reference to the role of the Ontario Northland Railway and the region's economic development.

A study on air transportation in northern Ontario and a study of economic prospects bearing on housing requirements in the Timmins area. Furthermore, economists of this branch participated in discussions with local representatives and government officials at Elliot Lake and Timmins, convened to determine ways and means of cushioning the effects of mine closure or depletion of mineral deposits, and to propose measures that could be taken to stimulate the local economy and develop demonstrated potentials. In our research branches we are seriously studying all these economic activities.

Then there is the interest of the trade and industry branch which I believe answers part of the question the hon. member proposed. The trade and industry branch does not direct industry to one area over another and I might add that the federal government follows the same pattern. When dealing with companies looking for a plant location, the branch provides them with complete information covering the availability and sources of raw materials and encourages them to consider locating where such materials are available. During 1963 we recorded the largest number of new plants to establish in northern Ontario in any one year. This is a list of the new plants and where they are located:

The Galfa Manufacturing Company Limited; manufactures chairs and chesterfields in Timmins. Boreal Equipment Contractors Limited; a chip plant in Port Arthur. Bristol Machine Works Company; machined products in Sudbury. Caland Ore Company Limited; iron ore pellets in Steep Rock. Canadian Lundia Limited; prefabricated wood and steel shelving in New Liskeard. Ken-O-Kee Fibreglass Products Limited; maker of fibreglass boats in Kewatin. H. Kutzler Lath and Lumber Mill; laths for snow fencing, Kakabeka Falls. Lowphos Ore Limited; iron ore pellets, Capreol. Mathieu (Rainy Lake) Forest Products Limited; a chip plant in Fort Frances. Stonefields Industrial Minerals Limited; coloured stone, exposed aggregate, in River Valley, and the West Coast Wire Works Limited; foundriner screens, Fort William—not in production yet, but will be, I understand, very shortly.

I think hon. members will see that we are getting a share of new plants and new industries in northern Ontario. Perhaps they are sliding in and we do not notice them.

It must be recognized that a large part of our secondary manufacturing industry prefers to locate reasonably close to the highly populated market areas in the southern part of the province. The trade and industry branch, therefore, has taken direct steps to encourage and assist in the expansion of local industry in northern Ontario.

In order to alert businessmen and industrialists in northern Ontario to the possibility of manufacturing new products and entering into export, seminars were conducted at North Bay and Fort William during the year. All manufacturers of the northeastern and northwestern regions of the province were invited to attend these seminars. Guidance and first-hand knowledge was provided covering sources of financing for the acquisition of new equipment or plant expansion, the manufacture of new products under a licensing or contract arrangement, and the export of products to the U.S. and European market areas.

Forty companies in northern Ontario receive on a regular basis details of new products, for which the trade and industry branch is attempting to find companies that will produce these items under a licence or contract arrangement. Again, I say this is the same pattern followed by the trade and industry people at Ottawa, so that everybody gets a crack at any prospects we have for the manufacturing of new products.

As part of the Ontario Trade Crusade, the following seven companies from northern Ontario went on sales missions sponsored by the Ontario government: The Rock Iron Company Limited, Sudbury, went on the Chicago mission. R. J. Minoug & Company, North Bay, went on the United Kingdom and European mission. The Industrial Garment Company Limited, River Valley, went to the United Kingdom. Great West Timber Limited, Port Arthur, went to Milan, Italy. Hinspergers' Harness & Tent Co. Limited, from Port Arthur, went on a Chicago mission. Northern Plywoods Limited of Nipigon, went on a Chicago mission, and the Soo Foundry and Machine Company, went on the Los Angeles mission.

Many of the manufacturers in northern Ontario are included in our invitations to go on these foreign missions and open export markets for themselves. I just want to assure the hon. member that we are making sure that our manufacturers in northern Ontario are not overlooked on the possibilities of getting in on the export trade.

As part of the Ontario government regional development programme, the Northeastern Ontario Development Association and the Northwestern Ontario Development Association are playing important roles in the overall development of these regions of the province. The northeastern group has just recently published a detailed study of the Cochrane district covering statistical data, analyses of some of the economic problems of the area and possible courses of action which might be taken. A similar study is being undertaken for the Timiskaming district and there will be a 35,000-mile aerial survey of the James Bay basin on the Quebec border this coming year. I think you will see that the north is being closely scoured not only by the provincial people, but also by the federal authorities.

In northwestern Ontario, the association has carried out transportation and labour studies and like those of the northeastern region, and is continually advertising the agriculture, industrial and tourist development opportunities which exist. These associations are operated by the municipalities of the region and therefore are able to select a programme of development which they feel is best suited to their own area. The Ontario government supports these associations with an annual grant of up to $15,000 and by providing advisory and the agent staffs when required.

I say to hon. members that northern Ontario is a land of untapped riches that exist in forest, field and stream. We will perhaps, in our time, see a greater use of northern waters. We have heard a lot about the shortage of water and I am quite sure that if we are going to get any more water it is going to come from the north. We are witnessing a growing interest in cattle raising. They are raising more cattle in the north country today than ever before. We have forest products in ever-increasing abundance and the world needs an ever-increasing amount of what we can produce.

We are pushing electric power into every corner of our northland and this opens up vast new opportunities for those who populate much of this untapped virgin land. I think I can speak with authority, because I was up there in the 1930s when we did not have the highways, the hotels and the roads and people lived a more pioneer life than they do today. There have been great strides made, I know, from the 1930s and the early 1940s and I think we have only begun to realize what the northland has to offer.

Roads, airfields and railways will spread the opportunity of investment and access to the economic possibilities of the northland, which we know are waiting for those men and women who will accept the tremendous challenge of the future as they have done in the past, a past that has brought forward much wealth for this province and its people. The recent discoveries in Timmins, under swamp land, of what would appear to be another prodigal gift from Mother Nature, present a challenge to many of our adventurous young men and women to go north and carve out a career of success as so many have done before. We cannot be complacent at any time in the problems of our northland and its people. We must be mindful of the contribution made in the past and the possibilities of the future, which will add to the prosperity and well-being of this province and certainly of Canada as a whole.

In my view, the northland can set a pace of economic prosperity in the years ahead that could very well pale into insignificance the successes that we have enjoyed in the past. I am confident that the hon. members of this House share this optimism in the future of northern Ontario and its community leaders and I can assure you that this government will do everything in its power to make sure that the resources of the northland are not left hidden. Certainly we will utilize the efforts of the people in the northland to make full use of those resources, as we have done in the past. I am sure that you do not need to have any fear about what will happen to the northland. It will get its share of support from this government and certainly from my department in particular, and I am sure I speak for my hon. colleagues as well. We are well aware of what exists for this province in the northland.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Are we still speaking on this resolution? I wonder if—

Hon. Mr. Randall: I am sorry, I did not hear the question.

Mr. Troy: Has the hon. Minister's economic committee made any recommendations to the department in regard to the mining laws—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: I would remind the member that we are debating the resolution.

Mr. Troy: What about the statement the hon. Minister of Economics and Development made? That was debating the resolution, all right!

The hon. Minister said: "By positive encouragement of these industries to be developed in these selected areas—".

The point I want to make—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry. Is the member prepared to debate the resolution before the House?

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Troy: I know, but— Let me ask you a question, sir—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Troy: May I ask the hon. Minister a question?

Mr. Speaker: I am asking the member a question. Does he wish to debate the resolution?

Mr. Troy: Unless I can get an answer to this question, I cannot debate it, sir.

Mr. A. H. Cowling (High Park) moves adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Clerk of the House: Notice of motion No. 2, by Mr. S. Farquhar,

Resolved,

That, consideration be given to the establishment of an agricultural school located in northern Ontario and dealing specifically with the problems of agriculture in northern Ontario, to provide facilities for young farmers in the north at a cost comparable to income.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the motion carry?

Mr. S. Farquhar (Algoma-Manitoulin): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak in support of this resolution, I hope I will not find it necessary to reiterate the arguments for the resolution that I mentioned in an earlier speech in the House. In any case, I hope that my remarks will constitute emphasis on the importance to the northern agricultural industry of a northern agricultural school.

Many solutions have been offered for the bolstering and strengthening of our agricultural industry and my ideas, which certainly are coloured by the needs of the north, may be at cross-purposes with solutions that I have heard thus far in the House.

I have previously mentioned the importance of the erection of grain elevators which would allow northern farmers to take advantage of cheaper boat freight rates for their grain.

Eviscerating plants and abattoirs for northern Ontario are also important, but the primary need is the development of facilities for educating and encouraging our farmers to produce facilities that they can make use of with a minimum of expense. As everyone of us knows, who is aware of the changing times in agriculture, this is now a specialized industry calling for techniques and equipment the present-day budgeting and accounting knowledge. This knowledge is just not available in Algoma-Manitoulin.

During the past few years even our government illustration stations have been allowed to run down for lack of effort and guidance on the part of the department, until these have all but disappeared from the area. Technical and intensive education in all vocational lines is available in most cases locally. Why not in agriculture? The lack of this education is the reason our young people are leaving the farms. There certainly is a class of young people who would like to farm, but they must be made aware that there exists a need and an opportunity for a living in this field.

I have mentioned, Mr. Speaker, that in northern Ontario, opportunities for the expansion of the dairy industry are practically nil. This is partly due to the shortage of urban consumers and partly to existing legislation which eliminates northern dairying from competition with southern and eastern Ontario dairying. This is the basis for another speech and I am not unmindful of the difficulties involved, but these are conditions we must live with.

The livestock and poultry-raising industry is something else. Ontario needs and will continue to need beef. Government control, therefore, must begin to be exercised in the kind of production that Ontario can use.

Mr. Speaker, we need a northern agricultural school in which northern students can enrol and be guided and taught along the lines to which northern conditions lend themselves and at a cost that northern families can afford. What better place for such an institution than the heart of Manitoulin Island in an area where the economy, and particularly the agricultural industry, is sick? Not because the people are unwilling to work but because they have been given very little encouragement or help along technical lines of production or advised as to what they can and should produce.

Mr. Speaker, I have certainly been encouraged to find that, as a result of my discussions with various people in the department, the hon. Minister and Mr. Crown, the director of ARDA, are taking a long look at the need for a community pasture programme in the area of which I speak. This effort has met with a degree of enthusiasm on the part of northern farmers that is almost overwhelming.

Let me express my sincere hope, Mr. Speaker, that the department will further recognize the needs of northern Ontario by implementing even some modified facilities as a start toward educating and encouraging our potential farmers.

Mr. A. H. Cowling (High Park): Mr. Speaker, just before the hon. Minister replies: as a summer resident on Manitoulin Island over the past many years, I would like to support everything the hon. member has said and to say that anything that we can do—anything that our government might decide to do to assist the farmers in that area particularly—I would certainly pledge any support that I can give. The hon. member, I know, is a long-time resident of that area and he speaks with sincerity and knowledge, and I just wanted to rise and support him in this matter, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the hon. member for Algoma-Manitoulin with a great deal of interest and he has brought many points out tonight that I think are quite pertinent to the area which he represents.

I noted this resolution on the order paper some time ago and made it my business to inquire into the grants that have been paid toward high school boards where agriculture is taught. I note that throughout the province of Ontario there are some 105 schools which offer agriculture, vocational agriculture at secondary level. These schools are paid on the average about $4,000 annually in grants. I recall very well a personal experience I had—if I may, Mr. Speaker, crave your indulgence to mention this—in the operation of a high school board with which I was associated, where vocational agriculture was taught. We did this because we felt it was a good thing for all of the boys in Grade 9 to participate in vocational agriculture, whether they came from the urban or from the rural areas, and then for the boys to make a choice after Grade 9 as to whether they should continue or not. They found there was a substantial number of our rural students who continued on in Grades 10, 11 and 12. But we noted with interest, in examining the number of schools and the location of these schools throughout the province that not one high school in northern Ontario has seen fit to avail itself of this grant towards vocational agriculture in high schools.

Now, I am in sympathy, and I am sure that all the hon. members of the House will be in sympathy with what my hon. friend has suggested would be an excellent idea in the establishment of such an agricultural school in northern Ontario, and his area in particular, but I wonder why, if there is such a need for an agricultural school in northern Ontario, the high school boards in his particular area, and indeed throughout all northern Ontario, have not seen fit to establish this vocational agricultural course in the high school itself.

I also would like to call to the attention of the House, through you, Mr. Speaker, that from the period of 1952 to 1963 there was a total of 45 students at the Kemptville Agricultural School from the area north of the French River in the province of Ontario. In the history of the Ontario Agricultural College there have been 116 graduates from the college degree course with their origin in the districts listed in that particular area, and 52 graduates from the diploma course from these same districts. This is in the entire history of the agricultural college.

I think it would be wise, Mr. Speaker, for us to point out that at the Western Ontario Agricultural School at Ridgetown the cost for tuition amounts to an estimated $343 in the first year and $328 in the second year, and at the Kemptville Agricultural School, again operated by The Ontario Department of Agriculture, the total approximate cost for students is about $375. For all students attending approved educational institutions for degrees, diplomas or certificates, The Ontario Department of Education pays anything over $10 for one round trip each school year for each student residing in the territorial districts. This applies to all northern Ontario students attending educational institutions in southern Ontario. I think this is a very good approach to the problem of providing education there for the students who may come from those respective areas.

We would like to advise, Mr. Speaker, that The Ontario Department of Agriculture has an agricultural educational departmental committee, the chairman of which is our assistant deputy Minister, Mr. Ken Lantz. It is composed of a membership of Dean Richards of the Ontario Agricultural College, Mr. E. L. Woodley, the principal of the Ridgetown agricultural school, and Mr. A. M. Barr, the principal of the Kemptville Agricultural School. I can assure my hon. friend that we have discussed with this educational committee the matter of providing agricultural education for northern students.

We noted that my hon. friend suggested that the interested young farm people of the area which he represents should be maintained in agriculture by the provision of such a school. I am sure he would be the first to agree that it might be somewhat difficult to warrant the capital investment that might be necessary unless we were sure that there could be a very great demand from the areas involved for student attendance in such a school. We have found that in the establishment of the other two schools in southern Ontario there has been a time taken to build up the classroom population to the place where it is now making it quite worthwhile to carry on these schools. I would suggest that we continue our present programme and it might well be that we could give consideration to the establishment of types of short courses in northern Ontario. I think this is a very excellent way of bringing, in a very practical way, an agricultural educational programme not only to the young people who are on the farm, but also to those who are actively engaged in it as farm owners as well.

These are matters that are under active consideration and I would hope that we would be able to deal with them suitably as time goes on.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few brief comments on this resolution on behalf of our group. I think the general objective of this resolution is a desirable one. I wonder if we could not become a bit more precise in terms of meeting that objective. I think the information that the hon. Minister of Agriculture has given us is extremely significant when we discover that in northern Ontario there has been absolutely no move at all by young people to avail themselves of what agricultural vocational training is now in the curricula and for which there are grants. I think this points up perhaps the need for a bit of leadership. But I wonder whether or not there is some possibility of meeting, at least in the initial stage, the objective that was in mind when the hon. member made this motion, by co-ordinating with it more experimental work in terms of meeting the particular needs of northern Ontario in those pockets where there is a potential of agricultural development.

The hon. member, for very understandable reasons, has concentrated a good many of his remarks on the needs of Manitoulin. The problem of northern Ontario in agriculture, as I see it, is that there is a particular need in Manitoulin, there is a particular need in Timiskaming, there is a particular need in Cochrane, there are certainly particular needs in Fort Frances, Emo and the town of Rainy River, and there are other little pockets around Kenora and in the area between Kenora and Dryden.

I think it is a pity that many farmers are living a marginal existence there. Yet if one goes into the towns it will be discovered that most of the stores are selling chain imported vegetables and goods that might be produced in that area. I am wondering whether it would not be possible, wherever the opportunity presented itself, to establish on an experimental basis the possibility for developing the potential, providing the know-how to the farmers in that area, so that they could be encouraged to meet the local market instead of having the extra cost involved in bringing in produce.

I think another point that the hon. Minister of Agriculture has made is very valid. It is, that for a limited population like that of northern Ontario to contemplate the capital expenditure of a completely new school, quite apart from the difficulty of getting the brains and the experience which cannot be bought, is a pretty formidable obstacle. But I repeat, if one has experimental plots or experimental farms—in effect satellites of OAC down here—trying to cope with the particular problems of northern Ontario, and you combine with that some more leadership and direction at the extension level or the vocational level in the schools, then you would be both exploring the particular needs of the north, encouraging people to get into agriculture, and exploiting the potential, without getting into an unnecessary capital expenditure which at this stage would seem to be a white elephant.

In other words, I think the ultimate objective is a desirable one. It is one that has to be done in stages and some of the information that has come out here tonight, particularly from the hon. Minister of Agriculture, points up rather sharply what some of the initial stages are. Obviously what he has told us indicates that the people of the north themselves, either because they are not aware of what can be done by way of encouraging participation in agricultural activity or because enough leadership has not been given from here—and I would not pretend to say which—have not taken the initiative. Perhaps we should make a start right there.

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister of Agriculture, I thought, was very fair and very analytic in his reply in discussing this resolution. As I think all of us know, resolutions are not placed on the order paper letter-perfect. We are not bound to have it stand up in a court of law or anything like that. What we want to do, of course, is to get the idea across and to initiate discussions that will have a beneficial effect.

I agree largely with what the hon. member for York South has said. I want to comment on something the hon. Minister said when he intimated to the House that certain students from northern Ontario were going to Kemptville and certain other students were going to the agricultural college at Guelph. That, I think, is not the answer. I think when the hon. Minister said that the high schools were not taking up that particular branch of agriculture in the north, the story is told in a further comment of his when he said something about Kemptville.

He said that Kemptville, after it was established or when they were talking of establishing it, went through a time lag—there was a period of probation, as it were—before the people in the area responded to the full worth of that institution. What is found in respect to Kemptville will be found in respect to northern Ontario. You are not going to have an instantaneous response to any forward move of agricultural education in the north, but just as it came to Kemptville after a period of time, so it would come to northern Ontario and unquestionably would have a great and beneficial effect.

I can see this agricultural education in northern Ontario not as a reproduction of Guelph or of Kemptville or of Ridgetown, but I can see it as an extension emanating from these institutions up into the north.

I think the vital point of difference between what the hon. Minister has said and what we believe is this, that you cannot bring the people down from the north and educate them in our institutions down here, take them back up to the north and hope that they are going to reform the agricultural industry of northern Ontario. I think what has to be done for the people of northern Ontario has to be done in northern Ontario. And I think that is the vital difference in what we have been discussing tonight.

And surely, as one who knows the north as well as the hon. Minister and as well as perhaps most of us in the House are aware of conditions in northern Ontario, he must realize that certainly one institution in the north would not serve wholly or adequately the interests of the north. The conditions of the north are varied and there are pockets around New Liskeard, the head of the lakes and out into the northwestern part of the province, but as we look forward to the future of northern Ontario and agriculture as one of its main contributors, I think we have to assess ourselves in this respect: that the people of northern Ontario in the agricultural field have to be given the opportunity comparable to what the people of southern Ontario were given with Ridgetown and Kemptville and Guelph.

Now, I am not saying that it should be a great, big institution, but I am saying that the knowledge and the extension services that we have flowing from these three institutions in the south must, in some way, in miniature as it were, be transplanted in the northern part of this province and be built up to serve the needs of the farm people in northern Ontario.

Mr. R. G. Hodgson (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that the department pay close attention to the Lindsay Vocational Institute because it has done a pilot project of this nature. The agricultural representative, Mr. Brown, in Lindsay, has been most helpful and has worked thoroughly and fully with the school officials to work out a programme. I think this could be of very great use to the people of Ontario, especially in northern Ontario where they have vocational schools, and I think they would find this would be very adaptable and provide a practical programme.

Mr. Troy: I would like to ask the hon. Minister, Mr. Speaker, in his research did he go into the operation of the agricultural school that we had at one time in northern Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Where was that?

Mr. Troy: At Monteith.

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): That was not an agricultural school as such, it was a residential high school.

Mr. Troy: Well, it was called an agricultural school.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: It was called an academy.

Mr. Troy: An academy, whatever it was, it was also characterized as agricultural.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I doubt that.

Mr. Troy: Well, I do not care if the hon. Minister doubts it or not, I know because I have had experience with students from that school.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: If the hon. member does not mind—as I understand it, the Monteith Academy was a residential school in the early days in northeastern Ontario for students where there were no high school facilities. And it has been closed for many years.

Mr. Troy: I know it has been closed. At that time, of course, all I was interested in was knowing something about these young people who attended there, so I was not interested in agriculture in those days. The hon. Minister has heard of this from the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs, in whose riding Monteith is situated, and it was my understanding that it was an agricultural institution. But the hon. Minister has said, and my hon. leader has also said, that in the early operation of Ridgeway and Kemptonville, there were very small enrolments. Before the government decided to put up the institute of technology in Kirkland Lake a survey was made all across northern Ontario to find out how many young people would be interested in attending such an institution if it were situated somewhere in northern Ontario. At that time, the place was not designated but it was to be somewhere in northern Ontario. So I suggest possibly the same thing might be done to find out if there is an interest, and find out through the schools. If a survey were made in the schools in the north for the technical institute, possibly a survey could be done in the next year in our schools. I am sure there are certain sections in the Nipissing area, in the western section, down in the Chisholm section, in a fine agricultural area in Parry Sound, in Manitoulin, up in the New Liskeard area. I suggest, therefore, that a survey be made just to see if there would be enough interest to have a small agricultural school up north.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, if I am in order to reply briefly to what has been said by the hon. leaders of both Opposition parties, I think they have been quite constructive in their suggestions. I would like to suggest that we are carrying on a co-operative farm basis, with The Department of Agriculture and certain individual farmers throughout the north, demonstration projects of one type or another. We feel that these are most important, they are having a marked effect. For instance, in the operation of cow-calf herds, in some of those areas where there is an abundance of pasture and hay. This is working out exceedingly well. In relation to the demonstration farm project at New Liskeard and Timiskaming area, John Butler, the farm manager there, is doing an outstanding job in bringing farmers into the farm and demonstrating to them or showing them effective means of operating under northern Ontario conditions. This last winter we ran a short course there for a duration of a few days and we were pleased to find a very good response throughout the whole Timiskaming district from farmers who came there for a couple of days to take a concentrated course in practical agriculture. I think this is something that can be expanded throughout the north. I like the idea of these co-operative farms, to see how much interest really will develop. We would like to follow this through a little further in accordance with what has been said.

Mr. Troy: We are trying to encourage the young people to stay on the farm. The hon. Minister is talking about the farmers already established.

Mr. J. Root (Wellington-Dufferin) moves the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Clerk of the House: Notice of motion No. 9 by Mr. E. Sargent.

Resolved,

That the Ontario government be requested to pay grants in lieu of taxes on the same basis as the federal government on all property owned by the Ontario government or its agencies, except on property used for highway purposes.

Mr. E. Sargent (Grey North): Mr. Speaker, this is another case, along with the inequities between the province and the municipalities, where the government does not carry its tax load. Now, in Toronto today, these people in Toronto got their tax notices and the howling around Toronto is rampant tonight.

That is because — the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs might agree with me—the government is not paying its fair share of the tax load.

Mr. Cowling: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I would like to correct the hon. member and say that as a Toronto member I have not heard any howls about the tax bills that he said went out tonight. As a matter of fact they came out quite some time ago.

Mr. Oliver: That is no point of order.

Mr. Cowling: Well, it is a pretty good try, though.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): The hon. member does not even know what is going on in Toronto, that is the trouble.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. Sargent: The set-up now basically is this, that the province of Ontario, on the buildings it has in municipalities, is paying on its own assessment, not the city's nor the municipality's. The province sets up its own assessment and pays taxes only on the land and buildings. It pays no education tax. The federal government pays taxes in municipalities on the assessment made by the municipality. It pays its full share of the education tax.

Now, I would suggest that business has to pay its full share of the education tax and briefly, watching the clock, I would suggest that the province measure up to its responsibility and pay taxes in municipalities on its property—such as The Department of Highways here—on the full assessment made by the municipality, and pay education tax. In other words, Mr. Speaker, I suggest the province stop scrounging.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Who is talking? Wow!

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Mr. Speaker, I think that with all due respect, as the lawyers would say, that my friend the hon. member for Grey North, His Worship the Mayor of Owen Sound, has not thoroughly examined this whole picture.

Mr. MacDonald: That is damning with faint praise if I ever heard it.

Mr. Oliver: I think it is leading up to something.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: This resolution proposes that Ontario should adjust its basis of payment in lieu of taxes to conform with the basis of the federal payments in lieu of taxes. Yet at the same time it proposes that the base on which these payments are made be more generously defined by the province than by the government of Canada to include, and I quote from the resolution: "all property owned by Ontario," and so on, "except property used for highway purposes."

I presume, from the statement of the hon. member, that he is of the opinion that the federal payments are more generous in nature than the provincial payments. To reach this conclusion on the ground of comparing the basis of payment only, giving no regard to the base on which the payments were made, would be just as misleading, I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, as comparing the mill rates of two municipalities and paying no attention to the equalization factor with respect to the assessment.

Mr. Sargent: That is your fault, Mr. Minister.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: That is not my fault at all. The hon. member should just wait a minute. He does not understand anything about it at all. The basis upon which payments in lieu of taxes are made are roughly equivalent at the two levels of government. Both The Municipal Tax Assistance Act of Ontario and The Municipal Grants Act of Canada exclude properties which, in the main, might be described as public amenities, such as arts, reforestation projects, museums, hospitals and properties of that type. The exemptions are so closely parallel that there can be no criticism of the provincial Act on the basis of any comparison in respect of the federal Act.

Mr. Bryden: Did the hon. Minister type this up while he was reading it?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I have the two Acts here. I have looked at them and I have written this myself. I have had it here in my desk for many weeks. If anyone wishes to read the Acts I shall be very happy to present them with copies.

Mr. MacDonald: Take them as read.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: The hon. member has already read them. What my hon. friend proposes in extending the properties, in respect of which payments are made, is that the provincial government would outdo the federal government in the extent of its coverage. The suggestion that the province extend its payments to the type of property now excluded by both levels of government boils down to a question of whether government should be expected to pay taxes on amenities which it provides for the residents of one area of the province.

Since both the province and the government of Canada have specifically excluded this type of property from the normal payment provision, I assume that the question was considered by the hon. members in both the House of Commons and the provincial Legislature; and that each group reached the same conclusion. That is, that these properties should be excluded from the normal payments in lieu of taxes.

Mr. Sargent: Why?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Now, then, Mr. Speaker, in respect of the base on which payments in lieu of taxes are made, it is worthy of note that from the point of view of the municipality, the provincial Act improves on the federal Act in at least one respect. The Ontario Act provides an appeal from the assessment established as that on which the government will calculate its payments. Valuations of federal property are made originally by the municipal assessor, but are subject to revision by The Department of Finance. I might say that such revisions, Mr. Speaker, are very, very frequent. Furthermore, there is no appeal to the municipality from the value set by The Finance Department of Canada.

Now, in the province, on the other hand—and I would beg the hon. member to pay particular attention to this because the statement that he made is incorrect—in the province of Ontario the original assessment is made by The Department of Municipal Affairs. The municipality may, if it chooses, appeal the valuation to the Ontario Municipal Board. Could we be fairer than that?

An hon. member: No, no!

Hon. Mr. Spooner: In respect of the payment of taxes for education purposes—

Mr. Sargent: Does the hon. Minister want an answer to this question?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Oh, just wait a minute. I will answer questions when I am through with this.

Mr. Sargent: The hon. Minister is answering his own questions.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I am answering my own questions. I am giving the facts in relation to this resolution.

Insofar as the payment of taxes on account of educational expenditures in the province are concerned, I would remind you, Mr. Speaker, and the hon. members, that the government of Canada pays no portion of the cost of education in this province, except possibly small amounts in recent years for the construction of vocational schools. But it does not contribute to the cost of education below the university level.

Now then, education grants in the province of Ontario are based on several factors. But the most important ones are the assessment per classroom, or per pupil, as the basis on which the grant percentage is arrived at. So, the lower the assessment per classroom, or per pupil, the higher is the grant from the provincial coffers. So in order to get a better distribution of the financial support from the province to the boards of education, it is much more desirable—and much more just—with the system that we have in Ontario of distributing education grants on this basis, is much more desirable and much more acceptable than if we were to accept the federal method of paying such grants.

There is one further aspect, Mr. Speaker, that I think we should bear in mind. That is that the provincial Act specifically directs that the commercial mill rate shall be used in calculating payments in lieu of taxes. The federal Act does not specify which rate, commercial or residential, shall be used. Further, although the Minister of Municipal Affairs may provide that no payment shall be made on properties for which municipal services are not available, the Minister of Finance of the government of Canada may deduct an amount from what might otherwise be payable for a service, if it chooses to provide that for itself, and to deduct—I quote this from the Act—"such other amounts as the Minister considers appropriate."

I understand—I have mentioned this before and I repeat it, sir—that as a result of the latitude allowed to the Minister of Finance in Ottawa there are many of these. I would suggest that most of the payments that are made by the federal government in lieu of taxes are negotiated rather than calculated.

Mr. Sargent: Forty-seven per cent taxes to municipalities.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Oh, yes, I am sure that the hon. member is aware of that.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Speaker, this is another case of where the hon. Minister says that if we are not satisfied we can appeal to the Ontario Municipal Board. Is that not a joke?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I just said so.

Mr. Sargent: The Ontario Municipal Board is a creation of this government.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: But the hon. member cannot accuse the Ontario Municipal Board of being partial to anyone, whether it is appointed by this government or not. He knows that.

Mr. Speaker: I would like to remind the members that as mover of a substantive motion, the member has the right to speak a second time. But in speaking the second time, that concludes the debate.

Mr. Sargent: I am not talking about educational grants, Mr. Speaker. I am suggesting that what all the municipalities of Ontario want is for the province to pay its full share of municipal taxes. That is all we are asking for. The government expects business and everyone else to pay their full way, and the province dodges out and says that they have special privileges. This motion is to have them pay their way, and I suggest that every hon. member of this House is responsible to his taxpayers and for the taxes they pay. Most of the hon. members have been in municipal government and know the sorry mess that things are in taxwise, and I think it behooves every one of them to help their treasuries and their local ridings and to vote for this motion, because it is important to municipal government.

Mr. Cowling moves the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. The motion is out of order, as you yourself indicated the debate was closed when the hon. member spoke.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion please say "aye."

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: Will the member please stay quiet until I finish?

All those in favour of the motion will please say "aye".

All those opposed will please say "nay".

In my opinion the "nays" have it.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Speaker, what motion were we voting on?

Mr. Speaker: The resolution that you put before the House.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I for one misunderstood the motion that was put by the Speaker.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: The member made the motion. All those that were opposed to the motion—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Oh, yes, the members on this side of the House said "nay", and in my opinion the "nays" were in the majority.

Clerk of the House: Notice of motion No. 10, by Mr. J. P. Spence:

Resolved,

That a committee be set up to study the feasibility of a select labour force to help harvest the crops in southwestern Ontario;

that direct contact be made to the selective service commission by The Department of Agriculture requesting their help in forming a select labour corps; that a similar operation to that used during the last war be set up with The Department of Education to ask for Grades 12 and 13 students to participate and also with the universities asking for first-year students.

Mr. J. P. Spence (Kent East): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this resolution is to bring to the attention of the government, and especially to the hon. Minister of Agriculture, the problem of the shortage of labour to harvest the cash crops, fruits and vegetables, in southwestern Ontario.

I might say that since this resolution was placed on the order paper a great deal has been said, Mr. Speaker, about it, under the estimates of the hon. Minister of Agriculture, and also by the hon. member for Essex South (Mr. Paterson), and I do not want to take up too much of the time of this Legislature as the hour is growing later, Mr. Speaker, but I will touch on some of the points.

This shortage of labour has been a severe loss, a concern to the farmers in southwestern Ontario in 1963, and some of those who are in the agricultural industry say that if there is not something done to solve this problem of the shortage of farm labour for harvesting our fruit and vegetables, they are not going to plant their crops this year.

Now, the hon. Minister, when presenting his estimates, made a statement that steps had already been taken to help solve this problem. I think there was a meeting called in Chatham, Leamington and Tillsonburg co-ordinating the committee that was set up, and steps are being taken to see if something can be done to solve this problem.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that at the present time there is a real shortage of farm labour. Perhaps the co-ordinating committee has not got into operation yet but we are starting out of the beginning of the year with a shortage of farm labour, which does not look too promising for harvest time. There was not only a shortage of harvest labour but there is a shortage of workers for the processor too. He also has experienced a shortage of workers to process these crops.

I believe the hon. Minister of Agriculture also said during his estimates that unemployment insurance comes under the federal government, which is a true statement, and that he had nothing to do with it. I do know people who last year would have accepted employment in agriculture but they lacked stamps in their unemployment insurance books to enable them to draw unemployment insurance in the winter time if they needed it. Naturally they did everything they possibly could to get employment in industry and construction, and I think it should be brought to the attention of the federal government that this is one of the problems it is causing: the shortage of farm labour in southwestern Ontario.

I know it is a federal problem, but the shortage of farm labour is a provincial problem, and I think if the hon. Minister of Agriculture drew this to the attention of the federal government it would help to solve the problem of these cash crop farms.

Since the hon. Minister made his statement in the House, about March 3, perhaps developments have taken place. I would appreciate hearing what has taken place since that time, Mr. Speaker, and maybe we have something bright to look forward to.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, in speaking to this resolution that has been on the order paper for some time and which was, as my hon. friend suggested, debated during the estimates of our department some time ago, I would again like to reiterate the fact that the farm labour service function with The Ontario Department of Agriculture is conducted through the Ontario federal-provincial farm labour committee. The present composition of the committee is made up of representatives of our department, headed by the assistant deputy Minister, Mr. Gordon Bennett, with our deputy Minister for the province on the committee as well, and the executive officer of the extension branch, Mr. Montealm, who is also a member of the committee. The other members of the committee are members of the National Employment Service, located in the province of Ontario with the federal government.

The origin of this committee goes back to the period during the second world war, as my hon. friend has suggested in his resolution. There was a programme established at that time where the students were allowed to leave school prior to the end of the normal school term and were, in some instances, allowed to stay out of school in September, in order that the crops could be harvested. This was a wartime measure and it worked exceedingly well. A good many high school students availed themselves of the opportunity to get their year's work on the basis of providing farm labour service and I think it made a great contribution.

As a matter of fact, it was interesting to note that in 1944 there were 48 farm labour camp established and they provided the services of 4,600 workers at that time. This is significant. This arrangement was continued throughout the war years and then following the war it was abandoned, as far as student labour was concerned. They could work in the summer holidays, but the business of letting them out early and keeping them out later in the year was abandoned.

Then, in 1952 there did not seem to be the same patriotic interest in farm labour that had been exhibited by other members of our society than those who were students at high school and university—I am referring to members of various types of work forces, the police, the firemen—many types of workers came out to the farms and rendered a very wonderful service, but this interest gradually disappeared and finally was entirely lacking in evidence. Today I must confess that there are some farmers who still depend on this source of help through private arrangements they make with various service industries in our urban areas.

Another thing that took place during the 1950s was the immigration policy of our government. The number of immigrants who came into the country, in many instances provided farm labour until they got themselves established through learning the language and becoming absorbed into industry in one way or another, until finally that source of labour supply seemed to dry up as well.

There has been a continuing programme established through the Ontario federal-provincial farm labour committee, working with the flue-cured tobacco growers' association in providing skilled workers from the southern United States to assist with the tobacco harvest. During the past five years an average of 3,000 workers per year has been admitted from the United States. Each year during the tobacco harvest a problem seemed to arise in accommodating itinerant workers, not only from the United States but from other areas of the province as well.

In 1962 an interesting experiment was set up. A tobacco harvest workers' co-ordinating committee was established in the tobacco-growing area. It arranged for the organization of a temporary camp to accommodate itinerant workers. A major portion of the financing has been assumed by The Department of Public Welfare and the municipalities involved. Under this programme the federal-provincial governments and the municipalities shared in the cost, with the major share of it being borne by the senior government. This project was again operated in 1963 and has worked very successfully in these two years. I feel sure it will be continued in the future.

I think it should be pointed out though, in all fairness, that the matter which my friend, the hon. member for Kent East raises, is something of a seasonal nature really. Being of a seasonal nature, it becomes something of a problem for those farmers needing this help to have accommodation for the farm help. In many instances, arrangements have been made for the farm help to be transported from the urban community to the farm and back again and this has worked reasonably well. A typical illustration is the Toronto area here and the Bradford marsh, north of Toronto, where a great many farm help are transported daily back and forth from Toronto. Approximately 2,000 workers are supplied to several growers in these areas from Metropolitan Toronto during the season.

The federal government and our provincial government Department of Agriculture and Department of Labour have been working together to see how best we can cope with this situation which does exist as far as farm help is concerned. I think it will be an increasing problem to provide farm help in the future. Not any longer, really, do farmers want the type of help, generally speaking, who have nothing more to offer than their hands. More and more, farmers are interested in obtaining help who have a knowledge of operating machinery—very expensive and complicated machinery as well.

What I believe is that of necessity we are going to have to continue and to expand the training of young people from across Ontario in the operation of farm machinery—perhaps set up specialized courses in our schools at Kemptville, Ridgetown and Guelph, and I would like to suggest, in some of the vocational schools that are now being established in the province, to train these young people to be agricultural machinery mechanics.

We are training motor mechanics, as far as this is concerned, in our vocational schools and there is a great demand for these people. Young boys are interested in getting into these courses. I do not know of any who cannot find work. But really a motor mechanic is quite different from the type of mechanic who is required in a farm implement repair shop, shall we say, or as the operator of a farm machine. He has to know something more than just the mechanization of a gas or a diesel engine. He has to know something about the operation and adjustments of a combine, for example. These are things that are of a specialized nature.

We have now worked out an arrangement through the recommendations of the farm machinery committee that was set up a year ago, to provide for the establishment of just such courses as I have mentioned, across the province of Ontario. I think they will meet a very real need in the future. With the hon. Minister of Labour I think we can work out something that will be of real benefit.

I would like to say, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Labour for the government of Canada is proposing that there be an arrangement between the ten provinces and the federal government toward a farm labour agreement based on mutual co-operation and mutual participation, with the establishment within each province of a senior representative to carry on the work of the farm placement of labour in each respective province in co-operation with the federal National Employment Service.

Quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to debate this matter here, but it does seem to me that we should look at this with a degree of anticipation because I think it has many possibilities. At the same time I think we should recognize the fact as a provincial government that the federal government provides the National Employment Service. They have offices and the machinery allocated, if I may use the term. They have the procedural, functional operation now going across the various provinces. It would seem to me to be a duplication of service if we were to set up a similar type of service here.

I would like to suggest, with all due respect to the idea that came out of the meeting that was called in 1962, attended by the various provinces and the federal government for this type of agreement, that we should now in the light of present-day circumstances, examine this proposal with the idea of leaving all of this matter of the placement of labour entirely in the hands of the National Employment Service in the respective provinces. We would co-operate with it in every way possible, from the standpoint of setting up our committee, working with it in an advisory capacity just as we have in the past, but leaving the actual operation of it in the hands of the organization that is now in operation.

I leave this to the consideration of the House, Mr. Speaker. I believe that we also should recognize the fact, and I do not suggest for a moment that this was what has generated my hon. friend's resolution, that last year was perhaps one of the most unusual years for the harvesting of our cash crops that we have ever experienced. We had that type of season. It was cold and dry, and our crops did not mature—that is the cash crops did not mature. Then we got into a beautiful period of weather in September and October, and the crops finally matured. But a lot of these students had gone back to school and to university and so we found ourselves harvesting these crops at a time of the year in which they normally would not be harvested, and without the normal type of school help that is usually available.

Perhaps with the early growing season that appears to be in evidence already in Ontario this year, this will not be a problem. We certainly hope it will not be a problem to the same extent it was before, but I can assure my hon. friend that our Ontario federal-provincial and farm labour committee are aware of this matter. A survey is being conducted in the respective communities that my hon. friend referred to earlier, and in which meetings have already been held. We hope that a suitable and satisfactory solution will be worked out.

Mr. D. A. Paterson (Essex South): In rising to support the resolution of the hon. member for Kent East, there are two brief points that I would like to make concerning the desperate urgency of the situation at present.

In regard to the farm students, I would hope that, possibly this year, a special dispensation can be given through The Department of Education to allow students to participate in the early planting. Yesterday I was in my riding, touring various areas. The manager of our largest packing house is down in Quebec on his own, recruiting labour to bring back to my riding this next week. They are very desperate.

But if it is possible for the students with A-1 qualifications to get off school this spring during the planting season without losing the grants to the towns or townships school boards, I am sure this would be greatly appreciated by the ridings in Kent and Essex counties.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, I think there are two reasons for supporting the resolution now before us. The first is the one that the hon. member for Kent East explained quite well. That is the need, as far as is humanly possible, to assure an adequate supply of farm labour when it is required. I will not try to improve on what he said because I do not think it is possible for me to do that. He knows far more about the situation than I do.

I would, however, like to mention what I can see to be the second reason for supporting this resolution. That is through systematic effort such as the resolution proposes. As I understand from the hon. Minister, an attempt is being made right now so that it may be possible to improve working conditions for farm labour.

I think it is fair to say, Mr. Speaker, that some of the worst exploitation of labour takes place in the farm labour field. Wages are low, hours are long and conditions are frequently deplorable. We have heard much about the unfortunate migrant workers in the U.S., in such states as California and also in the southern U.S. Those who have studied the problem of poverty usually list the migrant worker as one of the people most in need of attention and assistance. We have migrant labourers in this province, too, not on the same scale as California, but we certainly have it. Many of the same problems exist.

Indeed, according to what the hon. Minister has told us, and I think most of us knew it already, a good deal of this migrant labour is being brought in from the southern United States. The very people who are subject to exploitation in their own country are being brought in here. I suspect the wages they are being paid are far from adequate.

Also, these migrant workers in particular, are frequently the subject of victimization. I think some of this victimization could be remedied by regularization of the labour supply. That, at least, would eliminate the possibility of the fee-charging employment agent, who grabs off a piece of the already inadequate wages that these people get. It may also prevent some other forms of cheating that have been perpetrated upon them, and which are only inadequately covered by the provisions of The Masters and Servants Act.

I appreciate that this is a very difficult problem when looked at from both points of view. There is no question that it needs most earnest consideration. I would say that one of the methods, and the basic method we are going to have to consider if we want to improve the supply of farm labour, is to devise ways and means of providing proper working conditions and proper wages for these people.

I suspect that the situation is going to be tougher this year than it was, even, last year when there were exceptional circumstances involved. Unemployment is at a low level this year and, when people are not desperate, they are not going to get into the sort of situations that are all too often frequent in the farm labour market. So that the interests of both the farmer and the worker are protected, proper regularization of the whole market is required. Every effort should be made to balance demand and supply as far as it is possible to do. Serious steps should be made to ensure that proper wages are paid and proper working conditions are available to these people.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Speaker, may I just have a word with respect to this matter, because it is one of some concern not only to the government, but to my department?

There are some points that should be kept in mind when considering this subject. I will endeavour to record them. Other than that, I would not suggest that we will be able to settle the matter this evening.

This matter resolves itself into a question of supply and demand. Those who operate farms, and are employers of labour, must enter the employment market. They will have to engage in the area of supply and demand and the available labour. The market price for the labour is a factor which will have to be taken into account.

There has been considerable discussion, particularly in the past few weeks and with reference to my own department, having to do with minimum wages and wages paid; and the general area of wages with respect to agricultural labour. Of this I am cognizant. I am concerned about the general subject matter. I cannot, of course, ignore it. The information that comes to me from a reputable and reasonably reliable source is that farm labour in this province is receiving no less than $1.12 an hour, including board, or 92 cents an hour without board. I put this, I am sorry, in reverse—$1.12 without board and 92 cents an hour with board. I simply record these figures in Hansard and before the House. I neither support them nor do I say they are wrong.

The question of the labour market, of course, has a direct bearing on the state of prosperity which our province is presently enjoying. The unemployment rate at the moment is 2.5 per cent in Ontario, which is probably the lowest known figure in history. Two-and-one-half per cent, of course, must be analyzed. We know that there are many areas requiring labour; unskilled in some cases, skilled in others, where the required bodies are just not available. At the same time we know that there are people seeking employment, probably in other areas of this province, but we are unable to make the adjustment from where the supply is available to where the demand exists. And when we are talking about a 2.5 per cent unemployment figure, we are down to such a consideration as I am pointing out to the House.

With a view to attacking this matter, and to getting some information which is intelligible, information which our Department of Economics can deal with and which our Department of Agriculture can consider and which our Department of Labour can work with, we have endeavoured to go to the federal government to secure this information. It is recognized, and I state it and we are grateful for it, that we do have a high degree of co-operation with the various offices and officials of the National Employment Service.

If I might digress for a moment, I will state the policy of my department in these matters. We will endeavour to provide services but it is not our intention to go into areas where service is already being provided so that we avoid a duplication of effort. But in trying to get at this information of where this labour supply is available, why people are unemployed, we have met with a completely closed door and I put this before the House because I would not want any hon. member to come to any conclusion that would suggest by way of inference or otherwise, that the province of Ontario and this government is not interested in this tender subject matter. We are trying to analyze it, we are trying to get at the root of the thing, but we are being blocked at the moment because of certain positions taken by the federal government at Ottawa in not letting us secure the information.

Mr. Cowling moves the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves that this House do now adjourn until 10:30 of the clock tomorrow morning, to rise for lunch and recess at 12:30 and resume at two of the clock in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 11.45 o'clock, p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

THURSDAY, MAY 7, 1964

The House met at 10.30 o'clock, a.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: We are always pleased to have visitors to the Legislature and today we welcome as guests in the west gallery, students from Highland Heights Public School, Peterborough.

Presenting petitions.

Presenting reports by committees.

Mr. A. F. Lawrence (St. George) begs leave to table the report of the standing committee on public accounts.

Mr. H. E. Beckett (York East) from the committee on The Municipal Act and related Acts, begs to submit its third report.

Mr. Speaker: Motions.

Introduction of bills.

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I would like to bring to the attention of the House through you, sir, a series of very important farm credit meetings.

Farm credit needs in Ontario are emerging as one of the most important problems in agriculture, and The Ontario Department of Agriculture is anxious to make all farmers aware of the various sources of credit, and uses and costs of credit. Therefore, a series of special meetings will be held in key centres in the province beginning on June 8 this year and lasting through to June 12.

The object of these meetings, which will be entitled "Farm Credit—Where to Get It and How to Use It," is to bring farmers together in these various centres to discuss the importance of credit in successful farming operations, and the types and sources of credit which are available. A special team of department personnel, in co-operation with the federated colleges in Guelph, will be made available for these meetings. All of them are trained and have extensive knowledge of farm credit problems.

Participating will be the economics department of the federated colleges; the farm economics and statistics branch of The Ontario Department of Agriculture; personnel from the Kemptville and Ridgetown schools; the extension branch of the department, and also the information branch which will work with press, radio and television in the promotion of attendance at these meetings and in providing graphic, visual aids which will be helpful in understanding many of the complicated features of farm credit programmes.

Discussions at these meetings will cover the whole field of farm credit, from conventional loans on real estate which are presently available, and the various farm assistance loans which are available from the provincial and federal governments, to intermediate and short-term credit for which the modern farmer has a growing and urgent need if he is to manage his farm successfully.

At one time, conventional mortgages were able to provide the capital needed to acquire and finance a farm. However, the situation is radically changed today. Now, more than half the capital value of our farms is in the form of livestock, equipment, feed and supplies. More financing is required for short and intermediate use through loans issued by banks, credit unions, finance companies and merchandise accounts. Another source of credit is also emerging on a very large scale in the form of merchandise or sales credit. It is estimated in Canada at the present moment that there is some $500 million of trade credit exposure to farmers from head offices of firms dealing in farm equipment and supplies. It is also estimated that there is probably this much again available to farmers by the dealers of these companies acting on their own responsibility.

Much of the credit advanced by dealers is in turn transferred to finance companies, and the whole process of this form of credit not only becomes costly, but can also result in unpleasant experiences. It may not be generally appreciated, but the fact is that the capital requirements per man in farming are about the highest of any industry in Canada, running about $30,000 per man.

Under our family farm system we have the tradition of owner-operator farms. As farms change ownership, it becomes necessary to finance a farm at least once every generation. There are over $3.25 billion tied up in Ontario farms in farm real estate, equipment and livestock. Much more capital is also required for feed supplies, operating expenses, and living expenses until returns come in. Altogether this is a staggering amount to refinance every generation.

As well as dealing with the government loan programmes, and the conventional loans through banks and trust companies, this series of farm credit meetings across the province will also go into all of the other methods of financing and credit so that the farmers of Ontario will be able to arrange a sound management programme and also be alerted to some of the dangers and pitfalls in ill-advised credit programmes.

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary) begs leave to present to the House the thirty-second annual report of the Minister of Public Welfare, 1962-63 and the Ontario Hospital Services Commission annual report, 1962.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: Fourth order, committee of the whole House; Mr. W. G. Noden in the chair.

THE APPRENTICESHIP AND TRADESMEN'S QUALIFICATION ACT, 1964

House in committee on Bill No. 4, The Apprenticeship and Tradesmen's Qualification Act, 1964.

Bill No. 4 reported.

THE BAILIFFS ACT, 1960-61

House in committee on Bill No. 39, An Act to amend The Bailiffs Act, 1960-61.

Sections 1 to 6, inclusive, agreed to.

Bill No. 39 reported.

Clerk of the House: The Honourable the Lieutenant Governor recommends the following:

That, any amount payable by the Crown under subsection eight of section 94a of The Registry Act towards the cost of a judge's plan shall be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, as provided by Bill No. 44, An Act to amend The Registry Act.

Resolution concurred in.

THE REGISTRY ACT

House in committee on Bill No. 44, An Act to amend The Registry Act.

Sections 1 to 16, inclusive, agreed to.

On section 17:

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Concerning section 17, you will find the portion of the section on page 9 of the bill, subsection 6. I move that clause (b) of the proposed subsection 6 be amended by striking out the words "a deed, conveyance, mortgage, assignment of mortgage, lease, assignment of lease, plan of subdivision, release or quit claim made by", in the first, second and third lines, and by striking out the words "or by" in the fourth line.

Sections 17, as amended, to 37, inclusive, agreed to.

On section 38:

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, with respect to section 38, I move that the figure "8" be inserted before the figure "33" in the first line of subsection (1) and in the first line of subsection (2) of the said section 38.

Sections 38, as amended, and 39 agreed to.

THE SCHOOLS ADMINISTRATION ACT

House in committee on Bill No. 52, An Act to amend The Schools Administration Act.

On section 1:

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Chairman, I can see that my logical argument on second reading of this bill had no apparent effect on the Minister (Mr. Davis). We still have the scale of maximum remuneration permitted for school trustees, unchanged from the time the bill was first introduced in the House. At the time, I got certain information about average daily attendance in the Metropolitan Toronto area. I regret to say I have since lost that information, so what I say now is purely from memory. My recollection is that there are only two school boards in this area with average daily attendance of 60,000 or more. I think they are the Toronto board of education and the North York township board. I do not think even Scarborough has that much. It may or may not. It is very close.

There are probably not, I would think, more than half a dozen school boards in the whole province that have a system with average daily attendance of 60,000 or more, with the result that your maximum of $150, the highest maximum permitted, applies only to a very few school boards. The school boards to which it applies are school boards which in some cases involve very close to full-time work by some of the trustees, particularly by the chairman of the board. It seems to me quite ridiculous that in the city of Toronto the remuneration of school trustees should be limited to $150 per month, or $1,800 per year, whereas aldermen, I think after the next election, will be getting something over $4,000, and by aldermen I mean merely city aldermen. Those who are on Metro council get a further supplement.

My observation is that there is just as much business to attend to and just as much time being consumed by trustees as there is by aldermen. I see no reason at all why school trustees should not get the same remuneration as aldermen if they take the responsibility of voting it for themselves and appearing before the electorate on that basis.

I think that in this bill, as in so much legislation that has appeared before this House over the years, the government thinks in rural terms. I have no doubt that in a school board where the average daily attendance is fewer than 60, a monthly honorarium of $5 is in order, or if the average school attendance is less than 1,000 it may very well be sufficient to provide a monthly honorarium of $40. But I think it is time in this province with its heavy urbanization that we started to look at problems from the urban point of view, and not have everything determined by what is satisfactory in rural areas. I think that full consideration should be given to the rural areas and their needs should be considered. So, also, should the needs of the urban areas and particularly of the great and growing metropolitan areas.

The problem that has arisen in the past from the failure to permit any remuneration for school trustees, and a problem that will be only partly mitigated by the quite inadequate remuneration which is now to be permitted, is that it is difficult to get many people to serve on school boards. A school board has a tendency to become a select club of people who can afford to spend a great deal of their time without remuneration. I am not objecting to the service provided by those people—I think it is a fine thing that they offer their services—but in a democratic society I think elective office should be open in fact as well as in theory to all citizens and it should be financially possible for any citizen to serve in any elective office. The remuneration provided to elected officials should be sufficient to compensate them for the time they lose in attending to their duties as elected officers.

There was a comment from behind me referring to this House. I am not suggesting that there is any serious problem in this House at all. I think—

Mr. E. Sargent (Grey North): Who is supplementing your salary?

Mr. Bryden: Nobody is supplementing my salary. I really think, Mr. Chairman, that it is time we had an end to this type of cheap comment to the effect that some people in this House are somehow having their salaries supplemented in some improper way. If anybody wants to know, I am largely dependent on the income I receive as a member of this House. I have a small supplementary income which is purely from my own resources and has nothing to do with any other person. I hope that is settled once and for all and we will not hear further sotto voce comments on this matter.

However, I do not think, with regard to the members of this House there is any problem at all on remuneration. If there is a problem, it is nothing like the problem that exists with regard to school boards. The bill that the hon. Minister has before us now is a half-hearted, half-way attempt to solve a problem. I had thought that the hon. Minister was a more decisive man than that. In fact, I think in many of his activities he has demonstrated that he has greater courage and power of decision than is demonstrated here.

What he has put before us here is a feeble compromise that does not really solve the problem at all for at least the larger school boards in the province. It may be satisfactory for some of the smaller school boards, but I think it is time the hon. Minister looked at the problems of the trustees on the larger boards. I hope that, having done so, he may next year concede that what he has put before us now is quite unsatisfactory and come in with an amendment that will permit school boards to put their remuneration on approximately the same level as municipal councils are now able to do. I realize that it is difficult to create an exact parallel between school boards and municipal councils, but as far as it is possible to do so, I think they should be on exactly the same basis.

Mr. A. H. Cowling (High Park): Mr. Chairman, on that particular point, I think it should be pointed out that for many years the school trustees association of the province appeared before the standing committee on education and time after time recommended that there be no remuneration paid to the school trustees in the province. I have been a member of that committee for a great number of years and I was impressed by the fact that they were not asking for any remuneration. Many school trustees, and I say Toronto school trustees — I am familiar with them maybe more than other areas of the province—have for years been proud of the fact that they serve in their capacity of school trustees without remuneration and that is the way many of them still want it.

The very idea of paying a school trustee for the time that he or she may spend on work of his local school board would be impossible, because we cannot pay these people the amount of money that would compensate them for the hours they spend on their work. There is not any figure you could put on the great work they do. I say that this bill is a move in the right direction and will assist some people who need financial assistance, but I still think that the great majority of our school trustees in this province are public spirited citizens who wish to serve in the area of education without remuneration, and they are proud of this fact.

This attracts many types of citizens, for the most part very well educated themselves, who are prepared to take on and do their share of looking after the problems of education in our province without pay. I think it is a secondary matter and as far as I am concerned, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that any of our trustees or any people contemplating running for the board of education will say, "We are going to be paid so we will contest the election on the first Monday in December." I do not think that applies here at all.

I think the whole purpose of the bill is perhaps to offset some expenses by way of gasoline and incidental expenses that a school trustee might incur in the process of his work. But I do not think at any time that we would expect, or that the school trustees and their associations would expect that we would be able to pay, or that they would be paid for the great services that they render to the citizens of our province.

I think the bill is a step in the right direction but as far as paying school trustees for their time and efforts, it would entail a great deal of money and I do not think that they expect it.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Chairman, I think what the hon. member for High Park has said is true in the sense that the people who are our school trustees do a very fine public service job. I know that for a long time many of the trustees felt that remuneration was unnecessary, but I would submit this, that most of the people who at that time were on school boards had another source of income, and that source of income was not interfered with by their work on the school board. When we come to the very large metropolitan complexes we have today, some of the large municipalities in and surrounding areas of Toronto, Hamilton, Windsor and so on, we come to the place where, if a trustee is to do an adequate job, evening work is not enough. Very often it has to be supplemented by quite a significant amount of daytime work.

The way this is achieved today is by more ladies, who have the time, getting on the school boards. That is good. I think this is very good. But I know of many instances where a man who works, perhaps, on various shifts, both in a supervisory and a worker's capacity, has been cut off from the possibility of running for the school board because, if he did, it would mean that he would have to take a very significant loss in income.

I think that for this group alone it is important that they should not suffer financially if they want to do public service of this kind in the larger areas. Certainly, in my municipality and in others like it, the amount signified here is not adequate to look after the loss of income, which good people might suffer by taking on this kind of public responsibility.

I would submit, sir, that even if we doubled the $150 per month it would mean in the large municipalities, not more than ten cents per head per year. This would be a figure which, to me, is not a high price for us to pay for this kind of service. It would not add significantly to our tax rate; just a very small addition. It would make it possible for many people to do the job they would like to do in this field.

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education): Mr. Chairman, I want to make one thing very clear. We discussed this when the bill had second reading. We spoke of it in the committee and I pointed out to hon. members at that time that these figures had been discussed quite fully with the trustees' council, who conducted a poll of the trustees of the province on their own initiative. This is quite a new departure in the administration of schools, and the trustees' council felt—we seek their advice and guidance in these matters—that these amounts for the commencement of this departure from what has been the principle in the past, is perhaps quite adequate for this type of service.

As is pointed out in the bill, we are not referring to it as a salary. It is an honorarium. You should realize that 25 per cent of the trustees still voted against receiving any honorarium. I anticipate, as time goes on and the idea receives almost universal acceptance, that these rates will be altered over a period of time. But I want to make it very clear as I did to, I think, the hon. member for York South (Mr. MacDonald) and the education committee, that these figures had all been discussed with the trustees' council, which organization is the spokesman for the trustees here in the province.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I think it should be mentioned, however, that the people who are discriminated against in this schedule are grossly under-represented in the trustees' council. If you take a simple poll of trustees in number, they would be swamped. The Toronto school board has a total of 18 members. If you take a poll of trustees, they would have 18 votes and 18 local boards, which have fewer than 60 days average daily attendance, would equal their votes. I believe that the trustees of the city of Toronto are unanimous, or almost unanimous, in wanting a higher scale. I think that their need should be considered. They are only 18. I do not know how many trustees there may be in the province of Ontario, but their responsibilities and the amount of money they are responsible for would be equal to that of several thousand others, if you take in the rural trustees. This sort of counting of heads, by which the hon. Minister justifies his present policy, is simply not appropriate for the situation. We consider the needs of each board on its own merit—

Hon. Mr. Davis: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I did not say that the salary was determined. There was no question of a salary mentioned in the questionnaire. It was the number of people who wished to be paid. On the trustees' council the urban boards have as much say, if not more, than the rural boards.

The council is a group, and I cannot give the hon. member the exact figure now, who are representatives of the various trustee organizations. The poll was not conducted on what the people should be paid, so that the urban people on the trustees' council had as much voice or interest in the discussions on this provision as the great bulk of the people from outside the urban areas. It was not done in the manner that the hon. member suggests.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I would still submit to the hon. Minister that the thing is weighted in favour of the smaller boards. It has to be.

Hon. Mr. Davis: The trustees' council is not weighted that way.

Mr. Bryden: What weight would the Toronto board have, for example, in the whole council? Certainly nothing in proportion to the expenditures that the Toronto board is responsible for. Even so, the point, I would suggest, is still invalid if the bigger boards are in a minority. They should not be discriminated against. Their position should be determined by other people who are facing other problems. It is still part of this rural approach to the solution of problems and, I submit, the needs of trustees in the Toronto area should be considered on their own merits, and not in relation to how somebody votes in some small rural area.

Mr. Cowling: Have you talked to any of them?

Mr. Bryden: Yes, I have. One of the former chairmen, a prominent member of your party, Mr. Stainsby—

Mr. Cowling: What did he have to say about it? I have talked to them, too.

Mr. Bryden: What did they say? They are all against this.

Mr. T. L. Wells (Scarborough North): Mr. Chairman, I think I could speak with a little authority on this, having been the chairman of one of the largest boards in Ontario, the Scarborough board of education, for two years, 1961 and 1962.

Mr. Chairman, in the poll that was conducted by the Ontario School Trustees' Council, the boards were broken down by size. While the total vote was about 2.5 to 1 in favour of payment, the vote from urban area boards of education—the large boards which the hon. member for Woodbine is talking about—was against payment of trustees.

However, the trustees' council, taking this into consideration with all the facts, decided to again approach the hon. Minister, as they did, with the results of this poll. But I make this very clear—the large boards, including the Toronto board of education which I think has, through the years, voted against asking for pay for trustees and has opposed this measure at most trustee conventions that I have been at—

Mr. R. Gisborn (Wentworth East): That is to perpetuate the incumbent.

Mr. Wells: The Toronto board and the other large boards went along with the results of all the trustees of Ontario and asked for this legislation. As the hon. Minister has said, the trustees' council has seen this bill. The trustees of the large boards have seen this bill. While there may be one or two people objecting, most of them that I have talked to—in fact, the majority—are in favour of this as a good beginning. They agree with this. This is a new principle—an honorarium for trustees—and most trustees in this province, and the large boards, agree with this and support these figures as a good beginning.

On section 2:

Hon. Mr. Davis: In section 2—and I discussed this amendment with the hon. members for Brant (Mr. Nixon) and York South—I move that section 40 be amended by striking out "11" in the first line of subsection 1 and substituting therefor "12", and by adding thereto the following subsection

Where a township has a population of more than 10,000 according to the municipal census for the year 1963, the Minister may divide the township into two township school areas provided that neither area has in its public schools for the year 1963 an average daily attendance of under 300 pupils, and by renumbering sections 11 to 14 as 12 to 15, respectively.

Mr. Chairman, this was discussed, as I say, with the hon. member for Brant and the hon. member for York South. It arose out of the representations to the education committee from some of the more densely populated townships. We are thus enabled, or the Minister is, to exercise a discretion, say, in Pickering or Markham townships, to allow two areas provided that the overall purpose or principle of the bill of having, say, a minimum school population of 300 is not altered, and we feel that this amendment will solve the situation that was brought to the attention of the education committee.

Minister would consider giving the chief or the deputy chief the option to recall the full-time firefighter. This section ties it down. It does not give any flexibility to the performance of the fireman in coming back after hours. In small forces where we are limited as to staff, we are cutting our staff from six to four men per shift now. It gives us very limited protection, and if the chief cannot call back unless it is a disaster it ties him down pretty closely. I would like to see added: "If in the opinion of the deputy chief there is need but not a disaster." I mean, make it wider than that. Would he consider that?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I would say to the hon. member, Mr. Chairman, that I think the words "fire, flood or other disaster" leave a fairly wide latitude.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Chairman, before this bill becomes law, may I state that I am violently opposed to subsection (1).

Mr. Chairman: Order! Wait until the section is called.

On section 1:

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Chairman, briefly, referring to the Ontario Police Commission as formed, there is no parallel in Canada for a police commission in a province or even in the government of Canada. We have another case, I would say, by the formation of this Ontario Police Commission, where things are swept under the rug. We have, increasingly, government by commission, where freedoms are controlled not by elected officials but by appointed officials who have no term certain for their appointment. I am glad to see that the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Roberts) has called for a Royal commission to study the judiciary.

But getting back to government by commission, which we are having more and more of in this province, the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs has the municipal board to make his decisions for him.

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): The municipal board does not make any decisions for me.

Mr. Sargent: All right—

Mr. Chairman: Order! I would ask the member to be seated, please. This section has nothing to do with the setting up of the police commission.

Mr. Sargent: For the record, I am opposed to the formation of the Ontario Police Commission. It is not representative of the people of Ontario. The elected officials on that board are not representatives. They are judges, magistrates and lawyers. Crime Bill No. 99 is going to go on the record books as being the guidepost for our freedom in this province for a long time, wherein you tell the municipalities that they are going to be under the Ontario Police Commission. This is not organized crime, it is organized confusion we have here. We are passing our powers to the Ontario Police Commission.

Mr. Chairman: Order! This bill does not form the commission, it was formed two years ago.

Mr. Sargent: I would like to say, Mr. Chairman, that I would hope, as a citizen of this province, the hon. Prime Minister will appoint to this Royal commission, not a justice to make our decisions for us, but people who are qualified in all walks of life—not just lawyers and magistrates, but people who are—

Mr. Chairman: Order! I would ask the member to stay on section 1 of the bill.

Mr. Sargent: I am talking about the Ontario Police Commission. I know the essence of time is in the estimates, but I want to register my objection that the police commission—

Mr. Chairman: Order! The member is out of order.

Mr. Sargent: I am not out of order, sir. I am talking on this police commission. I will bow to the chair, but it is a serious thing when we have to take our directions from a group appointed by this government to run our freedom in this province for a long time to come.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, following the second reading of Bill No. 108, a number of representations were made with respect to certain provisions of the bill and I should inform the House that prior to that time a considerable amount of correspondence and a number of briefs were presented with respect to the provisions of the bill, and in view of all the material which has been presented with respect to the bill, I feel that perhaps it deserves further study and would ask therefore that it be not proceeded with at this time.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat regretful that the bill is not being proceeded with. This means that for another year it will not be in force. I believe, however, that there are complications here so that the bill, although it had a worthy objective, could have had some undesirable side effects. If the legislative counsel are of the opinion that they cannot straighten it out to accomplish the desirable effects and eliminate the undesirable side effects, then I suppose there is no option but to let the bill go for another year. I would hope, however, that the hon. Minister will pursue the good idea that he has here with the idea of bringing in legislation next year.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Dovercourt): Mr. Chairman, I would like to say from our side, and I am speaking personally as well on this, that every day we meet this situation. I had one yesterday: some poor people who have come up against the abuses meted out by men who really do not deserve to be used-car dealers in the legitimate sense. I think that you recognize the necessity of something being done here. We agree with the point of view being expressed and I concur with the hon. member for Woodbine.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I am indebted to both the hon. gentlemen. I might say that some of the representations that were made came from them. The problems which arise under this bill—it looked to me as if you might create greater problems in some respects than you solve and some of the other legislation which will be before the House in the committee of the whole shortly, will take care of some of the situations which we are attempting to resolve here.

THE DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION ACT

House in committee on Bill No. 130, An Act to amend The Department of Education Act.

On section 1:

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, Bills Nos. 130 and 131 deal with the same problem and I would like to make a remark or two on this problem. Bill No. 131 may be the proper place, but if what I say should have any influence, some changes in Bill No. 130 would perhaps follow. Perhaps I could do it at this point.

Mr. Chairman: Carry on.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, since these two bills passed second reading there has been a great deal of public discussion and some of us have been taking a fairly hard look at them. Certainly the Ontario Association for Retarded Children has been doing a very fine job in the province in setting up schools for retarded children and carrying those schools through. Some municipalities have been making certain grants to the associations and there have been other grants which have assisted the schools, but by and large this has been done outside the framework of the local authorities.

The suggestion is that some radical alteration take place in the whole setup of education for retarded children, and this is good. But when a major move like this takes place we should make certain that that move is in the right direction. I raise a question or two here as to whether or not the local council of the municipality is really the proper place where certain responsibilities should lie, because the council does not have the primary responsibility for education. It has little to do with education except for rather automatically passing the budget of the board each year. It seems to me that the local school board is the place where this responsibility ought ultimately to rest. That is, the education of retarded children should be part and parcel of the educational process of the municipality.

I recognize there are some difficulties, and it seems to me that if this authority is set up, it should be, in effect, a subcommittee of the board of education or the school board, in the same way that a library board is a subcommittee of the local council. The authority should submit its budget to the local school board. That budget should be gone over just as other budgets of subcommittees are gone over. It should be adopted and then the authority should administer that budget within its bounds. If it wants to raise extra funds as well as the many home and school associations may do for local schools, that is its own business, and it might want to do that for specific projects. As far as the operation of that budget is concerned, by bringing it under the school board certain things such as bus transportation and the purchase of materials and general supervision might be much easier and could be more readily integrated into the total educational pattern of a municipality.

Now, as far as appointments are concerned, I have no quarrel with the bill. Two should be appointed by the local association for retarded children, but the others should be appointed by the board of education. Certainly it seems to me that one or more members of the authority should be members of the board; the rest, I think, logically would be as they are today, in effect, under the present setup, the parents of retarded children or people vitally interested in this field. I think that kind of responsibility would be accepted. Certainly people who are interested vitally in this field would accept such responsibility.

This way the authority becomes the primary concern of the board of education. It is responsible to the board both for appointment and for administration.

Now, I realize that, certainly, where municipalities overlap and vis-à-vis the separate school boards, where these exist, there would be certain problems. But I do not think these are insurmountable. Membership of the separate school boards could be represented on the authority and certain charges could be made for children who might otherwise be going to separate schools if they had the intellectual capacity to go there. These details could be worked out.

It also seems to me that since this is a very expensive bit of education, and one which so far has not had too much attention from local authorities, the province should accept more than the 80 per cent of the cost. Certainly 90 per cent, if not all of it. But 90 per cent, at least. That grant should be paid to the local school board, which would be responsible for its administration. Of course, the province would want to know how those funds are administered.

These are matters, I think, Mr. Chairman, that should be given very serious consideration and I would appreciate it if the hon. Minister would take this matter back and give it that consideration in the light of the submissions I have made, and in the light of public discussion, and bring the bill back to us at a later date.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well, Mr. Chairman, I think it is obvious that we all agree in principle that we want some manner or some authority to look after the 2,700 retarded children who are presently in the schools. To take this back at this point could delay this for a year and none of us, really, Mr. Chairman, would wish this to happen.

As the hon. member has suggested, there has been some discussion in the press. It has emanated primarily from the Metropolitan Toronto council. I met with the chairman and four or five other members of the Metropolitan Toronto council this morning; I explained to them the very complex nature of this legislation and the suggestions made by the hon. member were very carefully considered. It was the judgment—and I think a proper judgment—in the evolution of this type of education that we had to keep local associations very definitely involved. I think we should all agree with this.

We also provided in the legislation that the municipal involvement would give the right to the actual municipal councillors, if they so desire, to sit on the retarded children's authority. This is very specifically in the Act. It departs from the board of education situation where the board of education can go to the council for operating costs and say, "This is our budget." The municipal councils have four members out of the six on the retarded children's authority and as a result are in a position to exert, I would think, substantial influence in the operation of these schools.

Also—and I think perhaps the hon. member notices this in the legislation, this refers to operation—there are no capital obligations imposed on the municipality. This will remain in the hands of the local associations during this evolutionary period. I stated when I introduced this legislation that it did not reflect what the end result may be in this type of education here in Ontario, but certainly it is a piece of legislation that is both unique and of great social significance. This is not purely an educational problem. The interest of the parents, the development of the attitude of parents, in many areas of the province, is still very necessary if we are to get these young people into the school.

I read in one of the editorials in the evening paper last night that there were roughly 40,000. Well, this may very easily be the case, but we only have 2,700 in the schools at this time and I think this indicates the depth or the nature of the problem and that these young people must be encouraged. I suggest that this is not the best way to do it, through our regular school programme. I think they have to be separated, certainly at this stage.

I appreciate the observations of the hon. member and as I told these people who visited me this morning, when the grant regulations are considered—and these are important as far as this legislation is concerned—as far as we are concerned—we would be very pleased to discuss them with the Metropolitan Toronto council. I have no hesitation in doing this whatsoever.

May I refer to the hon. member's observation as to the amount of grant. We are paying a grant here in Toronto for the regular school system; I am just guessing at this at the moment; it might be in the neighbourhood of 34, 35, maybe as high as 38 per cent. I am not sure of this. We propose to pay a minimum of 80 per cent in this. It may be higher. It has not been determined. But I think it is obvious that the grant that will be paid for the education of these young people will be twice as much as would be paid if it were through the regular school programme.

Mr. Chairman, we have had interest in this from other jurisdictions. I regard this, quite frankly, as a very enlightened piece of legislation. I acknowledge there may be problems and it is not the end as far as the education of the retarded is concerned. I think this House can take some actual pride in what we have done for retarded children in Ontario and that we can all accept some degree of satisfaction for what we are attempting to do through this legislation.

I realize that it imposes some obligation on the municipality. One can go outside the city of Toronto and find areas where, if an attempt is made to do it through the board as the hon. member has observed, in some areas you are involved with perhaps a real problem as to whether it should be a separate school board or the public school board. Indeed, you can get involved in municipalities like my own where there are six or seven school boards that might be involved. After very careful consideration—and I assure the hon. members, this received the most detailed study—it was felt that this was the best way at this time to handle the education and development of the retarded in this province.

I pointed out these complexities and these problems to the group this morning. While I think perhaps that one or two of them still object to the thought of the municipal council being involved, I am satisfied that two or three of them at least realize the attempt that we are making here, and they recognize that perhaps this is the proper way to do it, certainly at this period in the development of this programme.

Mr. Young: May I ask the hon. Minister a couple of questions? He points out that the capital cost will not be a charge on the municipality. This means, then, that the association itself will have to raise the funds, likely from the people within the municipality or from the parents of the children concerned?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well, Mr. Chairman, as far as capital is concerned, a lot of these schools are presently in existence. We will continue our 50 per cent grant to the association. It is our hope that the association will channel into special areas its interests rather than to the education of these young people, that they will get into the adult workshop field where there is a great need, and where there still must be this very personal relationship. So that the associations—and this did not come easily to the associations—are under this legislation, giving for one dollar or whatever it may be to the authority, the use of the existing school facilities for the operation of these schools.

They will carry on with these other areas of interests in the retarded and areas that I think we should encourage. Capital grants for construction from this government will continue to be the same.

Mr. Young: One more question, Mr. Chairman, if I may—

Mr. Chairman: It being 12.30 of the clock I do now leave the chair and we will resume at two of the clock.

It being 12.30 o'clock, p.m., the House took recess.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

THURSDAY, MAY 7, 1964

The House resumed at 2 o'clock, p.m.

House in committee on Bill No. 130, An Act to amend The Department of Education Act.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Chairman, one further question I wanted to ask the hon. Minister of Education (Mr. Davis). He mentioned that so many municipalities have within them a great many local school boards. But in many cases there are a lot of local municipal governments, too, which cover very small territories. I was wondering if the hon. Minister interprets the council in this case as a county council, or as the council of Metropolitan Toronto.

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education): We interpret it as the council, not the county council. Actually, Mr. Chairman, the city of Toronto brought one matter to our attention and I intend to move an amendment. It is in 112, where it says: "request of the local municipality." The word "local" has caused some confusion and I am going to move that it be deleted.

Mr. Young: Cannot it refer to the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto?

Hon. Mr. Davis: No. It does not refer to a county council, but it refers to the Metropolitan Toronto council.

Mr. Young: But a county council would not set up this kind of an organization?

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, but I was speaking to some of the people, I think from Essex county, and indicated that I thought we would look into this when the regulations are drafted. There the county council is presently doing it. We think we can work this into the regulations to allow the county council to continue making the grants on behalf of all the municipalities.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Chairman, I have followed the progress of this bill with great interest. In addition to that, I have listened carefully to the remarks made in the House, particularly by the hon. member for Yorkview, and noted with some interest the various editorial comments and the comments put forward by Mr. Bascom St. John in the Toronto Globe and Mail. I have been amongst those who, for the past five years, have constantly prodded the government to take some action in the field of the education of retarded children. I have, on previous occasions and I will again this afternoon, compliment the hon. Minister of Education for his approach to this subject. I have said before and I say again this afternoon that he did not change his mind, or his views, once he became a Cabinet Minister. He is carrying out the ideas he expressed as a private member. I think he is carrying them out in this field, which is of utmost importance, in a most commendable fashion.

I deprecate the thought put forward by the hon. member for Yorkview that the bill be taken back for a further look. This idea of examination and re-examination, because possibly we have not come up with all of the final answers, has so often been used as an excuse to postpone indefinitely any action, that I wonder if this might not have been in the mind of the hon. member for Yorkview when he put forward this suggestion.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. Mr. Chairman, this House has not yet prorogued. We have time between now and the end of the session to examine this bill carefully, and to bring back whatever recommendations we may wish to bring. I had no intention whatsoever of delaying the passage of this bill because I feel, as the hon. member for Downsview feels, it is a very important thing to get action—and action quickly—on this. All I was concerned about was that we get action of the right kind. Now, certainly, I would not want to delay the passage of the bill. But this House still has time to give it whatever examination it needs and to finalize the third reading of this bill before we finish our session.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I am very appreciative that the hon. member for Yorkview has cleared his position. I would have thought—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, it is rather interesting to hear the gold dust twins parrotting away as usual, full of sound and fury and signifying absolutely nothing.

Mr. Chairman, as I say, I am most pleased that the hon. member for Yorkview has cleared the record and stated his position that it was not his intention to delay this bill. But I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member for Yorkview is not nearly as naive as he would have us think he is. He has been in politics for a long time and he recognizes at this point that, had the hon. Minister accepted his suggestion, that this bill would not have gone through in this session of this Legislature.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Nonsense.

Mr. Singer: You can nonsense as long as you like, but the facts speak for themselves in this matter, the same as they did for your approach to Bill No. 99 and the supporting bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, to say a few words about the bill. This is a very difficult situation with which to cope in legislation. I recognize the difficulties that are involved in bringing together the various groups. I think the series of suggestions that are brought forward in this legislation seem to be eminently reasonable. Certainly, we do not want to discourage, nor should we, those selfless people who over all these years have created an opportunity for education of educable retarded youngsters.

These people, by and large, are the parents of these youngsters. But there are other interested people who have engaged themselves in this work. I think these people should continue to have some sort of a say in how this education system is going to be carried on. This I would imagine would be the reason, and in this my good friends from the NDP can recognize I am imputing motives to the hon. Minister, I would think this might be the reason why he has two people to come on the board who will come from this group of parents, or people who have been charged in the past with the education of these youngsters. I think this is most commendable.

This perhaps is one of the reasons, as well, why the conduct of these schools will not be carried on by an elected board. So many of these parents have such intolerable burdens in maintaining their family and in running their homes in view of the great tragedy that has been visited upon them. In my opinion it is most unlikely that, had this been thrown open to an elected body, that these people whose experience has been so valuable and who know what the problems are in this field, would have been in the position to offer themselves for public office.

Then, Mr. Chairman, there has been an outcry reflected in the papers, and from other places, that we are taking away from the elected people the right to control this spending of public money. If this was, in fact, the case, I would have joined the criticism. But Mr. Chairman, this is not the case at all. What the hon. Minister is proposing is that the council, which will be responsible, will appoint four people of the six who will serve on the board to carry on these educational matters. The council can appoint four of their own members. What could be more responsible to the elected people than giving the council absolute control of the conduct of these schools? So I say, there has been no infringement at all on the rights of the elected members in dealing with this matter. There are other bodies that have done this, but this is neither the time nor the place to deal with that sort of criticism. But in this case such criticism is not true, in my opinion.

Then there is the suggestion made by the hon. member for Yorkview that these boards of education could do it better. Well, to some extent, and I say to some minor extent, he made a point. They do have administrative set-ups. They have mass-purchasing facilities. They are familiar, perhaps, to a greater extent with running buildings and maintaining them and that sort of thing, and to that limited extent only it might be a better administrative move to fix some responsibility on them.

But to suggest, sir, because they are concerned with education, that they know more about this type of education than the council or the board that is going to run these schools for retarded children, I think is a real error. The boards of education in the province of Ontario are not trained in providing education for retarded youngsters. And any hon. member who has concerned himself with the problem of these youngsters, will recognize that this is an abnormal problem. Unfortunately it is an abnormal problem, a problem that needs a different type of person from those we find in our education system, to take over, administer and control such a system. And for these reasons, I think it is important that the responsibilities be separated.

There is one more reason why I think the responsibilities should be separated and that is because of the difficulty in the split jurisdictions that exist in our educational system between public and separate schools. If you gave the responsibility to boards of education, would you give it to the public school boards or would you give it to the separate school boards? Or would you give each board its own responsibility? Then would we have to face the problem of having public schools to be run for retarded youngsters and separate schools to be run for retarded youngsters? I do not propose to get into the argument about whether the system of public schools or separate schools is good or bad. But I say that if into this serious problem we inject an argument between public and separate schools, then we are ignoring the urgency of providing public aid for retarded children.

Retarded children have a common problem and it does not depend on which religion they happen to belong to. But I would say that in giving jurisdiction to the boards of education, you would have a very serious problem and perhaps end up with two competing systems of schools for retarded youngsters. This would do the whole cause that we are espousing today no good; it would do it serious harm.

For these reasons, I commend the hon. Minister on the legislation he has brought forward and I have no hesitation in suggesting that it will be supported this afternoon. My criticism is that it was not put on the statute books some years ago. It should have been there five years ago or even earlier. We do not make too much progress in these matters too quickly, but here in this instance there is progress being made. In my opinion this legislation deserves the support, not only of all hon. members of the House, but all members of the public of Ontario, because there is an awakening social conscience which recognizes that the horrible misfortune of retardation can be visited upon any family in Ontario through no fault or for no reason that medical science has been able to tell us about. With the social conscience we like to believe that we have in this province, we must accept as a communal responsibility, the best care and system of education for these youngsters that government is able to provide.

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the hon. Minister for his comment on the situation which prevails in North Bay. As he very well knows, we have a very fine school there now and many of the children are sons or daughters of parents who live in the city of North Bay and in Widdifield and West Ferris. When we speak then of the council, would it be—since the building is in the city of North Bay and since the city of North Bay donated the land on which the school is erected—the council of North Bay?

Hon. Mr. Davis: That is correct, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Chairman, I would like to make two comments on the observations of the hon. Minister this morning. First of all, the hon. Minister said something to the effect that it was not appropriate to integrate the education of retarded children into the regular school system, since clearly the problems are quite special.

I would just like to make it clear, Mr. Chairman, that there was absolutely nothing implicit in the remarks of the hon. member for Yorkview that there should be such integration. The point that the hon. member for Yorkview was trying to make—and which he made quite successfully, I think—was that the administration should be in the hands of people who are primarily concerned with education.

The hon. Minister stated that this is not exclusively an educational problem and I agree with him. It is, nevertheless, primarily an educational problem. We believe that the administration should be the responsibility of the school boards, not with the idea that there will be an integration necessarily into the regular school system, but that the same people will be responsible for the administration of this phase of educational effort. After all, for school boards, education is the sole preoccupation; that is the sole thing they are concerned about. Municipal councils are only secondarily interested in education. They have before them many problems which in terms of their responsibility are more pressing than educational problems. That is why we feel that the people who spend all their time, in their capacity as elected representatives, concerning themselves with educational problems are the people who are best qualified to deal with this matter.

I am aware that there are administrative difficulties, some of which the hon. Minister outlined and others of which were outlined by the hon. member for Downsview, Mr. Chairman. I would point out, however, that there are going to be administrative difficulties whatever way it is done. I suspect that as far as small municipalities are concerned, the long-term solution is going to be to arrange some sort of system of transportation of pupils into the larger areas.

I doubt if even in terms of our municipal organization, every municipality is going to be able to have a school for retarded children. The fact that there are even more school boards than there are municipalities, I do not think is a significant point. The point is that in the areas in which—certainly in the early stages at any rate—you are going to get the schools for retarded children, the school boards are quite capable and large enough to handle the problem. We feel that in view of their experience and interest they are best qualified to deal with it.

The second point that was made by the hon. Minister and was emphasized at great length by the hon. member for Downsview, was to the effect that if we took time to take a good hard look at the policy involved in this bill, and Bill No. 131, it would mean delaying all action for a year.

Mr. Chairman, we in this group do not accept that proposition. I do not know if the hon. member for Downsview is prepared to accept the idea that when the Tory back-benchers get tired, everything has to be compressed and we have to rush through at the tail end of the session, and if we ask for further consideration of a bill—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order! I would ask the member to deal with section 1 of the bill.

Mr. Bryden: We believe that if further consideration appears to be in order, then we should give it that consideration. We should stay here as long as is necessary to give necessary consideration and to arrive at a final conclusion. As far as we are concerned, Mr. Chairman, we have raised certain points. The hon. Minister may consider that they are not valid or do not have sufficient validity to merit any further consideration on his part. That is his privilege and that is fine. But I suggest the fact that we are suggesting further consideration does not, in any sense of the word, imply that we do not want this bill passed at this session.

Certainly we want it passed at this session. All we are concerned about is to make sure that it is the best possible bill that we can pass. I will say quite positively for this group in regard to this or any other legislation, that we are prepared to stay as long as is necessary or to come back if necessary, to give complete consideration and all consideration that is necessary to any legislation before the House.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, certainly the observations made by the hon. member for Yorkview were considered very carefully. What he suggested here this morning really was part of the consideration that was put into this bill, there is no doubt about that whatsoever. We had to weigh the various avenues that this problem might be approached through, and it was the decision in weighing all the problems that this would cause the least difficulty.

I said earlier and I say again, that we do not say this is to be absolute, that this is the end. I think that there will be further evolutions of this type of legislation and this type of education. These are the things that we only learn through experience.

THE SCHOOLS ADMINISTRATION ACT

House in committee on Bill No. 131, An Act to amend The Schools Administration Act.

On section 1:

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I move that section 1(12) as set out in section one, be amended by striking out "local" in the second line and in the fifth line.

Section 1, as amended, agreed to.

Sections 2 and 3 agreed to.

Bill No. 131 reported.

THE PLANNING ACT

House in committee on Bill No. 132, An Act to amend The Planning Act.

Sections 1 to 8, inclusive, agreed to.

Bill No. 132 reported.

Clerk of the House: The Honourable the Lieutenant-Governor recommends the following:

That, the property vested in the University of Guelph and any lands and premises leased to and occupied by the University of Guelph are not liable to taxation for provincial, municipal or school purposes, and are exempt from every description of taxation so long as the same are actually used and occupied for the purposes of the University of Guelph, as provided in Bill No. 133, An Act to incorporate the University of Guelph.

Resolution concurred in.

UNIVERSITY OF GUELPH

House in committee on Bill No. 133, An Act to incorporate the University of Guelph.

Sections 1 to 11, inclusive, agreed to.

On section 12:

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer): Mr. Chairman, I move that clause (b) of section 12 be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

The heads of academic departments within (1) the university, (2) the Ontario Agricultural College, (3) the Ontario Veterinary College, and (4) the Macdonald Institute.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the hon. Provincial Treasurer, who proposed the amendment, whether this means that the government would not consider the agricultural college and the other institutions he mentions as being colleges under the whole university. Why would the amendment be required?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, if there is any discussion in connection with this bill, perhaps we could leave it until the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) is back. He sponsored the bill.

I could read the section that is being taken out. It has only to do with the setting up of the senate. The section that is being taken out is: "the heads of academic departments within the university" and in place of that is the amendment, as I have stated:

The heads of academic departments within (1) the university, (2) the Ontario Agricultural College, (3) the Ontario Veterinary College, and (4) the Macdonald Institute.

Mr. Nixon: My question, sir, was simply that the amendment would indicate, for example, that the Macdonald Institute would be on a par with the university. Surely the university has overall jurisdiction.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I know something about this. The problem arose when the faculty group at OAC and OVC were concerned that subsection (b) referred to the heads of the academic departments within the university only. We felt, quite frankly, that this included the academic heads of the colleges. It does not place the colleges on a par with the university, but it makes it quite clear that the academic heads will have representation on the staff from the colleges. This was only to clarify this for the people there.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, may I ask one question of the hon. Minister in the light of this answer? The amendment recognizes that there are both departments and colleges. I wonder if, looking to the future, it might not be better simply to put it in that form without naming the colleges. It is conceivable, in the growth of the university, that other colleges may be established within it.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I think, Mr. Chairman, that if this occurs we should do it then because you can also run into situations, say, of faculties. We are trying to keep it as uniform with the other university bills as possible. I think at this time we are covering the immediate problem. If other colleges are created there, we can add them to this legislation.

Section 12, as amended, agreed to.

Sections 13 to 32, inclusive, agreed to.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, just before the bill is carried, I would like to ask someone on the Treasury benches what the position would be of the staff at the new university. The understanding is that they are presently considered as civil servants, and have rights under the pension plan as such. What disposition will be made of this difficulty? I understand there was a similar difficulty when the Ryerson Institute was chartered a year ago.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I am not sure whether the hon. Provincial Treasurer knows. I cannot give you the explicit answer. I think this was discussed, actually, when the hon. Prime Minister was debating. I believe it was Tuesday evening. I think it was indicated then that the matter would have to be considered and studied as to how the transfer may take place. I think that there was a discussion at that time on it.

Bill No. 133 reported.

THE MOTHERS' ALLOWANCES ACT

House in committee on Bill No. 134, An Act to amend The Mothers' Allowances Act.

On section 1:

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a few comments on this section of the bill because it seems to me that again the peculiar psychology which permeates the department reflects itself in this section.

I refer particularly to subsection two dealing with dependent children born out of wedlock. The hon. Minister of Public Welfare (Mr. Cecile) has, in this instance reduced the period of time from six months to three months, after which time the mother will be eligible for mothers' allowance.

I suppose, in the general pattern of government, one could say that a reduction in time from six to three months was a step forward. But I might say to the hon. Minister that the legislation flies in the face of logic. I do not pretend that logic underlies legislation, but in this particular section it certainly does not do so.

It may be that the government wants to encourage mothers to give up their children by forcing a three-month period before they become eligible for mothers' allowance. In certain instances it may indeed be desirable for mothers with illegitimate children to do so, but that is a highly undesirable way of having it accomplished.

It may be that the government wishes to have these women and their children on general welfare for a three-month period prior to the mothers' allowance, but why they should be receiving a lesser amount when they are entitled to the greater, again defies logic.

It may be that you feel that to provide mothers' allowance from the outset will be an inducement to more children born out of wedlock, but this of course is also irrelevant and has no logic in the bill.

The point is, I think, Mr. Chairman, that illegitimate children, and mothers who give birth to such children, need financial support from the moment of birth. To place this three-month restriction on them is absurd, and to suggest in reply that they will have general welfare allowance is to discriminate against them in the amount of money they will ultimately receive. As always, it is the children who are penalized for the folly of a piece of government action.

If any investigations have to be conducted, if the children's aid society has to look after the children, if the mothers have to be stabilized, if there are certain domestic factors that have to be looked into, all of this can be done while the mothers' allowance is being paid from the date of birth. We in this political party think that the three-month stipulation is an objectionable one and I would therefore move, Mr. Chairman, that subsection two of section one of Bill No. 134 be amended by striking out the words "and her dependent child is three months or more of age" in the proposed new clause four.

Mr. Chairman: Members, you have heard the amendment. All those in favour please say "aye."

All those opposed—

Mr. Troy: Could we have a comment from the hon. Minister?

Hon. L. P. Cecile (Minister of Public Welfare): Mr. Chairman, I was listening very closely to that amendment. I would like to have it to read, because I do not know exactly what it purports to do. What I am doing right now is reducing what is in the statute from six months to three months, rather an encouraging factor—

Mr. S. Lewis: We are trying to remove the restriction altogether.

Hon. Mr. Cecile:—rather an encouraging factor to have the woman take care of her child, not encouraging her to have more of those children, but rather—

Mr. S. Lewis: Oh, that is in fact the psychology, I would not have believed it!

Hon. Mr. Cecile: Well, I do not agree with the hon. member on that.

Mr. Bryden: Well, Mr. Chairman, is the hon. Minister seriously suggesting that the difference between paying mothers' allowance to the mother immediately as against three months later is going to encourage illegitimacy? Surely there are other reasons for it, than a certain amount of money that may be involved for the benefit of the child and for the benefit of the mother after she has given birth to the child, and surely both of those are matters that should be taken into consideration.

Hon. Mr. Cecile: Mr. Chairman, the reason for it is that before this, as you know, first of all, in the law there was no recognition at all. Originally this came about in a matter of a year, it came about later on in a matter of six months, and we feel now that with the ability that there is at our command, with the law and everything else for investigation purposes, that it does not maybe take that long to find out about a putative father or that sort of thing.

At the same time, if the mother shows a willingness to take care of that child, instead of waiting for six months we would like to give her mothers' allowance in three months, and I think that she has that privilege of doing so if she shows good will. Otherwise, the child is taken care of, either by the children's aid society or other means, and it gives also the opportunity of—just as in adoption cases—seeing how the child is and if it is normal and in every way physically fit, and also mentally fit. There are many reasons for this. The only thing this is really doing is reducing the time from six months to three months as far as the statute is concerned.

Surely if it was understood, that I was trying to encourage that—that is what I gathered from the hon. member's remark, that he was thinking that I was trying to do that. I am encouraging nothing, I am just providing a lesser time for a mother to be able to receive mothers' allowance.

Mr. Bryden: Why not go the whole way and do it right?

Hon. Mr. Cecile: Well, I think it is quite proper and, as I have said before, these matters are quite elastic and in such a way that we can look at it further, and as we go along we develop them.

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): Mr. Chairman, we in this party feel that the child, whether it is born out of wedlock or in wedlock, should be treated the same across the board. It is too bad that the government again is taking a mincing, half-hearted step, and we support the amendment, that the word "three" should be taken out entirely.

Mr. Chairman: All those in favour of the amendment, please say "aye."

All those opposed to the amendment please say "nay."

In my opinions the "nays" have it.

Call in the members.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order. I find that the amendment is out of order. This has been drawn to my attention and is the reason for my bringing it to your attention at this time.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, we are in the middle of a vote. You cannot change your mind on the matter; you had the vote.

Interjection by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order. It has been brought to my attention that the amendment is out of order.

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Chairman, I would say that it has been brought to your attention too late.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Oliver: No, surely I can speak on this for a moment—on a point of order. What is the hurry? I want to talk for a moment.

Hon. A. K. Roberts (Minister of Lands and Forests): Surely a ruling has been made and the proper procedure is to—

An hon. member: It has not.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Oliver: Mr. Chairman, the Chairman is quite competent to make rulings but there are times to make rulings and there are times when that ruling is not valid, and this is one of the times. This question was asked and the question was put and the vote was called. Surely, at this stage of the game we are not going to go back and say that the motion itself is out of order because of some technicality my hon. friend raises.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): You sound more like Agnes Macphail every day.

Mr. Chairman: Order, order! If you wish to appeal to my ruling that is your privilege.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I wish to appeal your ruling.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, it has been a well established principle of this House and of the legislature of Great Britain that once the division bells have rung, nothing can be done until the vote is taken. Mr. Chairman, for you to fly in the face of that established tradition because a Cabinet Minister suddenly has discovered something and tries to raise it completely out of order, is against all of parliamentary traditions.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order. We are in committee and this is the method in which we work.

Mr. Bryden: I hope not.

Mr. MacDonald: You cannot make up the rules as you go.

Mr. S. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I think as the mover of the amendment, I might have some small place in suggesting something. I fear we are making a mockery of the process. The amendment was made; the Chair accepted the amendment. A vote was called, the vote was held. We are now asking merely to register the vote. You do not stop or suspend a vote in these proceedings. You are not even giving the Opposition an opportunity to discuss the basis on which you rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. Bryden: We have not even heard it yet.

Mr. S. Lewis: And I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that it flies in the face of all parliamentary procedures.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. R. M. Whicher (Bruce): Are you afraid you will not win the vote?

Mr. Chairman: Order, order. I have made a ruling and if you want a standing vote on my ruling, five members may stand and ask for one.

Mr. Singer: It is just fantastic to abort the rules of the House.

An hon. member: Ridiculous.

Mr. Chairman: Will you sit down, please? Order.

All those in favour of the Chairman's ruling, please stand.

Several hon. members: Which one?

Mr. Chairman: Call in the members. Are all the members satisfied that every member is in? All those in favour of the ruling, please stand.

Mr. W. D. McKeough (Kent West): Let us see all the Socialists stand up together.

Mr. Singer: You cannot distinguish between principle and—

Mr. Chairman: Order. All those opposed to the ruling, please stand.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Now the question is who is the leader over there?

Mr. MacDonald: It is a good question over there, too.

Clerk of the House: Mr. Chairman, the "ayes" are 55, and the "nays", 28.

Mr. Chairman: I declare the ruling is upheld.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order. Shall section 1 stand as part of the bill?

Sections 1 to 8, inclusive, agreed to.

Bill No. 134 reported.

Clerk of the House: The Honourable the Lieutenant-Governor recommends the following:

That, the monies required by the Treasurer of Ontario,

(a) to purchase any debentures, bills or notes of the Ontario Housing Corporation; and

(b) to make advances to the Ontario Housing Corporation in such amounts, at such times and on such terms and conditions as the Lieutenant-Governor in council may deem expedient, shall be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund,

Hon. Mr. Allan moves that the committee rise and report certain bills without amendment, and certain bills with amendment, and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of the whole House begs to report it has come to certain resolutions, certain bills without amendment and certain bills with amendment, and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Clerk of the House: The second order. Resuming the adjourned debate on the amendment to the motion that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair and that the House resolve itself into committee of ways and means.

Mr. Speaker: May I ask the member for High Park what member follows the member for Glengarry on the Budget debate?

Mr. A. H. Cowling (High Park): The hon. member for Grey North (Mr. Sargent). I think the strain of the last vote was a little too much. I will arrange to have them in here if we could just go on with the debate.

Mr. Speaker: May I ask who follows the member for Grey North?

Mr. Cowling: The hon. member for Hamilton (Mrs. Pritchard).

ON THE BUDGET

Mrs. A. Pritchard (Hamilton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak on the Budget. First of all, I would like to congratulate the hon. Minister on Bill No. 118, which provides special home care, and the hon. Minister for the Bill No. 135, which incorporated the housing programme for the province of Ontario.

But mainly I am concerned with the report in the Hamilton Spectator of last night and the night before in the matter of nursing homes. I have had a great deal to do with the nursing homes in Hamilton. In my reply to the Speech from the Throne, I emphasized the need for more rigid inspection. I was appalled when I read this report, although I have reservations, some of the things stated in this report have certainly not been brought to my attention. When I have had complaints, and there have been many, immediate action has been taken.

In this report it says that people have been brutally treated, chained to the bed or made to sleep in soiled linen. I am wondering why the city of Hamilton, on a report like this, has not immediately rescinded the licence of the homes involved.

Nursing homes, by and large, have played an important role in taking care of our aged citizens. We have been very thankful that we have had these institutions available, but with the conditions prevailing in those mentioned I certainly feel that drastic action should be taken. In Hamilton we are building a 100-bed care wing attached to Macassa Lodge, which will be opened in the fall and should relieve some of the existing conditions.

In last night's paper, the director of the board of St. Peter's Hospital has confirmed that they are willing and able to place 30 to 50 senior citizens. They are handicapped by the Ontario Hospital Services Commission not recognizing this need. I am hoping that the commission will meet with the directors and see if it is possible for something to be done.

I feel very concerned that perhaps two or three very poor nursing homes are being criticized; because they perform a necessary service. Many of them I have inspected myself. I know exactly what they are like. I do not look, in a nursing home, for hospital cleanliness and the standards maintained where sick people requiring medical attention are being cared for. I think that we have to widen our eyes and open our minds to the fact that the care of the aged is not necessarily medical, or very highly specialized. The important thing is that when these people enter nursing homes kindness and consideration of their needs is paramount. I am always shocked by the attitude of some of the relatives who completely reject their responsibility for looking after aged parents. Where it is not possible, then we are only too happy to assist, but it is not a nursing home with the high standards of a hospital. It is a nursing home where the aged will receive proper care, both mentally and physically. This is one reason why I, personally for six years, have urged that the addition be built to Macassa Lodge of the bed care wing.

The problem of the aged is one of the most vital things that we are facing. I am sure the hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond) will agree with me when I say that I think, perhaps between health and welfare, there is some conflict of jurisdiction. Most of these cases that go in through welfare should be under The Department of Health. It is a health matter. There is a great need for a very close look. I am hoping, in view of the expressed desire of St. Peter's Infirmary to participate in this, that the hospital commission will at least meet with these people and see what can be done. It is very urgent and I am very critical that nothing has been done.

I see that the veterans have been accused in the press of being indifferent to the veterans who are in these homes. The veterans' spokesman said wherever they have had a complaint they have investigated it. In my own case, I have personally removed one woman from a nursing home that I considered undesirable. But the urgent need for proper care for people in this age group cannot be overemphasized. I am hoping that this will result in the hospital commission meeting with St. Peter's Infirmary, and doing something quickly about this matter.

One other matter, in talking about housing. Perhaps now I could take the opportunity, with reference to the comments made by the hon. member for Wentworth East (Mr. Gisborn). I have been very familiar with the Hamilton housing authority. They have an excellent reputation for the management of project. Under their care they have about 1,120 families. It is quite possible that a few of these families will be discontented. But by and large around the province this has been recognized as one of the best projects. I think that the authority should be commended on its standards of housekeeping. It is most important in any public housing authority that a standard of high housekeeping is maintained in the interest of protecting the large investment made in these corporations.

The necessary action has been taken by the provincial government in the Hamilton urban renewal development, but nothing has yet been done by the federal authorities. I understand that the mayor and the chairman of the urban renewal are attending in Ottawa to see if at long last they can get action, Mr. Speaker. I am saying again to this House, as I said at the beginning, I am hoping that the departments concerned will review the situation with regard to the necessary standards in the nursing homes and the rigid inspection, not only from the standard of food and cleanliness, but from the standard of the type of care that is necessary to deal with aging people. Thank you.

Mr. O. F. Villeneuve (Glengarry): Mr. Speaker, before speaking on the ARDA programme, I would like to complete my summation of the agricultural industry in general as it affects the farmers of Ontario.

I have concentrated on the dairy industry, since it affects the greatest number in my area. But the beef and hog producers are, at the moment, seriously affected by chain buying from the United States.

In 1963 Canada increased its imports of pork products from the United States by 270 per cent over that of 1956, the highest import of that product in history—up from 29 million pounds to 78 million pounds. Top steers in November 1962, sold in Toronto at $29.50 per hundredweight. By April of 1963 this price had dropped to $23.50, a loss of $6.00 a hundredweight. In January of this year, the price dropped lower, to $22.90, yet during this same period of time barley brought in from western Canada to eastern Ontario increased by as much as $15 a ton. The producers in the west did not get this increase. The feed dealers in the east claim they did not benefit by it. In other words, the grain brokers are the people that benefited, at the expense of the farmers.

Mr. Speaker, these are problems that are most difficult to resolve, but are allowed to continue in such a manner that the individual farmer is victimized. It would appear that the cost-price squeeze is still plaguing the farmer and will continue for some time. The cost of goods a farmer buys will continue to rise while the price of his commodities will not increase materially.

As a result, the farmer will have to earn more dollars each year in order to net the same amount of money. The only way he can meet this is by increasing production. The average farmer today is not able to give his family the living comforts that the average good plumber or carpenter is able to do.

I have a short clipping here from Tuesday's Globe and Mail and it reads:

WINNIPEG YARDS

NOTE CATTLE IMPORTS RISE

A Winnipeg livestock market spokesman said yesterday that nearly 700 cattle—ten per cent of the total killed in Manitoba last week—were imported from the United States.

The Winnipeg spokesman said most of the recent Manitoba imports are from North Dakota.

Back of the imports, the spokesman suggested, was a price differential. Choice steers at Winnipeg last week sold for between $24 and $25 a hundredweight while they could be bought across the border for as low as $19.

Mr. Speaker, this had the net effect of the prices being dropped in the Winnipeg markets for Canadian cattle of $1 per hundredweight. Again, it proves the statement the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Stewart) made when he said that 60 per cent of farm produce today was bought by a chain organization.

When the ARDA programme was first conceived a few years ago, it appears that the emphasis, and most probable application, of the Act was on alternate uses for marginal land. I am interested in seeing marginal land that has become unprofitable to farm developed for other uses. I am convinced that the application of ARDA offers the most in the way of economic improvement for eastern Ontario and Glengarry in particular, in the field of drainage development for productive farm land. A great deal of drainage development work has been accomplished in the last ten years. In an old economic report written for the county in 1929 the first sentence read:

Lack of drainage is the greatest single factor retarding improvement of the economic position of farmers in Glengarry county.

Our position has not changed too much after a lapse of 35 years.

Considerable emphasis is being placed in the programme of making crops pay. We have the soil, we have the natural fertility to produce higher yields of pasture, hay, silage, and grain corn, as well as cash crops. However, we still have not eliminated the risks involved in late seeding, flooding after seeding, difficult weed control and impossible harvesting conditions, all associated with imperfect drainage.

I would like to see ARDA funds made available for at least the construction and improvement and extension of municipal ditches. The provision of outlets is often expensive. Under our present legislation, grants of 33 $\frac{1}{3}$ per cent are paid on municipal ditches by the province. This barely covers engineering costs. I believe that under the present Dominion-provincial ARDA agreement, grants of up to 33 $\frac{1}{3}$ per cent could be paid on approved drainage projects out of federal funds and that the province of Quebec has taken advantage of these in their drainage and stream bank improvement programmes.

I can see a great deal of wisdom in reforestation marginal lands, creating grazing areas, developing parks and construction of farm ponds. However, I do hope that at least a portion of ARDA funds are invested in projects that will yield rapid returns within the lifetime of our present generation of farmers.

I am most interested in the conservation programme being developed in this province under the new Department of Energy and Resources Management. It has been said that by the year 1990, unless something is done Canada is going to run out of wholesome water. The provinces find it is impossible to act on their own and the municipalities say they cannot finance same.

The federal government passed legislation with allowances for improved projects for sewage disposal and water treatment programmes. A write-off percentage of the cost of the projects in the amount of any such loan undertaken by municipalities was passed on to the benefit of the said municipalities. This has been extended by the present Ottawa government and, Mr. Speaker, this has been a wonderful stimulant toward public works and employment improvement in large urban centres. But our smaller towns and villages, confronted with this problem, cannot benefit even with this generous condition offered to them because it is financially impossible.

I would recommend to this government to give the water resources commission the powers necessary to apply this consideration in smaller municipalities where they have not the necessary industrial assessments to perform this work, and to give the same serious consideration toward assisting in some similar manner a percentage write-off on these costly projects. This may stimulate the trend back to the smaller towns in reverse to what has been taking place in the last number of years—people leaving the rural areas for the larger urban centres because the rural centres cannot attract industries to give employment.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to support my colleague the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Guindon) in his demand for a technological institute in the city of Cornwall. This would afford an opportunity to many students to receive technical training and have the advantage of commuting to this institution daily to better equip themselves for employment in present-day needs. Otherwise, many of them will be denied this opportunity since their parents have not the finances to send them to institutions of higher learning.

I would also support his demand for a highway between the city of Cornwall and Ottawa. This is long overdue and I certainly, for one, would appreciate it if The Department of Highways would give priority to this project when Highway 401 is completed to the Quebec border.

I sincerely want to thank all the hon. Cabinet Ministers whom I have had to interview, for the courteous reception they have given me at all times and their co-operation, with their staffs, in trying to resolve any problem that confronted me in a particular department. From my observation, I believe they are all trying to render the best service possible to the province of Ontario. I also believe that this government's administration in general in this province has been one of the best in Canada. But changing conditions make it very difficult for all governments in challenging times. And I would suggest this government, in setting up various committees to work in between sessions, should give them sufficient latitude to come up with recommendations that will be of benefit to the population of this province as a whole.

Mr. E. Sargent (Grey North): Mr. Speaker, in this final Budget analysis, may I say it is difficult to be critical of such a fine group of men in the government, but I will try.

However, I might say while I am on my feet in this 59th day of this session that the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Roberts) or the government should never worry about having a labour government over there because it does not pay union scales in salaries. I should say it is worth it, probably. We have a taxi driver in Owen Sound who says it is not his job he likes so much, it is the people he runs into.

In speaking against this 1964 Budget in summary, I learned a long time ago in selling that no one gives a darn how good your product is; what counts is how good your product makes him. I submit to the hon. members that the Budget you have brought forward is not good for the people of Ontario. In fact, from my years in municipal government I would suggest that this Budget you have brought in is about as amateurish as any small township council could present. There is no trail-breaking and there is no vision whatsoever.

President Wilson defined politics as the science of progress in society and I ask you what kind of progress it is when your government needs $50 million to bail itself out of the trouble it is in financially? You sought, not the top levels of our society, the big corporations, but put the bite on the little fellow, on the man who could least afford to pay it, by the gasoline tax and the 54-per-cent increase in hospital fees. You have put this province into debt amounting to some $2 billion. You are paying this year over $53 million in interest and you decide to nibble at a half-baked approach to some of our needs. Again, I say, who do you approach for the money—not the big corporations?

I would like to suggest that the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan) did not go to his backbenchers when he decided to draw up this Budget. He probably said, in effect, to his department heads, "Give us your estimates for 1963 and we will build a 1964 Budget." He did not say, "We are out to cut taxes like every other administration in this country of ours." You are building mistakes upon mistakes. You have Parkinson's Law in full gear.

We are constantly receiving reports on municipal taxation and here we are in 1964, 60 years later, using this same basic tax form as was used in 1904.

To summarize my remarks on the Budget, Mr. Speaker, two of the most important problems facing the people of Ontario today are the scandalous tax on the home owner and the inequities in the assessment base and taxation base and secondly, farm poverty. Very little, if anything, in this 1964 Budget will help either. So briefly, I would say that when governments generally are trying to cut taxes, the taxation is not only at the cross-roads in Ontario, you are doing a cloverleaf job.

The crime bill will long stand as a monument to the ineptness of this government. In Ottawa, I am told that the Queen's Printer cannot set a line of type to a bill to prepare it, unless it has the Rt. hon. Prime Minister's signature on the bill. Now, it would seem that when this crime bill came to the House the hon. Prime Minister had not read it.

Now, we have on the other end of the spectrum, I am told, and I believe this is right, that the former Attorney General (Mr. Cass), was one of the finest Cabinet Ministers this government has had in a long time. His record of efficiency along the line was as a brilliant Minister. And here we have, in effect, if he is the scapegoat for the government, this man's career is shot down in flames to bail the government out.

The primary fact, then, basically, was not what was in the bill—and that was bad enough, it could not have been worse. But it is a fact that it got before this House, conceivably, without the hon. Prime Minister knowing what was in the bill and so finally, in summary, the Minister was given the heave-ho and we ask as citizens of Ontario—"Who is kidding whom"? How many bills come before this House in the same way?

In the same way we had the formation of the police commission. I said this morning that there is no parallel in Canada to the one we have in Ontario. We do not have any police commissions in the other provinces like the one we have here. In other words, I suggest it is a similar case to the one where the government two years ago was in trouble with this scandal our leader brought up. So, to take the decisions out of the hands of the government and away from the Attorney General, they form a police commission. All down the line we have these commissions run by appointed civil servants, making decisions for the people of Ontario. This is a dangerous situation.

The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr. Spooner) took exception to my remarks this morning when I criticized the commission form of governing municipal affairs. If we have a problem in my municipality the department head from the OMB comes up and makes a decision. Regardless of his decision, it is the decision of the Ontario Municipal Board and we have no recourse. And right down the line we have the Hydro under a commissioner. That is publicly owned and should be answerable to the people of Ontario.

I realize that time is important. Along this same line of thought, Mr. Speaker, it is my feeling that in the Royal commission the hon. Prime Minister is setting up to review the judicial system, it is a call to all of this that it not be composed of judges, lawyers and magistrates but of people in all walks of life, in the unions, women's associations, and so on. I say we are fed up. It is nauseating to see the power these purveyors of our justice have, and how they interpret our laws. Do you realize that justice is the only commodity in this country of ours that we cannot purchase on the instalment plan? And it is said throughout the province that there is one law for the rich and one law for the poor and, believe me, this is true.

As I said before, when we were talking about organized crime—my colleagues bear me out—this is organized confusion. Throughout the whole judicial system—which reflects, believe me, a more incline of injustice against our citizens than crime ever would, or ever could. In our estimates we came across a case where one judge received $35,000 from this government in one year to sit on hearings, while jurors get from $6 to $10 a day. And so on down the line you could cite cases. I think it behooves this government in this judicial probe by a Royal commission, that this commission be composed of people who are representative of the people of Ontario, not one strata of our society.

One thing that is very important to the small man, is what happens when a fellow breaks the law and goes to jail. I would like to cite the case in Sweden. When a person breaks the law and a jail sentence is imposed there, it is recognized that the guilty party is in debt to the state and must repay it as directed by the court. It is also recognized that when a guilty person goes to jail, two other parties are apt to suffer loss: the state which has to provide for the detained person; the wife and family of the jailed party, by virtue of loss of earnings during detention and by the probable loss of his job. The state may well suffer serious loss of revenue by virtue of having to keep the defaulter's dependants during the jail term, which we will call a welfare case if loss of funds result.

Now, in Sweden they apply a bit of logic to it and handle it thus: A jail sentence does not necessarily mean a continuous day-and-night detention; it does mean a certain amount of time must be spent in jail to satisfy the law. The difference is in when. The Swede sentenced to a jail term for minor offences is not taken away from or deprived of his job by the state. In this country a person sentenced to jail is called upon in practice to pay a far higher price than the law specifies. The law requires that a convicted person must satisfy his debt to society for transgressing its rules. The court sentence is a payment of his debt. He has been deprived of his means of making a livelihood, his family is often caused to suffer through no fault of its own. Employers do not want a man whose services are withdrawn from them arbitrarily. So the person is often fired and his past is brought up to his disadvantage in gaining new employment.

This goes, I think the hon. members will agree, far beyond the concept of paying a debt to society with a jail term, or does it? If breaking the law is considered more serious than the state says, and these side effects are meant to happen, at least let us be honest about it. The Swedes interpret their laws more literally and apply them to the letter. A person sentenced to jail there goes to jail but not in a manner or a time that will affect the person's job or livelihood or the welfare of his family or dependants. So much time has to be served in jail. It is served in non-working hours, over weekends, holidays, and, I believe, in the evenings.

It is common, I understand, for a Swede to go to his work in the morning from the lock-up and return there after work in the afternoon, and from jail again to work in the morning. The time is deducted from his sentence and when it is served he is then free. No loss of working time, no loss of pay, no loss of job, and no poverty-stricken family to be maintained by the state, and no great social stigma.

About a month ago an Owen Sound man, a sailor, was convicted and sentenced to two months in jail, but he went sailing and they issued a warrant to take him off his boat. They took him off his boat and they locked him up in jail. He lost his job and his family is on welfare, so everybody suffers. Going further, I think this should be seasonal. This, of course, only applies to a special category of offences, not including serious crimes, crimes of violence, or continual offenders who must be dealt with in a more severe manner. It is applicable to the person who occasionally puts his foot wrong severely enough to warrant what the law considers a case for detention.

I am not certain about this further step, and the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions (Mr. Grossman) may think it is far reaching, but inmates of jails in many places are all put to work on essential duty and are paid at the going rate for wages outside. The prisoner's keep is deducted and the remainder credited to the prisoner for the upkeep of his dependants, or rehabilitation in the case of single persons.

The final point I wish to bring before this House, Mr. Speaker, is the lake levels in Georgian Bay and Lake Huron. Making this matter as least controversial as possible, I would like to suggest that when I requested the hon. Prime Minister the other day to call a top-level conference of the governors of Illinois, Michigan and New York, and Canadian authorities, along with himself as liaison, to do a crash programme to find the answer, all I got from him was the fact that the government was concerned, but no real indication of coming to grips with it.

Reams and reams of newspaper space have been taken up with pictures showing the docks high and dry, and boats high and dry. In some cases on our shoreline the shore is now 185 feet from the water. Tourist operators, commercial fishermen and cottages on Georgian Bay have been left high and dry. Yesterday Collingwood Shipbuilding had to turn down a contract which it could not accept because of the water level. The water is so low at Collingwood that the town's main industry may have to shut down, throwing 1,000 people out of work.

Lake Huron has dropped four feet in the last two years and the manager says, "If it falls another foot we could go out of business." Two boats ran aground there last week.

The situation is serious all over the Owen Sound area and at Parry Sound. Georgian Bay residents blame the crisis on the dredging of the St. Clair River. They say the deepening of the channel is responsible.

The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers in Detroit says an underground water dike should be built at Sarnia to compensate for the flow into Lake St. Clair. "Cottage- and home-owners along the St. Clair River are howling," it says here in a report from the Telegram.

I am trying to make this as short as possible, but we know that this has increased Hydro rates $12 million. The Telegram of Tuesday, May 5, said:

In Michigan last week, U.S. Senator Philip Hart called on Secretary of State Rusk to discuss with Canadian officials a plan to divert water from the Arctic watershed to help raise levels.

The hon. Prime Minister of this province says the government is concerned. What must come is a diversion of water from Hudson Bay. The hon. Minister of Economics and Development (Mr. Randall) yesterday said that the water would have to come from the great north. Secondly, we must put dams and locks at Port Huron and Sarnia. We must call a joint commission meeting as soon as possible to get this matter under study and under way and get some action.

Going back to basics. We submit the low water in our area, and being a Liberal I concur in it, is a result of a Diefenbaker government deepening a channel three and a half years ago at Sarnia, causing all this grief. Regardless of politics something has to be done about it.

The other night on CBC there was a documentary film showing the vast dams and the power projects that Canada is initiating. Each dam that is built will create a lake or reservoir behind it. It is going to take two, three or even five years to fill these reservoirs after the dam is built. It seems to me that for Georgian Bay, Lake Huron and Lake Michigan, having been depleted by a good five feet to date, even control locks at Sarnia at this point would result in a very slow filling up of the areas affected. Even immediate action is not going to provide an overnight cure, and a crash programme of dredging is a temporary must to save, in one section, 1,000 men their jobs.

Mr. Speaker, it seems strange that we of the Opposition here have to go to so much trouble to tell the hon. Prime Minister of this province his barn is on fire. We have trouble of major consequence. As the old preacher said, "Unless a man is in trouble his prayers ain't got no suction."

We saw the jam the hon. Prime Minister was in when the crime bill was before the House, and the fury of the public, and the very fortunate way that he stickhandled out of this mess. May I suggest that if the hon. Prime Minister thinks that was trouble, wait till he sees the mess this province will be in—I am not speaking from the government standpoint; I am talking in terms of the farmer, of the people who will be affected economically—if something is not done about this catastrophe facing us.

One hundred thousand square miles will be a shoreline of disaster, with shipping, jobs, resorts, and so on, feeling the result. Again I ask this government to quit stalling, call a top-level conference of the governors of Michigan, Illinois and New York, and Ottawa representatives, as I said before, and do the crash programme we need. It is all right for this Chicago gang on my left here to be laughingly referring—

Mr. R. M. Whicher (Bruce): It is true, a noisy crowd.

Mr. Sargent: But they should drive around the desolate areas of our region. I think it is a disgrace that we have the apathy we have, Mr. Speaker, on the government side, which says, "We are concerned."

Mr. Speaker I have much more powerful material here; I have reams of it here—

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): He should have brought that out first.

Mr. Sargent: —but I would say in that regard, Mr. Speaker, I have been here 59 days and I have made a lot of friendships, but I see a lot of things that amaze me in the way democracy works. I have a list here I have compiled of the expenses you fellows will spend in travelling this year, and it amounts to over $6 million. That is a lot of money. Further, I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, if I were ever in that seat where the hon. Prime Minister sits I would—I do not like to go down here at night and see the big Cadillac with a chauffeur, waiting to drive a man for an 80 cent cab ride down to the hotel. I think there is too much fat in this government. I would like to see a big auction sale held, like Mitch Hepburn had here, and sell all those Cadillacs.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sargent: Now, we are probably going to have a whitewash when the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas (Mr. Cass) speaks to us, but I will leave this very important aspect of lake levels and talk about something that is very important to people in my riding, in the final analysis.

One more quotation which is very important. Dr. Langford said in the Toronto Telegram of May 5th, to a question as to why Lake Huron was so low—and this is in Georgian Bay, too—and he says Lake Huron is low because of mismanagement and because there are not controls to hold up levels as for other lakes. Huron is an unregulated lake; in my opinion it needs controls in the form of locks at its outlet.

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): Do you agree with that?

Mr. Sargent: The former speaker (Mr. Villeneuve) was concerned, in his talk on agriculture, about farm property.

Many of us come from rural ridings and we know that 50 per cent of the people in the farming industry are faced with farm poverty, with 50 per cent of them grossing less than $2,000 per year. We hear a lot of talk about ARDA. I did not interpret from the hon. member whether it was a combination of the agricultural policy or not, but it could be interpreted that way. I would suggest to this House, Mr. Speaker, that the ARDA programme is bogging down miserably. I quote from an item which appears in the Rural Co-Operator April 28th issue and the headline says: "ARDA is all talk so far." It goes on to say:

There is a tremendous lot of talk about rural development, but the Canadian and Ontario governments have not accomplished much, declared an executive member of OFA addressing a zone rally in Smiths Falls.

He has been to many meetings on rural development but felt he has wasted his time attending them. I have always come away, he said, with a frustrated feeling that there is quite a bit of this feeling in this country. He finalizes by saying that ARDA is just a mess, as it were, regardless of what people in the government think about this. This man is an executive of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture. Of course his word would not mean too much against that of the government people, but he is an executive member of that body.

Mr. Speaker, the government is holding up ARDA as a magic wand to rural rehabilitation and economic development. But no one knows around the province what ARDA is and the limited use to which it can be put. This ought to be explained. There should be an education job here. Rural economic development is the greatest need in the economy of this province of Ontario. New jobs, new secondary industry, decentralization of industry from the golden horseshoe, expansion of government, field work in forestry, conservation, recreation to employ local people. This problem has been recognized in the United States and they are doing something about it. But here we are in Ontario, giving lip service and getting no plan of action.

In summary, the greatest threat the farmer has today, in my discussions with them, is the problem of vertical integration. The hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Stewart) has dealt with this in his estimates, indicating that he is aware of the problem, but nothing goes into the statutes to protect the farmer. I would criticize the OFA for not insisting that he does. He pointed out the dangerous trends which could lead to taking over of the farms by large corporations either by farming themselves, purchasing farms, renting farms and putting the screws on farmers and on the farm families of Ontario, and eventually destroying the healthy agriculture atmosphere we have in this province today.

The hon. Minister spoke of studies being made of this problem. Here again, we have an indication of the way this government works—sitting, studying a problem, but taking no action, coming up with no plan or policy to protect the farmers of this province against the big corporations, the Bay Street boys and the ticker-tape brokers who are now moving into farming and the production of food. The big food corporations—the chains, as I believe the hon. Minister said—have 60 per cent of all the food sales and they are putting the squeeze on the farmer, and the small processor of farm products. Either they take the price offered or their food can rot on the ground. Also threatened are farm marketing boards and co-operatives who are trying to bargain collectively for the farmers against the high-powered concentrated buyers in big corporations.

These big corporations say we will not go through your market boards if you do not deal with us on our terms. We will go into farming ourselves, or rent lands and turn your farmers into tenants and peasants. This is what they are saying, these types.

Finally, the government says that they are studying the problem. But this has been going on for years and it is getting worse year by year. So, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my riding I ask this government: When do these studies come to an end? When do we stop setting up committees and when do we begin to see some action, some steps by the government to solve this serious trend of vertical integration in agriculture?

This government has a responsibility. The hon. Minister admitted it to this House and thus, is responsible for finding solutions and not bury the problem in the depths of the civil service, from which it never seems to emerge.

Mr. M. Gaunt (Huron-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I would like to make a few comments regarding the speech made by the hon. member for Hamilton Centre (Mrs. Pritchard). I believe, if I heard her correctly, she was making remarks concerning Bill No. 118, and I express concern over that bill along with her. I received a representation from the Association of Ontario Nursing Homes and they told me that if this bill were enacted into law it would almost force them out of business. They asked the hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond) to give Bill No. 118 his very serious consideration. I think that he should reconsider what he has brought forward in this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, before embarking on the main text of my speech, I would like to make a comment on the 52 per cent rise in the Ontario hospital insurance rates. A great deal has been said about this previously, but I did feel that it was sufficiently important to make another comment at this time. It seems to me that this sharp increase in hospitalization rates affects the people in the low-income brackets most severely. These are the people who can least afford to pay this increase and as a result many of them will be dropping out of the plan because they cannot afford the premium rates.

These, Mr. Speaker, are the people who need a hospitalization plan most. I will not make any further comments on this subject. Suffice it to say that people regard this as a regrettable step on the part of the government to obtain extra revenue.

I want to confine most of my remarks to the Great Lakes water levels which are, as we all know, critically low at the present time. In doing this I am more or less following along the same line as my colleague, the hon. member for Grey North (Mr. Sargent). I am doing so at the risk of being somewhat less controversial. Some of the points that he touched on I will also touch on and I hope that there will not be too much overlapping in this regard.

Let me preface my remarks by saying that our federal government, the United States government, and the Ontario and Quebec governments all have a responsibility in this regard and once again I would say of my colleague, the hon. member for Grey North, that I echo his words in saying that, regardless of politics, the government should take action on this matter.

However, in view of Ontario's position in the economic life of this country, I feel the onus falls particularly heavy on the shoulders of the government. From a constitutional point of view, certainly in some regard at least, these matters fall under the jurisdiction of the province. Low lake levels are causing hardships from the Lakehead to Montreal. Lake Huron is three feet below normal, which is the lowest level on record, dating back to 1860. Lake Michigan is about as low. Lake Ontario is down two feet. Lake Erie is about 1.5 feet below normal and Lake Superior, one foot below normal.

This undoubtedly affects many people because 25 per cent of all Canadians are within the Great Lakes basin. There have been many reasons given as to the possible causes of the low lake levels. These include lack of rainfall, a mysterious tilting of the earth, evaporation, the Chicago drainage canal and the removal of the forest cover from the shores of the Great Lakes. The deepening of the channel at Sarnia and Port Huron—and I would like to interject into the record, an editorial from the Walkerton Herald-Times of April 2, 1964. It reads in part as follows:

In Lake Michigan, the Chicago drainage canal takes an estimated two per cent of the water but the trouble here—and that is referring to Lake Huron:

—was created when the canal at Sarnia and Port Huron was deepened another six feet. This had the same effect as pulling the plug in the bath tub, the bath tub in this case, being Georgian Bay. Those who have enjoyed our beaches know that the level of the bay has gone down three feet since the channel at Sarnia was deepened three-and-one-half years ago.

It is reasonable to assume that the level will continue to drop until it finds its level which appears to be equal to the six feet that the canal was lowered.

My friend, the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin (Mr. Root), in what I might refer to as his water speech, has pointed out the fact that precipitation has been below normal for the last few years. This is undoubtedly true. This has certainly contributed to the present problem of low water levels. In 1963, rainfall was 17.15 inches below the average in the London area. It was 8.47 below average in the Chatham area for the same year and 7.19 inches below normal in the Guelph area.

Every inch of rainfall amounts to 14.5 million gallons of water per square mile, or approximately 23,000 gallons per acre. It is easy to realize what effect this drop in precipitation has had in the areas where rainfall has been short for one or more years. My hon. friend indicated that sufficient quantities of water could be obtained by sound conservation practices, such as conserving the run-off which amounts to 160 million gallons of water per square mile across the province. I suggest that this is idealistic in that it is highly unlikely that we will ever reach the point where we could conserve all the run-off or even half of it, although we should certainly constantly work toward the goal of conserving as much run-off as possible.

It is rather obvious that we cannot depend on progress in that direction to replenish our dry wells and lower lake levels. According to the report of the select committee of the Ontario Legislature on lake levels of the Great Lakes, established in 1952, precipitation and evaporation are the dominant factors controlling the levels in the Great Lakes. However, only when precipitation is persistently above or persistently below average for a number of years does it raise or lower lake levels. Excessive precipitation in only one year following a period of average or below average precipitation has little, if any, effect on the levels of the Great Lakes, according to the report.

Now, similarly, only one dry year following years of average or above average precipitation, has little effect in lowering the lakes as the land will deplete its storage into the Great Lakes to maintain their levels.

It seems to me that there is a direct correlation between the dry wells last year all across Ontario and the lower lake levels. The report also mentioned tilting movement of the earth's crust. Now, during the centuries since the Pleistocene ice sheet has retreated, the land toward the northeast has risen considerably. The old shorelines in Lake Erie are much more nearly horizontal and geologists claim that it is near the hinge line. That is the line along which crusted movement does not take place. Present-day deductions indicate that the hinge line runs from slightly south of Duluth, crosses the entrance to Green Bay, passes close to Goderich and on through the Niagara Peninsula. North of this hinge line the land is rising and south of this line the land is subsiding. The natural consequence of this tilting is that the lakes with outlets north of the hinge line, such as Lake Superior and Ontario, tend to become deeper and to flood their southern or southwestern shores relative to the amount their outlets are raised; while the lakes with outlets south of the hinge line, such as Huron, Michigan and St. Clair, tend to have their general level lowered, relative to the amount their outlets are depressed.

Indeed, this is a very complex and complicated subject. The rate of tilting, according to the select committee's report is very slow but apparently constant. If continued long enough it would eventually cause the Great Lakes to drain southward towards the Mississippi. This, of course, would not happen for centuries at the present rate of tilting.

I have mentioned the foregoing reasons simply to indicate and to underline the fact that the alarming lake levels are not due to any one particular reason but a combination of reasons. A combination that has resulted in consternation being expressed by people whose lives are and will be affected if something is not done to maintain the normal lake levels. I do not want to dwell on the causes at any great length other than to say that they are numerous and certainly varied. The problem now remains: What should be done both in terms of long-term planning and in terms of a short remedy to correct this very serious situation?

In order to offer some constructive suggestions I am going to outline to the House a number of proposals urged by the Georgian Bay Development Association. Once again I emphasize that three proposals are things which could be done in the way of short-term remedial measures to correct, at least in part, the low levels in Georgian Bay and Lake Huron.

Number one: It is suggested that the level of Lake Superior be lowered by 18 inches to bring Lake Huron, Lake Michigan and Georgian Bay up just over one foot. It has been estimated that a one-inch drop in the level in the Lake Huron basin costs the shipping interests $250,000, or one-quarter of a million dollars. At the present time Georgian Bay is six inches below the 1952 level. There is also a tremendous loss encountered by hydro-electric power and lake levels have dropped to disastrous proportions. That is point number one, now I come to point number two.

The second point was to assist the marine operators currently out of water by giving them a 50-per-cent subsidy on the cost of dredging and dock rebuilding.

Thirdly, a recommendation for an emergency investigation of Collingwood harbour and an immediate investigation of the conditions in the harbours of Meaford, Port McNicoll, Southampton, Owen Sound, Kincardine and Goderich.

Number four: as an intermediary term project within two to five years, the Georgian Bay Development Association wants the control point established at the foot of Lake Huron. The Lake Huron basin has averaged a fluctuation of as much as five feet over the last ten years, and during the period of record of 103 years, the maximum fluctuation has been six feet. Lake Superior has had, of course, a control dam for many years dating back to around 1901, I understand. This dam has been successful in controlling the low level to within a few inches.

Number five: the association's fifth point is one directed at the long-term possibility of diverting water from the James Bay watershed to the Great Lakes. A scheme somewhat in the dream stage at the present but possibly feasible.

My colleague, the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Sopha) and others have spoken about this scheme at great length earlier in this session when we were discussing the estimates of Energy and Resources Management. This scheme has commonly been referred to as the Kierans plan. It has been tagged with all sort of derogatory connotations, such as "pipe dream", "prohibitively costly" and "simply not feasible." These statements do not reflect imagination and vision—something we must have to cope with this problem.

The recent statement by Teno Roncalis—the United States co-chairman of the International Joint Water Commission—issued after a four-day conference in Washington on April 15, said:

We need men of vision to consider radical new plans if we are to overcome this adverse cycle of nature.

I do not want to take up much more time of the the House, Mr. Speaker, and so I would close by urging the government to display leadership and sincerity by negotiating with all governmental authorities confronted with the problem of low water levels on the Great Lakes. The time for action is now, and I hope that I, along with others in this Legislature have contributed to easing the government into uncharted waters in an endeavour to thwart a situation which nature has thrust upon us. The state of the Great Lakes is a matter of vital consequence to the future of our province.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Speaker, as we are coming toward the end of this Budget debate, and, I suppose, close to the end of this session, those of us who have been new this year have gone through a real course of education. We have learned a lot and we have learned something of the processes of parliamentary government and something also of the processes by which government is able to attain its will in a parliament of this kind.

During the session we heard much from the new members both on this side and on the other side of the House. There is a great deal of freedom of speech.

Ideas were expressed, sir, which the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) said were good and he said: "This is where we get our ideas—from the freedom of expression of the people in the back benches." That is fine. But when it came to the work in the committee, that was where the back-benchers were able to express themselves not only in speech but in action. And so it was that when a certain bill for the city of Toronto came before that committee, one of the sections of that bill dealing with Maple Leaf Gardens was thrown out by the committee. And so the back-benchers had their day of triumph.

There were two other bills which had the same sort of fate—the Westminster and the Rochdale bills. These two were also spoken to by a great many people and, again, certain aspects were passed in this case against the will of many on the Treasury benches. This is interesting because, in the one case, the Minister was against the Maple Leaf Gardens and so the will of the back-benchers prevailed. In the other case, the Minister was against the principle of the bill but the back-benchers still prevailed and the bill was supposed to have been reported.

But those bills are still on the order paper, Mr. Speaker; they are sitting here and so far have not been reported. I wonder if the talk is allowed but the action is severely frowned upon. This is an interesting matter for speculation.

An hon. member: Very interesting.

Mr. Young: Another thing in this connection: I remember very vividly the haste with which two other bills were passed which did what these bills, or so some of their opponents said, were doing. They were subsidizing certain groups of students, in this case, with the taxpayers' money.

But two other bills—the Hershey bill in Smiths Falls and the one from Cochrane which had to do with Cochrane industries—were passed in very great haste, and they went through this House long ago. Those bills were heavily subsidizing two private corporations at the expense of the taxpayer. Action came fast.

But the two bills which are said to subsidize the students at some expense to the taxpayer still sit on the order paper. We shall watch with interest, Mr. Speaker, to see if the back-benchers who supported these bills in committee are now going to have their will carried through in this parliament.

A few days ago we heard the earth-shattering announcement from the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Rowntree) that we are to have the early establishment of a minimum wage of 85 cents for men and 80 cents for women, gradually rising to a dollar an hour across this province by the end of 1965. But this excludes two groups, the farmers and domestics.

Now, why it should exclude the farmers is a question which many people are asking, but as I look around at the number of representatives on the government benches who represent farm areas, it is apparent that this becomes a political decision rather than a decision having to do with justice.

The thing that has been told us—and I have been told many times—is the Ontario farmer just cannot afford to pay the $1 an hour or the 85 cents an hour. In fact we heard that this afternoon from the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Villeneuve) and we heard it from the hon. member for Grey North (Mr. Sargent). If this is true—and I have no reason to dispute it—it is one of the most damning indictments possible of the agricultural policies of this government and the government of the leader of the Opposition in Ottawa over the past few years.

The Canadian farmer today farms about 12 per cent of the population, but he is getting only six per cent of the national income—half his share. If this is true, Mr. Speaker, then there is something fundamentally wrong with the agricultural policies of this government, that the farmers of this province do not get their share of the national income and of the wealth they produce.

For some time we have seen the difference, as the hon. member for Glengarry pointed out—

Mr. L. M. Reilly (Eglinton): I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would permit a question. I was trying to find out, Mr. Speaker, if they do have a minimum wage in connection with the farmers' rates in Saskatchewan?

Mr. R. Gisborn (Wentworth East): They do not need them; they get their income and pay their debts.

Mr. Reilly: I am asking the hon. member for Yorkview.

Mr. Young: Saskatchewan, I might say, Mr. Speaker, has had a minimum wage for many years.

Several hon. members: The farmers?

Mr. Young: All right, the farm labour; you will have to look that up, I am just not sure. We will leave that to Mr. Thatcher to establish.

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): That is beside the point.

Mr. Young: It is beside the point but I will say this, that the farmer's income in Saskatchewan is one of the highest in this country.

Mr. Speaker, during the past few years we have seen the cost-price squeeze taking place that the hon. member for Glengarry spoke about. That cost-price squeeze has increased. We have seen the processors and the packers and the brokers taking perhaps more and more of our food dollar as time went on.

I have here a clipping from The Canada Department of Agriculture report in the spring of 1963. It is headed, "The farmer's share of the food dollar." It points out that for each dollar the consumer spends on the following food items, the farmer's share is: beef, 57 cents; fluid milk, 53 cents; butter, 80 cents—getting up pretty well there—broiler chickens, 57 cents; potatoes, 42 cents; fresh apples, 31 cents; grade A large eggs, 67 cents; bread, 11.5 cents. The remainder of the consumer's food dollar—and I am quoting from The Canada Department of Agriculture:

—goes to pay transportation, packaging, processing, wholesaling, retailing, and other charges.

But the farmer's share of the retail value of the food that he produces is shrinking. In 1950, his share of the consumer's dollar was 58 cents and by 1960 it had dropped to about 44 cents. The reason for this drop is that while the farmer receives no more for his produce today than in 1950, the consumer pays more for his food because of increased costs of processing and marketing and extra services.

Compared with those of other items, our food costs have risen less since 1950, according to the consumer price index. For all food the increase in cost to urban dwellers during the 1950-60 period was 19 per cent, for rent it was 32 per cent, and for medical care it was 63 per cent.

I have here a copy of the brief from the federation of agriculture which I think all hon. members received. It points out what the net income of the farm population of Ontario has been. The average income, summing it up, for operators, labour and management per farm, assuming the same number of farms as in 1961, would be about $1,850. At least two qualifications need to be added: 1. Off-farm income. Many farmers work off the farm. A farm operator with a family would almost double this return on a family income basis; 2. Farm numbers are undoubtedly padded by reason of a loose sense of definition of "farm." Despite these qualifications and the uncertain accuracy of the income and the capital figure, farm income, from whatever source, is certainly low by urban standards.

Mr. Speaker, I think that this matter is clear, that there is this gap. Costs are up, and even though in the last period of time, as the hon. Minister of Economics and Development (Mr. Randall) pointed out, because of the Russian sales of wheat the general income across the country has gone up, the farmers are still in that kind of situation. If this process continues, and I see no reason why it should not, then the family farm as an institution may well be doomed and the corporate farm become the food processing item in our civilization.

If farmers are making as little as this, and evidently they are, then I say to you that this government should be carefully examining its agricultural policies with a view to revamping them so that agriculture gets its fair share of the wealth that is produced. Then it will be able to pay its minimum wage or whatever it may be, to its hired help. There is no reason why a man who works in industry should get a certain wage and a man who works in the agricultural industry should get a smaller wage. The only reason is the complete lack of forward-looking agricultural policy in this country over the past years. It is time that we changed present policy and that we should bring our farm workers, as well as the farmers themselves, into line. Any man who is producing food should be able to get enough income from that food to pay the help on his farm commensurate with the help in industry.

I mentioned that the hon. Minister of Labour had announced the minimum wage. During his announcement, he made certain comparisons of wage rates. We had some criticism from certain quarters when the hon. member for Woodbine (Mr. Bryden) talked about poverty in this province. But then the hon. Minister of Labour went on to tell us that poverty is fairly widespread. He says that about ten per cent of the estimated 408,000 wage and salary workers in Zone 2 make less than $1 an hour. In the large Zone 1 about five per cent of the 1.6 million eligible work force are paid less than $1 an hour. The hon. Minister said the surveys indicate that about 6.5 per cent of Ontario's non-farm wage and salary workers make less than the $1 minimum now.

The hon. Minister puts these facts before us, which, I think, he is facing in a fairly realistic way. He is trying to get the minimum up over a period of time. I quarrel with him in that I think that minimum should be somewhat higher than he has named it. But when we realize that 6.5 per cent of our workers are on pay which is less than the present minimum, and add to that the farmers, the farm workers, the domestics, the welfare people, the unemployed and all the others in that category, we find that indeed too large a proportion of our population in Ontario is having a very difficult time making ends meet, and struggling below the borderline of poverty.

When the question is raised, "Why should we set the minimum at the 80 or 85 cents, gradually rising to $1?" we are faced with certain facts, of which the hon. Minister is aware, but which I would like to bring before this House. Last year the gross national product of Canada ran to about $44 billion, and I am using round figures in my presentation. Squeezing out duplication, the national income was about $32.5 billion in 1963. Ontario's share of that was around $13.6 billion. We have in Ontario something like 1,796,000 families. This means that as far as the Ontario families are concerned we are producing wealth at the rate of about $2,100 per capita, or slightly over $8,000 per family per year, or, if we bring it down, about $160 a week. That is our wealth production.

I am not standing here today to say that this wealth production should be divided evenly among our people. I have never said that. I never intend to say so, because the man with more responsibility and who works harder, perhaps has some right to more income than the guy who is categorized as a loafer and all the rest of it. But the fact remains—

An hon. member: Glad to hear you say so.

Mr. Young: The fact remains that in this province we are producing now an average income of something in the nature of $160 per week. Why should we be content—I hope the hon. Minister is not content; I do not think he is—to set a minimum at 80 and 85 cents an hour, rising to a dollar an hour by the end of 1965? A province as rich as this one, with the great productive capacity we have, should be thinking in terms of far more than this.

I would hope that the climate within government will change to some extent perhaps. With pressure from our friends on the back benches, and others, by the end of 1965 the hon. Minister may well see fit to set this figure, not at a dollar, but at a dollar and a half or some other figure even better than this. Because after all, today we have to face the fact that labour costs per man are dropping. Unit labour costs are going down as productivity increases. If we are to distribute the goods that we are producing, we must distribute the purchasing power to the people who are producing these goods.

I know the argument is advanced that there are certain marginal industries, and marginal businesses, that might be put out of business if higher minimums were enforced too soon. But let me submit, Mr. Speaker, that this kind of marginal industry is doomed in any case by the onward march of automation. We can never hold it. The better way to attack this problem is to assist these marginal industries to modernize and rationalize their production. Then, if necessary, to retrain their workers for higher skills and new jobs which may carry with them higher wages. In this way, we bring up the whole distributive process. We make the great wealth that we are producing available, in purchasing power, to all of the people.

I think we have to recognize this fact when we talk about trade and the relationship of wages to trade. This is a whole treatise in itself and I am not going to impose it on the House today. But we have to recognize the fact that the free nations, who are at the top of the trading nations of the world, United States, Sweden and Canada, are also the nations with the highest average industrial wage rate. Certainly, too, those commodities which are at the very top of the foreign trade pyramid are the industries in which the wage rates are the highest. They are the most efficient. In an economy like ours, wage rates and efficiency go together. We have to work out the method by which the distribution of purchasing power through wages and other income can be made so that our people have the advantage of the wealth that we produce.

Mr. Speaker, during this past few weeks we have had some problems in the work force of this province. I had today—and I might as well deal with this first—a representation from the Independent Cab Owners Guild of Metropolitan Toronto. This matter has been discussed by several hon. members of this House, but I want to bring before the House once more the problem that they face, and urge upon this government that some action be taken.

As we know, under Bill No. 80 the authority over taxicabs is delegated to the Metropolitan Toronto Council, and Metro has delegated that authority to the commission. That commission has seen fit to do two things: first of all to increase the licence rate for cabs from $50 to $100 per year; and secondly, to increase the number of cabs which are on the streets from one per thousand to one per nine hundred of population. This means that we have an increase of something of the nature of 400 cabs in Metropolitan Toronto.

Alfred Beasley, the chairman of the Independent Cab Owners Guild, told me today that this has the effect of lowering income for the cab driver. Whereas he used to average something like $28 per day gross income, out of which expenses of $10 to $14 have to come, he now is grossing $23 to $24 per day. In other words, the cab owners are losing income to the tune of $3 to $4 per day at the present time, Mr. Speaker. What they are asking is the right of review to a higher authority than the commission, a review of their problems in respect to the increase in the number of cabs, the matter of their income and their licence fees. So I would expect, Mr. Speaker, that this government, after all the nattering that has taken place in this House and all the times that this problem has been brought before this House, would take some action to bring some justice here. Or at least to give to the guild some review of their problems in this respect.

Mr. Speaker, I want to turn to the simmering situation in the Ontario Civil Service. Last week, or a couple of weeks ago, I raised this matter in the House and, perhaps in some respects justifiably, was read a couple of lectures by the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions (Mr. Grossman). Following that lecture, we had a statement from the hon. Prime Minister which was reported in the Globe and Mail. In response to a question The hon. Prime Minister told the Legislature he was not aware of any disruption within the civil service.

The following day, Mr. Harold Bowen, executive secretary of the Civil Service Association of Ontario, announced an emergency meeting of all branches of the service to be held in Toronto on May 13. The association board called this meeting, it says, only after continual mass complaints against low salaries, long delays in revision, and dissatisfaction with negotiating procedures.

Mr. Bowen charges that the government has repeatedly by-passed negotiating machinery provided by the Ontario Joint Council in favour of arbitrary and unilateral action. He says that revision of some pay scales is more than two years behind schedule. The story, which was presented in a brief which all the hon. members received, is one of bargaining in bad faith by this government—a government that insists that other employers in this province bargain in good faith with their employees. It is high time that this government faced up to this challenge and to this situation. The introduction to the brief says this:

The distress of the many members in the low salary bracket, aggravated by the exceeding slowness in the adjustment of their pay rates, the universal concern of all employees with the apparent apathy of the government and its agents to employee matters, and the continual retreat of official-side personnel behind "sovereign" rights, have all combined to force the association into a position not of its own making or liking.

Mr. Speaker, after years of struggle for some sort of recognition by the government, the civil service association succeeded in 1962 in getting an amendment to The Public Service Act. This amendment provided for the setting up of a joint council to negotiate matters in dispute between the association and the government. The joint council began its work last August. The right of arbitration, when agreement could not be reached, was provided for. And to quote the brief:

To the public service generally negotiation and arbitration meant the right to participate in decisions concerning rates of pay and working conditions. There was hope at least that the many discrepancies, particularly in pay rates, would be corrected through orderly and timely negotiations by responsible persons with authority to make decisions.

The joint council is made up of three members appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in council on recommendation of the membership of the association, plus one staff member, which is also recommended, and four members appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in council.

But the joint council is today running into stormy seas. The employer, the brief says, has reserved unto itself the same old rights of unilateral decision, and class specifications were revised without reference to the joint council or the association; pay rates were published without prior negotiation; changes to working conditions were made without negotiation; experience was contrary to expectation.

Once the joint council was set up, the government by regulation—or this happened long before, even though the brief points it out—over the protests of the association, excluded the Ontario Provincial Police from the bargaining unit. Now, I am not arguing that point here. But when the association wanted to bargain regarding medical, hospital and surgical insurance, it was discussed briefly last September. On October 7 it was agreed to meet informally to clear the way for the official side to prepare a counter proposal. That was October 7.

In November the official side stated that the government would arrange without delay a study of fringe benefits. On April 13, six months later, the official side of the joint council blandly stated that they would not have a report until May. A further meeting on April 20 brought the suggestion that the report would be ready in June. Frustrated and disgusted, the association took steps to notify the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan) of the situation. He arranged a meeting attended by representatives of both sides: the chairman of the civil service commission, and a labour lawyer retained by the government. Apart from assurances that better negotiating procedures would be devised, nothing has transpired.

Something of the absurdity of the situation can be realized from the fact that the bargaining committee set up, the joint council, has on occasion become aware of changes in the working conditions when they were announced in the Ontario Gazette. There has been no negotiation on salary. The brief says:

On occasion we have been invited to discuss salaries for certain classification, but only in one instance did our protest against rates to be recommended by the commission, result in any improvement in rates. In other instances, the rates disputed were subsequently announced without negotiation and in defiance of our protests.

There is a very interesting angle here which has emerged in the matter of pregnancy of female employees. Maternity leave was provided for in the contract but when one woman applied for a second maternity leave it was denied. She took the matter to arbitration, and note this—the decision handed down was that she had a right, and the employees had a right to a second maternity leave.

This was established as a right of the association, but then the government changed the rules. It changed the regulation under which this was operating. So now female employees in the civil service just cannot have second pregnancies, though how this can be enforced I am just not sure. Perhaps the hon. Minister of Labour or the hon. Provincial Treasurer can tell us how this could be done. The hon. Minister of Labour was acting here, I understand.

Now, this will be terrific news for those concerned with the population explosion, and if it can be enforced I am not sure but what the government may be to some extent indirectly in contravention of the federal birth control regulation. I do not know, but the fact remains that this rule was changed and now the various female employees in the civil service are told, "no second pregnancies or you have to take leave at your own expense," in spite of the fact that arbitration established their right in this field, the government unilaterally has changed it.

This is a case of the employer saying, "If we do not like a certain clause in the regulations or the contract or whatever it may be, then we shall change it, we shan't bother to bargain for it." No wonder that the association is a little incensed by this. This is a concept that we thought had gone out with the last century. "It is sufficient to say," says the brief, "that losing a grievance at any other jurisdiction would not give management the right to change the rules of the game, unless and until that change has been bargained for."

One more quote from the brief demonstrates confusion:

In 1961 a well publicized job-evaluation programme was commenced to be completed within one year. It is still not completed in 1964. The long delays, the lack of reasonable explanation for the delays, and the confusion in the processing of the findings have resulted in frustration and bitterness at all levels of the service. The whole rate revision process is in a state of chaos and in some cases employees recently promoted are now receiving less pay than they would have received had they not been promoted. The planned, orderly, two-year programme which was publicized far and wide has become a disorderly jumble with no apparent end.

So says the brief.

That fact is, Mr. Speaker, that this government is refusing to bargain in good faith with its employees, and as a result, frustration and bitterness have resulted at all levels of the service. In an article by Eric Dowd, in the Globe and Mail, he points out that, according to the associations surveyed, government electricians, for instance, get a maximum of $4,600 a year, compared to an average $5,000 in an industry. Labourers get $1.50 an hour compared with $1.80 outside. Training machine operators get $1.67 an hour compared with $2.57; surveyors, $6,300 compared with $7,200. Unattractive salaries, he says, are holding up recruits.

Mr. Speaker, this situation is one which should concern us very seriously. Part of the problem, of course, is the very structure of the civil service association itself. It is not all perhaps with the government, because within the civil service association you have, in effect, management and workers in the same general bargaining group. I raised the question of the Guelph institution a week or so ago. One of the problems there of course is a very fundamental one, that in that unit—branch 11—you have the superintendent of the institution and the deputies, who, I stand here to say, are among the best men in the service; you also have the officers and the non-coms and the custodial officers, all within the same bargaining unit.

And so, Mr. Speaker, the question always is, how can management in that case and the other lower echelons of the service sit down together and talk frankly about their problems? After all, the management has the final say about working conditions, and all the rest of it, within the framework of a contract.

And so I think the civil service association has to take unto itself certain advice. It has to cut itself off from the managerial part of its association at some place at the foreman level in each department where that can be established. They must regard the upper echelon as management, and the rest as the bargaining unit. That is the job they have to do if they are going to face their problems realistically. I think this government has to assist and co-operate in that kind of a fundamental change within the bargaining unit, to create a bargaining unit similar to those now in effect in so many municipalities across this province.

But until this is done, we are not going to solve the long term problem. Today, tomorrow, if this government will, the joint council which is now in the process of negotiation can solve certain fundamental problems within the civil service and then the unrest which is all too evident there, and the difficulties which have shown themselves by an emergency meeting being called next Wednesday can be resolved and resolved to the satisfaction of this government, of the civil service and to the people of Ontario. I think we have to recognize the fact that people who work for the public have the right to a scale of income commensurate to the people who work in the private sector of the economy and that they have a right to the same kind of bargaining and the same obligations in bargaining that the others have.

So, Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I urge upon the government that these matters be taken very seriously and that in this whole field where there are problems between management and labour, where there are problems of minimum wages, where there are problems in the field of agriculture, which has been outlined so clearly by those in this House during the session, these matters must have the serious attention of this government, and if they have, Mr. Speaker, then I am sure that a solution can be found. But only the government can bring about that solution and bring it about speedily with a sense of justice and with a sense of understanding and fair play to all concerned.

Mr. F. M. Cass (Grenville-Dundas): Mr. Speaker, may I at the outset of my remarks express the pride which I feel that a native of my own area of Winchester should now be so capably, and with such graceful dignity, the occupant of Mr. Speaker's Chair in this House. And I am also sure that all hon. members have been grateful during the stormy periods of the session to have had your firm but sensible hand at the control of House debates.

On March 26, 1956, I had the pleasure of making what is commonly known as a new member's maiden speech in this House. On that occasion, I had the opportunity of stating that, as member for Grenville-Dundas, I represented two of the oldest counties of this great province—counties which in days gone by had each furnished Ontario with a great Conservative Prime Minister; counties populated not only by the descendants of UEL settlers but by people of many countries who have chosen to make Canada their new home; counties populated by the most sincere and loyal constituents it has ever been the privilege of any member to represent.

These facts I would only reiterate and re-emphasize.

During the same speech I also stated and I quote:

Mr. Speaker, I cannot close today without saying a word about an organization which is an integral part of this Parliament and without which the hon. members of this House could not efficiently carry out their responsibilities to their people. I refer to our permanent civil servants. They have been frequently discussed during this session of Parliament, but they have been carrying on with their work the same as before.

I found, Mr. Speaker, that the civil service comprises a body of sincere and helpful people who give pleasant service not only to the hon. members of the House but to the people of Ontario as a whole. The great success and prosperity we all foresee in the future of this great province rests in the government, but it is of little avail unless the decisions of the executive can be properly and efficiently carried out.

Mr. Speaker, the record of the past has shown our confidence in the future in both of these to be amply justified.

And now, sir, after several years of the closest association with a great many of these public servants in three separate departments of this government, I can only state that never had I, on any occasion, even the slightest reason to change, in any particular, my early evaluation of our provincial civil servants. To the very many of them in every degree of official responsibility and appointment who have these past years been of such wonderful assistance to me, as their Minister, and to the government, I do acknowledge my great debt and my sincere gratitude.

Over the past decade, I have listened with awe to the successive budgets with their spiralling figures which have been introduced into this House by our Provincial Treasurers. Each one, Mr. Speaker, has been a record of achievement and an augury of progress and sound expansion. The 1964 Budget is, of course, no exception to this trend. However, Mr. Speaker, we should all caution ourselves and our people against the ever present and most pleasant tendency to consider that the consolidated revenue fund is an inexhaustible source of revenue for even the most worthy cause. The tremendous burdens which have been placed upon, and accepted by, our people for educational and welfare purposes surely must remind us all daily that each one of us is a taxpayer and that we must be the only source of provincial largesse and that, for what we demand of our provincial government, we, in turn, must be prepared to pay in taxes of one sort or another.

In this age of civil liberties sensitiveness, we are all most conscious of our rights and freedoms as individual members of society, often being blinded to the necessity of certain curtailments for the general public good. Because during the past year or so in my then official position, it had been my aim to enlarge and secure many of these rights, I would review the results as they appear on the records of this House and in our statute books.

And may I emphasize, sir, that this record of accomplishment is that of this Robarts administration which has always recognized that our progress, prosperity and happiness as a people depends on a free society. For convenience in following these various items and for reference, I shall resort to a numbered sequence.

1. The Proceedings Against the Crown Act: For some ten years, through the regimes of successive Attorneys General, this Act lay on our statute books unproclaimed while the individual citizen of Ontario was kept deprived of the right to take to the courts his claim, fancied or real, against government. The re-drafted Act was enacted at the last session.

2. The Expropriation Procedures Act: Those of us who had the duty of serving on this assembly's select committee inquiring into all phases of expropriation learned firsthand of the many instances where the individual's rights had been denied or greatly infringed by governments of every level, and the committee's recommendations to re-state and protect in great measure, the ordinary citizen, were adopted in all salient features by the government in this bill enacted at the last session.

3. The Securities Act: One of the great difficulties in securities legislation is to protect the investor from his own speculative desires and indiscretions and, at the same time, to avoid strangulation of the flow of risk capital so necessary for the development of our province. During one of the many frenzied periods on the Toronto Stock Exchange some years ago, certain provisions were placed in The Ontario Securities Act which had the effect of allowing a broker-dealer, whose licence was in jeopardy, to have his case heard before the director of the commission with the only appeal therefrom to the full securities commission—the chairman and only full-time member thereof being the director, the self-same person who had made the order being appealed. This denial of fair hearing was corrected at the last session of the Legislature by an amendment to the legislation providing for the appeal to be heard by the commission which was then to be composed of persons having no prior connection with the case.

4. A potpourri—The Collection Agencies Act, The Mortgage Brokers Registration Act, The Real Estate and Business Brokers Act: While it is an accepted fact that, in these areas, the majority of operators are honest and keep in the forefront the best interests of their customers, there are and always have been, those who advance first their own personal interests. The legislation on the statute books of Ontario provided means whereby a licence could be suspended or cancelled by the authorities without the opportunity of hearing being given to the man whose livelihood was thus pre-emptorily taken from him. The amendments to these Acts passed at the last session of the Legislature provided not only a hearing in the first instance, in all cases where the person concerned could state his case, but also provided an appeal to another tribunal entirely unconnected with the official holding the first hearing.

5. The Act Regulating Deposits solicited from the Public: This legislation, introduced at the last session to protect the individual small investor attracted by unrealistic returns on investments promised by certain corporations and others, has proved most successful in giving just such protection to the citizen unused to the ramifications of present-day high finance and credit operations.

6. The County Court Amendment Act: Here again at the last session legislation was passed giving the individual a right of appeal to the higher court from interlocutory orders which had not, prior to such time, been possible.

7. An Act to afford Protection for the Payment of Wages Materials and Services on Public Works: During the past few years, when construction of government works of every kind reached an all-time high, it became apparent that the wage earner and small material supplier was losing out in his battle for payment for his work and materials when the prime of the sub-contractor became financially involved. And, despite the fact that these were government works being paid for by the Ontario government, the provincial authorities in most cases were powerless to help the individual. This Act which was passed last session allows, and indeed empowers, the provincial authorities to take necessary steps to secure payment of these small claims so that the wage earner and the man of business need no longer always be the loser.

8. The Fire Departments Act: Amendments to this legislation, passed last session and introduced into the House this year, provide for the bringing into negotiations of salaries and working conditions for full-time fire fighters, and practices which, under the guidance of our provincial Department of Labour, have proven so successful in protecting and advancing the rights and privileges of the individual. Similar provisions were also contained for police in The Police Act introduced by me at this session.

9. The Wages Act: Earlier this session, I introduced a bill to amend The Wages Act which would have had as its effect the provision to the wage earner of a larger share of his earnings free from assignment and garnishment and would enable him to use his only means of credit—his future earning power—to his best advantage in these days of credit economics.

10. The Magistrates Act: The bill, in amendment of this Act, which was introduced this session, had as its aim the orderly reorganization of the business of magistrates' courts under a chief magistrate. It was patterned upon the most successful operation in administrative matters of the chief judge in county courts and chief justice high court in the Supreme Court trial division. The great majority of our people experience their only taste of Ontario justice in these busy magistrates' courts and, despite an able and dedicated bench, the increasing volume of work has, in many cases, resulted in an administrative chaos which can only, and does, adversely affect the rights and freedoms of the individual who is brought into such courts.

11. The Mental Incompetency Act: The amendments to this Act, earlier introduced by me, were to effect transfer from the high court, which sits only at certain times each year, to the county court where an able and experienced judge is always available in each county and district, to transfer their jurisdiction with respect to estates of incompetents. In this manner, the ordinary citizen, at any time and without being required to travel outside of his own area, could receive the often most immediate and necessary court order to safeguard a family's property.

12. The Police Act and Regulations: Provisions in the original bill and regulations thereunder would give the policeman not only the recognized bargaining rights to which I have made previous reference but also contained the means whereby charges against him must be properly heard with right to counsel and always an appeal to an independent commission, and thence either to the Ontario Police Commission or to the courts.

13. The Mortgages Act and The Short Forms of Mortgages Act: This session's bills to amend these two very important Acts contained, with other provisions, one which would require in every case, notice to the mortgagor before a sale could be effective stipulating a reasonable time to enable the delinquent mortgagor to refinance his home or his property. It also provided that a person could not contract out of this provision for his protection as now so often is done under the pressure of profit-hungry money lenders.

14. The Used Car Dealers Act: Upon this new legislation I shall not expand. Suffice it to say that it contained the necessary provisions to enable the authorities to deal efficiently with the bad operator without penalizing the good one and, at all times reserving the right to everyone to a hearing and to an appeal.

15. The Credit Unions Act: This bill provided not only protection for the small credit union member who wished to use his union credit for many banking purposes, but also recognized the right of a sound credit union to engage in such business practices. In view of the recommendations contained in the recent report of the Dominion Commission on Banking and Finance, it would appear that we in Ontario were following the modern concept.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to mention three other fields in which careful investigation is in progress and which will inevitably lead to long-awaited and very necessary legislation:

First, legal aid. It has always been my opinion that much was still to be desired in the system whereby the poor man or woman was entitled, and advised of such entitlement, to aid when before our courts, with property or person in jeopardy. A committee established recently by the treasurer of the Law Society of Upper Canada and myself, is engaged upon the Herculean task of studying this whole matter from every angle.

Second, personal property. The rights of ownership, difficulties of transfer, tangle of encumbrance records and so many other difficult matters with respect to personal property have, over the years, presented great problems to our courts, confused the legal profession and this has usually been to the detriment of the individual. My predecessor in office as Attorney General (Mr. Roberts) initiated a study of the whole matter which was to be culminated by the introduction of an entirely new approach to the whole subject based upon the American Uniform Code in a Personal Property Security Act to be laid before this House for study and discussion.

Third, during recent years the matter of profits by insiders in corporate transactions, the refusal often of corporate officials to make full disclosure of corporation affairs to shareholders, and similar matters have been the subject of much public discussion as well as extensive investigation by the appropriate authorities, both in the United Kingdom and in the United States. Last year, I appointed a strong committee drawn from both business and government to inquire exhaustively into all phases of corporate financing and related matters, so that thereafter appropriate legislation might be prepared to safeguard the rights of the small investor. I am happy to report that this committee has made very considerable progress.

The foregoing, Mr. Speaker, is only a brief highlighting of the measures recommended by our capable and experienced law officers in The Department of the Attorney General, headed by Mr. William B. Common, QC, a most distinguished and respected deputy Attorney General.

And now, Mr. Speaker, in the light of what I have just recounted to this House, and in closing, may I make some comments with respect to certain of the amendments to The Police Act introduced by me before Easter. A very great deal has been said in many places and in various media about these matters, remarks which in many cases, I am sure, were made in good faith but with a sketchy knowledge at best of the whole subject matter. Indeed, in this House, many unnecessary, indeed unkind, remarks were directed at me although I was perforce not able to be within this Chamber. For the record, I may state that, prior to the opening of this Legislature on Monday, March 23 last, my resignation as Attorney General had been tendered and accepted. I no longer had the right to occupy my theretofore customary place in this House, and no other seat having then been assigned me, I was, of course, by the rules of this House unable to take my place or speak. For similar, though not identical reasons, I have been absent for some time from the sittings of this assembly.

I have endeavoured today to indicate my preoccupation with the task of securing the individual's or ordinary citizen's rights within the great mass of laws and rules which govern our society. With respect to The Police Act, I submit that I did not deviate from my usual views or actions. Let me explain.

We who have been brought up in the wonderful tradition of British freedom and justice, and particularly those of us who have in other days gone to war in their defence, have always feared and abhorred any semblance of what recently and in common parlance has been often referred to as "The Police State." For such a monster to become a reality, there seem to me, in addition to a weak democratic or non-democratic government, to be two fundamental requisites, concentrated in a body not responsible to the people—first, control of the police, and second, the powers of inquisition and imprisonment; either of these without the other would be unfortunate but not dangerous.

When I became Attorney General, I found both of these conditions existing in the Ontario Police Commission, that independent body created especially to aid authorities solve the problem of the threat of organized-syndicated crime. I must say that never did I espouse the view of a former Opposition party leader that crime was rampant in Ontario any more than I could accept that of the then Attorney General that we in Ontario were unthreatened and crime free.

I then concurred, and still do, in the reports of both inquiries into this problem, namely, that Ontario, through the excellence and vigilance of its law enforcement agencies and people, has as yet escaped the inroads of U.S.-type crime but that our prosperous economy was a prize for which the syndicates had made, and from day to day could be expected to continue to make, great efforts to penetrate. It was, therefore, my opinion that greater powers should be available to the appropriate authorities—but always bearing in mind the dangers of control and inquisition together in a body not directly responsible to the people.

A careful study of the means whereby other police forces were controlled, particularly our justly famous Royal Canadian Mounted Police, convinced me that control of any state police force must remain in the elected representatives of the people through the appropriate Minister of the government. Only in this way could we be sure that the will of the people would be the final governing authority. I hasten to state, Mr. Speaker, that my resignation as such a responsible Minister in this government when it was apparent that a section at least of our people was displeased with, and fearful of, the proposed legislation, is the best proof possible for my proposition just stated.

I was encouraged in my view by the patent danger when the independent authority was headed and actually controlled by an experienced, dedicated but very ambitious man. Consequently, I proposed that control of our Ontario Provincial Police be returned to the elected representatives through the Attorney General and used wording identical to that in the statutes of Canada with respect to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. At the same time, I proposed certain additional powers be given to the Ontario Police Commission with respect to investigations into matters pertaining to crime. I did this with full confidence that the present Ontario Police Commission was a unit governed in its actions and deliberations by great experience in such matters and a real appreciation of the freedoms and rights of the individual.

May I for a moment digress to discuss briefly an aspect of the powers of the Ontario Police Commission? The former chairman was strongly of the view, in which I unreservedly concurred, that powers of inquiry as contained in the bill proposed by me were necessary if the threat of organized-syndicated crime was still to be held in check. During an interesting period last fall, one Toronto newspaper consistently attacked me for not providing the measures so recommended by their adviser on such matters. It has been most intriguing to me and, I am sure to others also, to find this self-same newspaper leading in the attack on just such legislation when it was proposed.

In any event, my proposals as embodied in Bill No. 99 and discussed with my hon. colleagues—and I assure you, Mr. Speaker, they were so discussed—are now history. With others, I have welcomed the Royal commission recently appointed to look into the very broad picture of individual rights and freedoms as presently outlined in our Ontario laws.

Mr. Speaker, I occupy my place in this House as the honoured representative of a wonderful constituency, a proud member of the Tory Party and a firm supporter of the Robarts government which is providing Ontario with the good government and leadership so necessary to keep Ontario prosperous.

Finally, may I quote a most interesting statement by Dr. Wayne D. Booth, Professor of English at the University of Chicago:

It is a commonplace to say that democracy depends for its survival on an informed citizenry but we all know that mere information is not what we are talking about when we say such things.

What we mean is that democracy depends on a citizenry that can reason for themselves, on men who know whether a case has been proved, or at least made probable. Democracy depends on free choices, and choices cannot be in any sense free if they are made blind: Free choice is, in fact, choice that is based on knowledge—not just opinions, but knowledge in the sense of reasoned opinion.

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on this debate, it is the first opportunity I have had to congratulate you and compliment you on the way in which you handle your arduous duties and add dignity to the Chair which you have the honour to occupy.

I also wish to mention for a moment the Budget, which I believe most reasonable. I want to congratulate the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan) to my right, who provided, I believe, many benefits to the province of Ontario and was able to keep our tax rate on a very reasonable basis.

And I want to congratulate the new hon. members in this House. To me it has been an inspiration to see so many new members of all parties come in this House and do so well in debate and seem to be very knowledgeable of the needs of the communities that they represent. I think the debates have been especially good. I know, sir, that this session has been very stimulating to me and I believe it has been the means of bringing forth beneficial legislation that will benefit all Ontario citizens, the people that we have the honour to serve.

As I speak on this debate, Mr. Speaker, I admit that I do so in a much better spirit than I was at the time I delivered the speech on the estimates for The Department of Mines before the Easter adjournment. At that time, we were faced with a very considerable decrease in the productivity of Ontario's mining industry. I was obliged to point out that for 1964 the outlook was not bright, with the virtual certainty that before the end of the year all but one of our uranium mines will have closed for lack of markets, and within the next two years some of our largest and oldest gold mines will also have suspended operations because of the depletion of ore reserves. These are facts, Mr. Speaker, and nothing that has happened in the intervening time is likely to change them. However, I admitted at that time, and I repeat now, that the somewhat sombre view I expressed could have an application of shock therapy designed to promote the speeding-up of the steps required to bring the mining industry back to its former healthy condition.

I would be very pleased and proud if I could believe that the dramatic cure which now seems to be well started stems even indirectly from my admonition. I am sure that the events of the third week of April, 1964, are still fresh in the minds of all hon. members. For several days at the first of the month, rumours of an important base metal discovery in the area of Timmins grew and spread with increasing rapidity. It was on April 15, when an hon. member asked me if I could give the House any information on this reported find. I could only reply that at that time I had no pertinent information but since I had had a conversation earlier in the day with Mr. R. D. Mollinson, the vice-president in charge of exploration for the Texas Gulf Sulphur Corporation, I was able to add that the company would be issuing a press release the next day.

About the time that this release was issued in New York I received a supplementary statement from Mr. Mollinson which I made available to the press gallery. What happened immediately thereafter is history—history in the annals of Canada that is still being written. It was evident from Mr. Mollinson's statement that a discovery had indeed been made, a discovery that will possibly rank as one of the major developments in the whole history of Canadian mining.

Although the analysis of the diamond drilling that had so far been done was still incomplete a deposit of at least 25,000 tons of copper-zinc and silver ore was indicated. The total value—25 million tons, did I say less? I beg your pardon, 25 million tons!

The total value, based on the assay of one core and drilling to date would put the gross value of this deposit somewhere in the neighbourhood of $850 million, which is more than equal to one half of the total output of all the gold mines in the Porcupine in all the years they have been producing.

I think that I should point out that the assay of a single drill core is perhaps not a sufficiently sound base on which to establish so optimistic a forecast, but I think it is sufficient, Mr. Speaker, to answer the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Sopha), who I am glad to see in his seat today, who in the course of the debate on the estimates of The Department of Mines said, and I quote from Hansard, page 1058:

I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that the mining industry in Canada is sick. Nowhere is it sicker than in the province of Ontario, where the mining industry is dying.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Nowhere is it sicker than in the back row up there.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: All I can say to that, Mr. Speaker, is that if the patient was as sick as the hon. member appeared to believe, we have here the evidence of a remarkable recovery.

Mr. Sopha: Keep it up!

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: If the patient was dying, this is certainly a glorious resurrection. I know that the hon. member for Sudbury rejoices along with all of us at this resurrection. I believe sincerely that the current events and those which are to ensue in the next few weeks were more accurately forecast in my own speech in which I said, and I quote:

I would like to emphasize most definitely that the present ailments of the industry are or should be short-term ones. That if remedial action is taken promptly the patient will recover his complete health and be stronger and more robust than ever. As could be expected there have been expressions of regret that the major find was made by an American company rather than by one of our Canadian-owned mining or exploration groups—

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): They are busy in the cement business.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Certainly, we would all have preferred that the triumph should have been won by a Canadian organization if for no other reason than more of the benefits of it would have accrued to Canada. But the fact remains that the find was not the result of any fly-by-night effort but rather it was the fruit of five years of intensive and costly exploration efforts.

It may yet show, of course, that some of the frenzied activity on the stock market was in the nature of a chain reaction, that there was more buying and selling of stock in some of the companies that held property in the general area of the major strike than the situation would actually justify. Time alone, Mr. Speaker, holds this answer; but naturally my department is not directly concerned with the operation of the market, although it is of vital importance to the mining industry for which I have the honour to speak in this House. For that reason it is most gratifying to me, and I am sure to most hon. members, that it has been shown that the apparent apathy toward mining in Ontario of the last year or so was not deep lying and Canadians are as anxious as they have ever been in our history to demonstrate their faith in our country and its great mining industry.

Apart from the assurance that Texas Gulf Sulphur intends to begin mining operations, I am not able at this stage to give the House any sort of timetable for their development work. That, of course is a company decision. We have the assurance that a very large open pit mine will be established as quickly as possible and as soon as work starts it will mean a new lease on life for the town of Timmins and a great resurgence of activity throughout the whole mining industry. It will certainly mean a great deal in profitable freight traffic for Ontario's own railway, the ONR.

Now it has been said, Mr. Speaker, of the old historic Cobalt camp, that its greatest contribution to Canada and the mining industry lay not so much in the value of the production of its mines as in the impetus it gave to prospecting and developing the vast mineral resources that still lay unrevealed throughout the breadth of Ontario and farther afield. Even at this early stage I think it might safely be said that the same thing applies to the base metal discovery in Kidd township. Prospecting in this province has been at a relatively low ebb for the last two or three years, but so far this year, I am happy to say, there has been a very distinct upturn.

Reports received from the offices of mining recorders throughout the province show that during the first three months of this year there were 5,986 claims staked and recorded, an increase of 2,227 over the total for the same period last year. At the same time, the number of miners' licences issued and renewed showed a sharp upturn and there was a reduction in the number of claim cancellations. All this happened before the definite announcement of the Kidd township strike, and certainly the in-rush of prospectors to that general area since then would indicate that there will be anything but a falling off when the snow is off the ground and the chances of successful discoveries are much greater.

We have had to bring our mining recorders from Port Arthur, Kenora and all our western points—10 in all—to man the office in the Timmins area, where we had two previously. We cannot keep up with tags, forms and other necessities, but we are doing our best, because there have been in the neighbourhood of 10,000 claims staked in that area alone. I would point out too, Mr. Speaker, that although the Porcupine division in which Kidd township is located showed the greatest activity and the greatest increase in the number of claims recorded, the resurgence was much more widely spread than that. Indeed increases were reported in seven of the 14 divisions in this province.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that I might justly point out that the amendments to The Mining Act, which the House approved this year were for the most part drafted specifically to give encouragement and assistance to the very type of prospecting activity which led to the present discovery. In many parts of this province, including specifically Kidd township, most areas in which rock outcroppings occur have already been subjected to intensive investigation by prospectors. Thus the prospector must look deeper to find what lies beneath the surface.

The amendments to the Act, therefore, are designed specifically to encourage geophysical methods of prospecting through the use of magnetic, electromagnetic, gravimetric or other forms of geophysical examination. The efficacy of this sort of work is borne out by the fact that the Texas Gulf discovery was made under 23 feet of muskeg and the mineral could have lain there forever if only the conventional methods of prospecting and rock sampling were available.

In the short time since the discovery was announced, the chief geologist of the department has rearranged the schedule of this year's field staff so that now two geological parties are to be sent in to examine the area north of Timmins this year.

There is just one other phase of this government's activity which I want to mention indirectly with the Kidd township discovery. I have spoken before at some length on the programme of constructing mining and access roads and roads to resources designed specifically to open areas of the northland for full access and development. Without these roads, Mr. Speaker, many areas which are now richly productive of minerals and forest products would still be completely undeveloped. In the years since 1951 when this government's own access roads programme was initiated, and since 1959 when we entered into an agreement with the federal government to share costs of approved projects, more than 1,100 miles of roads have been built or are now under construction.

There have been 62 mining and access roads and three roads to resources completed; four others in the latter category are now under construction. The longest and most ambitious of these intergovernment projects is a road running northwest from Pickle Crow 260 miles to the Manitoba boundary at Lingman Lake. The route for this road was selected after the first series of airborne geophysical surveys which are to be flown over the entire province. By the end of this year 192,000 square miles will have been flown and mapped. The survey indicated areas of potential mineralization, and it is through or close to these areas that the road is to run. Mr. Speaker, I am able to say that my department will be watching with the keenest interest and optimism, developments in the vicinity of Timmins and elsewhere throughout this province. Perhaps before too long it will be possible for me to make further reports on success to this House.

I want for a moment to speak to you about the Ontario Research Foundation on which the hon. Minister of Economics and Development (Mr. Randall) spoke so forcibly during his estimates, and what that great plant under Dr. Miscner is doing for the iron industry in this province.

They are now processing all these iron ores with the hope that they will be able to find a process that will make it much cheaper to bring these ores to the market and perform a great service for the iron industry in this province. We have deposits containing iron, Mr. Speaker, which total at least six billion tons. It is from these and other sources which have not been outlined, that our mining industry will draw a great deal of its strength in years to come. It is in relation to the still undeveloped ore bodies that the major importance of the research now underway will prove its worth. A happy combination of geography, geology and photography resulted in the location of the trans-Canada pipe lines from the gas fields of Alberta to the markets of southern Ontario, through the Pre-Cambrian shield. In many cases it will be within reach of some of these iron deposits. The availability of this fuel supply in virtually unlimited amounts, provides the answer to one of the principal problems related to the use and development of these iron resources. Many of our still undeveloped iron reserves are of relatively low grade—that is, in 100 tons of rock there might be as little as 25 tons of iron. Under the standard procedure of shipping ore to the smelter it is obvious, Mr. Speaker, that the cost of moving so much waste rock would be prohibitive. Some companies have adopted the practice of concentrating and pelletizing the ore at the mines and shipping only the high grade concentrates. This, however, requires a very costly plant. The objective of the jet smelting process on which the Ontario Research Foundation is working, is to provide a method for converting the iron ore concentrates into molten metallic iron, using natural gas as the reducing agent. The process consists essentially of feeding fine ore through a natural gas oxygen fired burner system to produce a molten metal which can be cast into pigs or used directly in the molten state to produce steel.

As a preliminary to the jet smelting, of course, the ore must be ground very finely and concentrated through a magnetic process which separates the iron from the waste rock. Development of the jet smelting process was begun in 1957 by the research foundation on a laboratory scale. A small pilot furnace was built on the ORF location in Rexdale, about which the hon. Minister of Economics and Development was speaking the other day.

Then, Mr. Speaker, in 1963, control of this project became the responsibility of The Department of Mines. The process has been developed and improved progressively during the years that it has been under way. Revisions are constantly being made in the equipment and procedures to increase fuel economy. For example, hot exhaust gas is now being used to preheat gas and oxygen being fed to the burner system. Some exhaust gas is being recycled and soon the ore feed will be preheated and pre-reduced by this exhaust gas.

Of course, the whole programme is aimed primarily at the reduction of iron ore, experiments are proceeding at the same time with other minerals. For example, copper oxide has been reduced to metallic copper, and glass has been made from a standard glass batch mix. Some of the work which has been done on a pilot scale seems to warrant continuing study. Tests in the near future are planned in the smelting of titaniferous iron ores. If it is found that this titaniferous iron can be successfully smelted, a use can be found for large deposits of it which exist in Ontario, particularly in the Chapleau area.

Great interest in the jet smelting process has been shown and the research foundation has had inquiries concerning it from all over the world. Success in so important a field will certainly be of major importance to Ontario's own iron mining industry, and this, in turn, Mr. Speaker, will add hundreds of millions of dollars to the economy of this province.

Now there are six other objects of generally similar nature currently being carried out. The secondary research is in the practical use of three new types of machinery for the separation of ores. Perfection of this equipment is expected to lead to more efficient operation.

I think it would be fair, Mr. Speaker, to suggest that the government of Ontario, through its interest in the work, has been instrumental in the progress which has been made along a number of lines. The Rexdale plant of the research foundation was built in 1957, as you know, with assistance from the province amounting to $180,000; another $35,000 was provided in January, 1962, for the construction of storage buildings and office space. The work that this section of the Ontario Research Foundation is doing on behalf of The Department of Mines is of great tangible value to the mining industry.

And so, Mr. Speaker, I am particularly glad to have an opportunity to say something about it at this time. Again I congratulate Dr. Misener and his staff, and I was most pleased to hear from the hon. Minister of Economics and Development of his plans for enlarging this research centre. We will have, I hope, as the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) announced, a select committee on mining which will be meeting shortly. We need new thinking for mines. We want to find out all other ways we can to spur the finding and development of our great mineral resources. We need to do that and I am looking to this select committee as a great incentive for the future of the mining industry, because mining, Mr. Speaker, has many fields. It is mystifying, true; it is provocative, it is intriguing, it is perplexing, it has its moments of disappointment and despair, its hills and valleys, but in the end it often brings rewards that compensate for all the trials that those connected with it are forced to endure.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would ask all hon. members of the House to try to interest young men to come into this great mining field in this province. Try to teach them in university to go in for geology, mineralogy, mining engineering, because we need new men in those fields.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I said that I had enjoyed this session immensely and I have. I have been quite intrigued with the knowledge of the new hon. members and the other hon. members. I have enjoyed the speeches, many of which were brilliant. I want to say that in my opinion we have a great young Prime Minister—and I am not saying that to curry favour. Hon members should know it. He is a man of integrity, a man we know we can trust, a man with ability and a man who is a humanitarian. It often makes me laugh when I hear some of the slings that are passed across to this part of the House. As far as I am concerned, I do not care, but very seldom do I hear anything of a complimentary nature said when certainly I realize that complimentary words should be extended from those on the opposite side who have been helped by the leader of this government, the Prime Minister of this province. However, I suppose that is politics, and I do not blame the Opposition members very often for being critical and so on; that is their side of the House to look after—the critical side of politics.

And so I say this has been a great session for me. It has been stimulating, and in closing, I hope Mr. Speaker, that you and every hon. member of this House have a very, very happy and successful summer and that you come back again in the fall, filled with good health and happiness and the realization that this government has done a great job. Mr. Speaker, my last words are God bless you, each and every one.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I now move an inspired adjournment to the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Clerk of the House: The eleventh order.

THE EXECUTIVE COUNCIL ACT

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister) moves second reading of Bill No. 141, An Act to amend The Executive Council Act.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE PENSION BENEFITS ACT, 1962-63

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves second reading of Bill No. 140, An Act to amend The Pension Benefits Act, 1962-63.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, just before the hon. member starts, may I say we decided that this bill could be a form in which the question of pensions in a broader aspect than just what is contained in this bill could be discussed. In this regard I would suggest that if the House would like to deal first with the principles of this bill within the bill itself, I would be pleased to make a statement. I made a very full statement on the first reading as to what this bill in fact accomplished. Now I can continue that, or if hon. members have some debate on this bill itself, we could deal with it and then deal with the subject of pensions generally, because I would like to make some remarks in that regard.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Would that mean that members might conceivably speak twice?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Yes.

Mr. Bryden: At this time, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make some comments relating specifically to the bill itself as it is before us on the order paper.

I think this bill, which is the culmination of about four years of consideration by this House and the technical committee set up by the House, provides an interesting case history of how a Tory government can take a good idea, kick it around, play politics with it, milk it for all the publicity it is worth and finally leave it with very little substance.

As this group tried to indicate several years ago when the question of portable pensions first came before the Legislature—I think pretty well one could say on the initiative of the Opposition parties, and I use the word in the plural advisedly, I think both of them were pursuing it in their own ways.

I think as far as this party was concerned, in the 1960 session, the first session of the 1959-63 Legislature, our hon. leader (Mr. MacDonald) placed a resolution on the order paper, Mr. Speaker, on the subject of portable pensions and in the following session I introduced a bill which was discussed briefly.

From the very beginning, this group tried to indicate that there are really two quite distinct problems in the field of portable pensions, as it has popularly come to be known. First there is the question of supplementing the federal old age pension; the basic, flat rate old age pension payable to every citizen who reaches a certain age and who has been here a certain number of years. There is the problem of supplementing that with a wage-related pension plan, since most of us recognize that the old age pension is at best a bare subsistence, and we would like both for ourselves and for others to see supplementary pensions available.

So there is that problem of providing to everyone as far as is possible a wage related pension to supplement the basic pension. Our group has taken the position from the beginning, and from prior to the time actually when we raised the matter in the House, that the only adequate and satisfactory way to do that was by a universal and contributory pension plan. We have stated on a number of occasions in this House that in our view such a plan should be brought in on the initiative of the federal government and as a federal statute. Since we became somewhat impatient waiting for the federal government to act, we suggested last year that if the federal government did not act soon then the provincial government should act and set up a universal contributory wage-related pension plan for the people of this province. We were always of the opinion however, and still are, that the proper way is through a federal plan.

Well, a good deal of water, as we know, has flowed under the bridge, and it appears that we will within a couple of years achieve some sort of federal universal contributory plan in addition to the basic pension that is now provided.

There is the second problem in the field of portable pensions that we tried to outline four years ago and every year since then. That is the problem of guaranteeing some degree of portability for private pension plans. I brought in a bill, I think it was in the 1960-61 session, that had as its purpose to deal exclusively with the private pension plans that existed at that time and will continue to exist no doubt even when we have a universal plan if, indeed, we get one in the next couple of years. There will still be cases where people want to supplement their pensions beyond anything that the public plans provide.

We have always taken the position that these two problems should be regarded as separate problems. We agitated four years ago that the government could proceed immediately with the second of the problems, that is with guaranteeing portability in private plans. That was what my bill, which I introduced three or four sessions ago, was exclusively concerned with. It set forth basic principles relating to portability for private plans. It did not purport to deal at all with the other area of a universal pension plan. It was our view that we should start with the easiest part of the problem. Guaranteeing portability in existing plans and private plans that might come into effect in the future was, in our opinion, the easiest part.

Unfortunately, the government set up a technical committee which contrived to get itself into an almost interminable blind alley and ended up last year with a bastard bill, that became enacted into law, which tried to deal with both the problem of universality and the problem of portability in private plans. It did not deal very well with either of them. It did not tackle the problem of universality in a sensible way at all, and now that phase of its recommendation is going down the drain. I say good riddance to it, it never was any good anyway and we are glad to see the end of it. The direction in which policy is now moving is much superior, that is the direction of a government-sponsored universal plan.

We still, however, have before us the question of portability and in this area too, we still have a very inferior piece of legislation before us. The amending bill that is now before us will cut out of The Pension Benefits Act of last year those provisions that purported, quite inadequately, to establish universality. The provisions that are left are essentially the provisions of the original Act with regard to portability of private plans.

I am going to suggest to this House, Mr. Speaker, that they are totally inadequate provisions. This group takes the position—and this is the principle that was embodied in the bill that I put in on this subject a few years ago—that wherever a pension plan was set up for employed persons, a basic condition should be that it is fully portable, that the pension benefits are fully portable.

Perhaps I should suggest that a better word to use, actually, is vesting, rather than portability. I understand that what we mean when we popularly talk about portable pensions, is pensions in which the contributions made by or on behalf of an employee, are vested in him, so that to him accrue the benefits that those contributions justified. A pension is portable to the degree in which contributions and the benefits arising therefrom are vested in the employee. I think that is really what is meant by portability. A pension is fully portable, a pension plan provides full portability if it is fully vested; it provides partial portability if it is partially vested.

Before the government's legislation came into effect, the effect of income tax interpretations or rulings made by The Department of National Revenue—whether or not with lawful authority I do not know, but they made them and they had their effect—was that pension plans did have a certain degree of portability in this country. I think the rule of thumb was that they would be recognized as costs for income tax purposes if employer contributions were vested in the employee after not more than 20 years of service. I think all existing plans long before this Act was considered—and at this time the Act still is not in effect—provided for vesting of employer contributions in the employee after not more than 20 years. Some provided it earlier. I know of plans that provide for vesting of most of the employers' contributions after five years and there are some plans, not very many, but some, I think, in public service, that provide for full vesting from the very beginning.

I submit to this House, Mr. Speaker—perhaps just before I go on to that, I should mention a point that I had intended to make. The Act that was passed last year and is not now in effect but is to be reaffirmed by the bill now before us, does not really take much of a step forward over what was already the case as a result of income tax interpretations made by The Department of National Revenue. The effect of The Department of National Revenue's action was, as I said, that there would be vesting of pension rights after 20 years of service.

The Pension Benefits Act of last year—and it will be reaffirmed by this bill if this bill passes in its present form—provides that employer contributions will be vested in the employee after 10 years of service, but only if the employee is 45 years of age. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that a large number of employees will have put in 15 or even 20 years of service before they reach the age of 45, so that for a great many employees this legislation, if it passes in its present form, will make no difference at all. It will mean simply that after they have been there 20 years the employer's contributions will be vested. For some it may mean that they will only have to serve 15 years, but it will certainly not mean, even for a majority of employees, that there will be vesting after ten years as the bill appears to mean, if you look at it quickly.

It says after ten years, but then comes the real rub: You have to be 45 years of age. And even if it did provide vesting after ten years of service for all employees covered by a plan, I am going to make one more appeal to this House that there is nothing fair or reasonable about such a proposition.

Pension plans covering employed people have grown up as a form of deferred wages. The growth of pension plans for wage earners developed at a rapid pace after trade unions got interested in the field. They frankly were negotiating for pension programmes as a form of deferred wages. They took lower wages now so that they could get benefits in the future and that is the way in which pension plans have been justified even where they have not been introduced by union negotiations.

The proposition put to the employee which I think is a sensible proposition, has been: "Take a little bit less now and we will set up a plan whereby you will be reasonably well cared for in your old age." But then without complete vesting, that is without full portability, many employees are cheated out of the wages which they agreed to defer. They never get them. The employer's contributions stay in the fund and accrue to the benefit of some other person, not to the employee's benefit, although they were supposed to have been made for his benefit.

In all too many plans, Mr. Speaker, they accrue to the benefit of the employer himself. He, in effect, gets them back through dividends from the insurance company that is underwriting the pension programme. This is one of the reasons why there is so much opposition to the principle of disclosure of information even to the employees covered by pension plans. The employers know that the employees and their union representatives would be more than interested to know about how much they get back from insurance companies in the way of dividends in pension plans. This information, of course, is carefully kept from the employee and under the bill, as it now stands, it will continue to be withheld from the employee. That is another point which I will not go into at this time—we will deal with it in committee—but another gross injustice in this bill is that employees and their representatives cannot find out what is being done with their own money in pension plans and will not be able to, as of right at any rate, if and when this legislation becomes operative.

I want to go back again to the question of portability. I submit that it is unjust that pension plans should be put into effect, which are not fully portable. Such plans are a form of skin game on the employees, who are led to believe that they are going to get benefits which they may not get at all. Under the legislation now before us they will not get the benefits unless they have been there at least 10 years and are 45 years of age. I can see no justification for such a limitation at all.

It is also suggested that there is more at stake than just the rights of the employee. There is also the whole question of the good health of our economy. The hon. Minister of Economics and Development (Mr. Randall) has frequently emphasized in this House the need for increasing mobility of labour. Now, we all know that pension plans which contain deferment of vesting are one of the greatest obstacles in the way of mobility of labour. In fact, many employers deliberately defer vesting as long as they can to use the pension plan as a way of freezing the employee to the job. That may be sensible from an employer's point of view but it is not sensible from the point of view of the economy. There may be many cases where it is desirable for the employee to think of moving to another job. It may be desirable, in terms of our economic development, that he should move, but the pension plan stands there as a bar to his moving; and the longer he stays with one employer the more solidly he is frozen to the job.

Let us take an employee who starts with an employer, say, at the age of 25 and say he starts contributing into the pension plan at that age, as I think he should. By the time he is 42, none of the employer's contributions would be vested under this legislation. It may be desirable in the economic interests of the province as a whole for him to change his job, and yet he has 17 years of employer's contributions standing to his credit that goes down the drain if he changes his job. He is frozen there for another three years. He is frozen there until he is 45, and we all know that, unfortunately, as conditions stand now, by the time a man reaches 45 he had better not change his job unless he has an ironclad assurance that he has a good, permanent job to which to go. If he leaves the job he is now in, even if he does not like it, he runs a grave risk that he will never get another job.

So, then, we can effectively freeze the fellow there until he is 45, and then he is frozen forever. It is very difficult for a man to change jobs after he has reached the age of 45 in the situation as it exists at the present time. So we have legislation which will continue to create this most undesirable limitation on the mobility of labour.

For this basic reason, Mr. Speaker, this group is most unhappy with the bill now before us. We had hoped that when the government had finally, by force of events, made what was surely a logical division in the first place and concentrated its attention on the sole problem of providing portability, it might have done an adequate job. It could have thrown out the window that bill we passed last year, it was no good anyway, and started anew with a new Act dealing with the portability feature only and providing for full vesting of benefits.

This was the principle contained in the bill I brought in on behalf of this group a few years ago. I am satisfied that the bill I brought in a few years ago was much better than the legislation we now have before us, notwithstanding the fact that the government had a technical committee sitting on the thing for three years. I agree that my bill was expressed in terms of basic principles and that the details were to be worked out by regulation, which was the only way in which I could draft a bill on this subject. But the basic principles incorporated in that bill were sound principles. In my opinion they ought to be adopted by the government. I can say only that we support this bill only on the basis that half a loaf is better than none; in fact, I think one should say that a tenth of a loaf is better than none.

It is a most inferior piece of legislation, but it is admittedly somewhat better than the situation that now exists. There will be some improvement in vesting, there will be some minor increase in portability as a result of the bill. To be fair, however, I should also say there will be an important step forward in another direction. For the first time, when this legislation comes into effect, there will be adequate regulation to ensure that the funds in pension plans are adequately invested and that the people covered by pension plans will indeed receive the benefits that they are promised. That is a step forward and we agree with it.

However, I would suggest that everything that is now to be done in this legislation could have been and ought to have been done better about four years ago, if we had not gone off on a great tangent with the technical committee, that went into an area that it dealt with very poorly and did not get down to brass tacks in the area that it could have dealt with in reasonably short order.

It being 6 o'clock, p.m., the House took recess.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

THURSDAY, MAY 7, 1964

The House resumed at 8 o'clock, p.m.

THE PENSION BENEFITS ACT, 1962-1963

Mr. E. P. Morningstar (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased indeed to see the progress which has taken place in establishing a comprehensive social security scheme in Ontario. You will recall I have raised this question in the House on several occasions. As noted in Hansard, Thursday, November 29, 1962, the former Prime Minister of Canada, the Rt. hon. John Diefenbaker—

Mr. Speaker: Pardon me, I wonder if I could ask the member what he is proceeding with?

Mr. Morningstar: Bill No. 140.

Mr. Speaker: On the pension bill?

Mr. Morningstar: That is right, sir.

Mr. Speaker: Fine; proceed.

Mr. Morningstar: Thank you.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased indeed to see the progress which has taken place in establishing a comprehensive social security pension in Ontario. You will recall that I have raised this question in the House on several occasions. As noted in Hansard, Thursday, November 29, 1962, the former Prime Minister of Canada, the Rt. hon. John Diefenbaker, asked the Prime Ministers of the provinces to give their views on a contributory social security scheme. The hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) replied as follows:

DEAR PRIME MINISTER:

I learned with much pleasure of your proposals to develop a contributory social security scheme for the aged, which will also include and extend to the disabled, and survivors (including children) of contributors who have died.

It is our considered opinion that the only proper way to add strength to our social security planning for the future lies in the establishment of a contributory scheme, enabling contributors to establish their right to receive benefits on a prescribed basis in keeping with their previous contributions.

May I say, therefore, that the government of Ontario would concur in and facilitate proper and reasonable plans by your government resulting in a contributory social insurance programme becoming a reality.

(Signed)

JOHN P. ROBERTS

Mr. Speaker, this is the end of the letter. It is a good letter from the hon. Prime Minister, a good reply. It is another indication of how this government is concerned about the needs of all the people.

I am personally satisfied that the people of Ontario want an improvement in pension coverage. An extension of pension plans in Ontario would secure for everyone who contributes, the basic necessities at least. Income would be assured where a person was retired or disabled, or for a family in the case of the death of the breadwinner. I live near the international border and I know how much the people in the United States are "sold" on compulsory pension contributions.

One of the most important features of the proposed pension plan is its portability—in other words, employees are free to move from one location to another and take along their accumulated pensions. Then, too, the Canada pension plan is going to be all across the country and this portability will apply when moving from province to province, as well as from job to job.

It will readily be seen that the hon. Prime Minister and the government have been fully in support of the opportunity to bring about this social security measure and I am sure that the good people of the riding of Welland will be delighted with the progress to date. Just another progressive step put forward by our leader, the hon. Prime Minister, the man for all the people. Thank you.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to answer some of the points raised by the hon. member for Woodbine. A good many of his points I will not bother with because what we heard this afternoon was a rehash of what we heard a year ago when this legislation was introduced. But I would say that when we commenced these studies, we knew full well that we would not be able to run the 100-yard dash before we had learned to crawl. We did what we considered to be a necessary amount of study in order to be able to introduce this legislation without completely disrupting the affairs of those who were engaged in this area.

The ten-year service qualification and the 45-years-of-age qualifications are for vesting and locking in. There is more to portability than comes from the two features, and not just the vesting. There must be some restraint put upon the man who would, if he could, spend his accumulations every few years as he goes along. We knew full well that the plan as we introduced it was not perfection and indeed was not close to what our ultimate goal was. However, for reasons of their own, many people have misinterpreted the position we took on this.

I have made this statement before. Our position has been misinterpreted for political purposes, I think. I say this quite frankly and quite freely, that an attempt has been made, for instance, to equate our plan and the part of it which is being taken out of this bill, with the national plan that the federal government introduced. Of course, there was no comparison between the two, and when we get into the fuller debate on the broader area of pensions, I think I will be able to establish quite clearly that at no time did we ever consider what we were doing was any substitute for a national plan. This has been made clear from the very beginning of our discussions. The fact of the matter was that when we started our investigations into this area and started to develop this legislation, there was no national plan and there was no mention of any national plan.

We at that time had no intention of introducing a state-operated plan in the province of Ontario. We started where we could start at that time, and I might say we started where nobody else started before. So everybody wants to get on the bandwagon. In fact, when this legislation was passed through this House, there was no similar legislation anywhere on the North American continent. Perhaps I can recognize the hon. member's desire to get on the bandwagon and say, "I thought of it before you did," but we are the people in fact who introduced the bill.

I would say this, that the private pension plans that we have in this province are going to have a very difficult time indeed in integrating, if this is the term, or adjusting, to a national plan. I will not deal with this at any length at the moment except simply to say that I have been asking the federal government for a good many months how it proposes to do this, and this is one of the great questions for which I received no answer. We are working on it here in the province ourselves and I will point out some of the difficulties involved. This is going to be a very major problem indeed and anyone who knows anything about pensions recognizes this.

If we were to attempt at one time to make all private plans portable, and if, in anticipation of the difficulty that there is going to be, in any event, to get some form of locking together of the plans that are presently in effect and people have paid into, we could create such confusion and we could create such administrative difficulties we would in fact do more harm than good. We have to work these problems out as we go along. We have to build, in the first place, the administrative machinery to do what is in this bill. We have that, of course, well under way. When we get all these plans registered, we get the necessary forms and all the administration there is to be done, and we have it working, then, of course, we will look to the extension of it. Our ultimate goal is the same as anybody else's who really gives this matter any consideration, and that is to make all our pension plans portable, from whatever source.

As you can see now, a great many of our retired people in this province are going to have income from three sources: they are going to have the old age pension, they are going to have a contributory pension, and they are going to have a pension to which they have contributed themselves. This is liable to produce some very peculiar results. We will look at these as the plans develop.

It is possible for people to be retiring on more money than they earned when they were in the labour force. These are many of the difficulties that occur when you start to put together situations that have developed in different areas and at different periods of time. I only point out to you that in asking your approval of this bill, we are not looking upon this as the be-all and end-all of what we choose to accomplish. This is the first step and when we have this done we will progress and move on to develop it.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the remarks of the hon. Prime Minister and I think I have followed, as closely as I have been able in any event, the various discussions that have taken place in these halls and in other jurisdictions. I must admit that I am quite confused about what the future of pension plans in the province of Ontario and the Dominion of Canada is to be.

I do not want, nor have I any right, and I am sure the hon. Prime Minister is going to object to my attempting to put any words in his mouth. I was wondering if at this stage it would not be fair to say we do not really know where we are going in any detail insofar as our pensions are concerned.

What seems to have emerged—and I am just sort of thinking out loud if I may for a moment or two—from all these discussions that have taken place is that we are about to have a common pension plan all over Canada, and that Ontario will take its role in being a part of that. The detail is not clear, at least it is not clear to me. I do not know what the amount is going to be, what the fringe benefits are going to be—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: If I may interrupt my hon. friend—perhaps the hon. member was not in the House, but we arranged the procedure for this debate. We have before us the bill which deals with a very specific matter and we decided that it could be used as a vehicle for the debate on pensions as such. This afternoon, we decided in order to get some order into what we were doing that we would first speak about this bill and my remarks were addressed only to what we are attempting to accomplish with it. When we have disposed of this area we will get into the broader area, and my intent is to spell out, as far as I can get it from the federal government and as far as I know, exactly where we are going and what we are doing.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, I think the remarks of the hon. Prime Minister highlight the overall thinking that I had, even though I perhaps breached inadvertently the agreement that was arrived at earlier. I think that what is being done in this bill is an adapting insofar as it can be seen at this moment, of the provisions of the present Ontario bill to what seems reasonable to expect in the future in the overall scheme. Am I right in saying that?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Yes. The purpose of this bill is to remove the necessity for obligatory pensions in this province. Then there is an extension of the portability aspect of supplementary pension plans, as we refer to them, those that will be in addition to a Canada-wide pension plan.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, then let me say this. I am quite satisfied that we are not going to obstruct the progress of this bill within the broad limits that the hon. Prime Minister has outlined. It seems to me—and perhaps I am infringing on the rules that we decided earlier in the day—there is so much doubt about the final form of these things that are probably going to emerge in the course of the next few months.

I wonder if at this stage it would not be reasonable to outline a future procedure. It may be that in one month, two months or three months the picture will be much more clear than it is this evening. When that picture has clarified, and I do not think it is clear tonight, is the hon. Prime Minister prepared to suggest to us that before any final commitment is made in the overall picture, that this House will be called back again and given an opportunity to discuss the final plans before Ontario is committed? I recognize that I am going to be told that the hon. Prime Minister by himself cannot commit the Legislature, but on the other hand, the hon. Prime Minister, when the House is not in session, can go a long way in making that commitment without discussion.

If I can get to the nub of the argument that I am trying to put forward, as these plans emerge in the future, perhaps in a month, two months, three months or four months, before, in the normal course of events this Legislature is likely to sit again, it may well be that the die will be cast. I think we are entitled at about that point, to get some sort of an undertaking from the government that we will be called back and allowed, in light of what seems to be the plan, to discuss our views in regard to those matters.

I think this is important. This is a difficult sort of debate to undertake because there are so many things that do not present themselves in a clear light at the moment. It is my thought—and I address this to the hon. Prime Minister in the hope that he will come along with this, and I think he well might—that these discussions will continue as they have been, and that close to the point where final arrangements are being made, he will be prepared to call this House back into session and allow us to discuss these arrangements before this province is finally committed.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, I want to say something about section seven as I understand it, or are you—

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): I understood that the hon. Prime Minister was planning to make a statement, Mr. Speaker. I am prepared to say anything I have to say on the general issue at some other time. But if the hon. Prime Minister makes some comments now, I may wish to comment on them.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, all right. I am quite prepared, Mr. Speaker, to go first. What I want to do really, is to sketch out some history of this whole pension situation that arose originally with the federal White Paper of July, 1963. Let us recall that that is where this whole matter started, or perhaps it started a little before that. I believe it started with the federal Liberal Party manifesto, if that is what it was called.

In any event there was a leaflet put out in 1962 as part of the federal Liberal Party platform and it was called, "Benefactions for All—the Answer." I will go into the proposals, Mr. Speaker, in some detail, sketching what that plan said, what the paper said would be, what changes were made as we went along through an election campaign in Ontario, what changes were made through a couple of federal-provincial conferences, what Quebec proposed and where we stand today. At least on the record we will have a factual position on pensions as they are as of now.

That pamphlet or leaflet put out in 1962 promised graduated pensions of one-third of earnings up to $6,000 based on a contribution of one-half of one per cent each from employers and employees. That is as far as it went.

Three months after the new federal administration took office, and this was part of the famous 90-day programme, a White Paper on pensions was issued—

An hon. member: Sixty days.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Sixty days. Well then, this was 90 days, it did not get in under the 60 days.

Mr. Bryden: Very little did.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: What did probably should not have.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: However, I have problems of my own, Mr. Speaker, and I am not in the least bit involving myself in the problems of the federal government.

But I would say this, three months after the new federal administration took office, it issued a White Paper on pensions. This was the thing that interested me so much during the election campaign when I was being coerced, bullied, shoved and pushed around to say, "I accept this," and "this" was the White Paper. It was not a bill, it was not a piece of legislation, it had never had scrutiny in the House of Commons, and I was to accept this or die, you see?

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Who was doing the pushing—Judy?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Pardon? You know better than I who was doing the pushing. I was not in on all the conferences, I was just in on the receiving end of it all. This was the type of question that I was pushing off.

Mr. Bryden: Do not blame Judy, she brought your campaign back to life.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, it helps. Mr. Speaker, all I can say is that we did pretty well. But let us get off the politics, Mr. Speaker, and back to the pensions.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I want to put these facts on the record so that they will be there for people to understand and so that people can make comparison. I think one of the great problems in this whole pension picture in Canada today is that the people themselves do not understand what we are talking about. I do not think that I am responsible for the confusion.

The White Paper on pensions was issued as of July 18, 1963, as I have said, and the plan set out in this White Paper, which was the second step, said pensions and contributions were to be based on earnings up to $4,000 a year maximum, with the ceiling rising according to an index of average wages. In other words, the ceiling upon which you would pay could increase as the index of average wages went up. This would mean that the contribution would increase with the increase of wages in the community, whether this would be through inflation or increased standard of living or whatever reason.

Included in the plan, and this is a very interesting point, included in the plan on that White Paper was a flat $10 increase for all persons receiving old age security payments. They were then $65 and they were to be raised to $75, plus 30 per cent of average pensionable earnings. So this is what was to be paid out: the collection was to be on up to $4,000, and then the payout was a $10 increase to everybody on old age security payments, plus 30 per cent of average pensionable earnings.

In calculating this average, in order to get the figure on which you would take the 30 per cent to get the pension, the earnings in past years and the earning ceiling would be adjusted according to an index of average wages and a dropout of low years would be permitted. These are technical details, but nonetheless, they are the detail of how you were to arrive at the amount the pension would be. And there was a provision that would permit low earning years to be taken out in the computation of the average.

In the first ten years of the plan, the earnings-based benefit would be paid on a graduated basis, rising by ten per cent each year so that at the end of ten years of contributions the full pension payments would be received. I will go into this a little later, because this is one of the things about this plan. This feature of it has been carried forward into the other plan and I think it is something that everybody should understand. I will neither agree nor disagree with it, but I will put it before hon. members so that they may know what it is.

The contributions here were set at one per cent from employees, one per cent from employers, and two per cent from the self-employed who elected to join—that is if they elected to join, they were not forced to join. Provision was made here that the old age security pension plus the extra flat $10 payment, and the graduated pension would be available from the age of 65, at the option of the individual, without a retirement test. Retirement test is in effect I suppose a means test, but it is a test of how much money you were earning: that is: Are you really retired or are you not? In some pension plans and in some state pension plans you have to be retired before you can draw your pension: that is: The amount of income that you are permitted to have is limited, and you will find that this turns up later on in these schemes as well.

The amount of a pension commencing before age 70 would be reduced on a basis depending on the age at which the pension began, the reduction being 32.5 per cent at age 65, so that if you wanted to take your pension before you were 70 you could take it at 65, but you would take it on a reduced amount. Of course you would receive it for the extra number of years.

The graduated pension of a surviving spouse, payable if over the age of 65, would be 60 per cent of the combined graduated pension of the couple. Now note: payable if over 65. This is where the constitutional problem arises, because when the federal government published this White Paper, constitutionally they were not able to pay the survivor a pension below the age of 65. They are still not able to do so today, and they will not be able to until we have an amendment to The British North America Act.

We agreed to that amendment in this House back two or three years ago and I think that was what the hon. member for Welland was referring to, sir. Mr. Lesage did not agree to it as far as Quebec was concerned until just recently. This is what is presently before the House of Commons in order that we may get survivor benefits, but at the time of this White Paper they could not pay a survivor benefit to anyone under 65.

The plan would be compulsory for employees, aged 18 to 70, in all provinces, except where the collection of contributions would not be feasible, and leaving out the armed forces. The plan would be optional for self-employed persons and for provincial government employees. The contributions to the Canada Pension Plan—and this is another point that I found interesting—the contributions to the Canada Pension Plan collected from the employer and the employee would provide the $10 flat increase in the old age security payment as well as the graduated benefit and the extra cost of paying old age security before the age of 70. So here we were putting together, in effect, two plans—old age security and the contributory, wage-related pension plan.

On September 9, 1963, there was a conference held in Ottawa, and Mr. Pearson's statement had the point that Quebec would be allowed to contract out of the Canada Pension Plan. Here is where some of the complications arose. He stated that the proposed Quebec plan was not an obstacle to the federal government's national objective; these were his statements. He stated also:

That the contributions under the Canada Pension Plan would not normally be required in a province with a universally available pension plan providing comparable benefits.

Now that was his statement and hon. members can see what it means. In other words, if a province develops a plan that, in the opinion of the federal government I assume, was comparable, then no contribution would be required from the residents of that province to the Canada Pension Plan.

Furthermore, the additional flat $10 payment would be provided under The Old Age

Security Act and not under the Canada Pension Plan. So here we have the first variation from the White Paper. Because if Quebec is to be allowed to contract out, you cannot collect money from the other nine provinces of Canada on a contributory basis from the employee and the employer and use that money to pay an additional $10 of old age security to the residents of Quebec. So here we have the first change in the plan designed to accommodate the province of Quebec. Part of the payment out disappeared and personal income tax, which we all pay allocated to the old age security fund, was raised from three per cent with a maximum of $90, to four per cent with a maximum of $120, and then this amount was used to pay the additional $10 of old age security. We then had that element dealt out of the situation, so to speak.

This is, in my view, where the problem of accumulation of funds in the plan first raised its head, because with this removed and the payment of $10 additional a month made to everyone receiving old age security, then the amount of money being paid into the Canada Pension Plan fund would be greater than that which was needed year by year. In other words, it would cease to be a purely pay-as-you-go fund and become a fund that was partially funded. I am sure you are all right with me.

Mr. Bryden: We are indeed, so the people got soaked—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: No, but it could not be done any other way if—

Mr. Singer: This is the difficulty about understanding what either of you—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, when I am finished my statement and hon. members can get Hansard they will find it all there if they want to understand it.

Mr. Singer: The history of the negotiations, yes; but a plan, no.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I am speaking about the actual mechanical computations, the amounts to be paid in and the amounts to be paid out and where they are going to come from. It will all be here.

In January of 1964, Mr. Pearson sent a memorandum to all the provincial leaders and made a number of further changes in the Canada Pension Plan. These were embodied in Bill C-75 and it might be interesting to note that Bill C-75, which is the first piece of legislation having to do with the Canada Pension Plan fund, was introduced into the House of Commons on March 17, 1964. So this is the first time we have seen the legislation. This embodies many changes which I have outlined to hon. members, but this is what I was supposed to accept completely last August, with no examination and no questions asked. From those days forward, it was March before the legislation actually got into the House of Commons so we could see it. Bill C-75 includes the following:

The range limit was raised from $4,000 to $4,500. This limit would not be raised for five years and thereafter it would be adjusted in $100 steps according to a three-year average earning index. The maximum graduated pension at age 70 would be 20 per cent of $4,500, instead of 30 per cent of $4,000 in the White Paper. That is to say, in actual dollars, $900 instead of $1,200.

At age 65 the benefit would be the same as at age 70, hence the new benefit at age 65 would be $900 compared with $810 in the White Paper of July, 1963. The graduated pension would not be reduced if taken before age 70 but a retirement test would be imposed. Old age security benefits would be age-reduced and not subject to retirement test.

The extra cost of paying old age security before age 70 would be charged to the Old Age Security Fund and would not be paid for out of contributions to the Canada Pension Plan. In consequence, the Canada Pension Plan would develop a large reserve fund and the provinces in the plan would control 50 per cent of the investment of the fund.

Those are the proposals contained in the bill of March 17.

In a letter of February 25, 1964, the Prime Minister of Canada stated that the federal government would be willing to consider what rules on funding could be spelled out and he was willing to have consultations with provincial officials on methods of integrating private plans.

That is Bill C-75. Perhaps I should go next to the plan unveiled by the Prime Minister of Ontario at Quebec City at the conference there. What he provided for originally—

Mr. Singer: Is this Ontario or Quebec?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I am sorry—the Prime Minister of Quebec. He unveiled this at the conference in Quebec City. He provided for compulsory coverage of all workers including the self-employed, except those under federal jurisdiction. Contributions were to be based on earnings between $1,000 and $6,000 and those earning under $1,000 per year would not pay any premium. In other words, if you were earning less than $1,000 a year, you were included in the plan and you benefited from it but you did not pay in.

The pension would be paid on all earnings up to $6,000 so that those with average earnings under $1,000 would make no contributions but would receive a pension. The contribution range was to be four per cent—two per cent from the employer and two per cent from the employee of pay above $1,000 and up to $6,000. This would give an equivalent of 2.9 per cent of total pay for a person with an average pay of $3,600. Pensions under this scheme would be available at 65, subject to retirement tests—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, the interest in pensions cannot compete against that.

Because of the graduated payments in the Quebec scheme and no need for payment under $1,000, the pension would be the equivalent, if you took the middle position, of 2.9 per cent of total pay for a person with average pay of $3,600. The pension under this plan would be available at 65, subject to a retirement test, as I have said, and contributions would stop at that age.

The transition period in this plan, before full pensions would be paid out, would be 20 years. The pension benefit was to be 25 per cent of the average adjusted income over the contribution period and this income would be adjusted by the national consumer price index, but it could not be raised by more than two per cent in any one year.

Mr. Lesage has the ability to deal with dependants constitutionally, which the federal government did not. In his plan was included 37.5 per cent of the husband's pension plus $25 a year payable up to age 70 for a widow but ceasing on remarriage. An orphan's pension would be payable to age 18 or school leaving age and a disability pension would be payable on total disability. A death benefit is provided where there are no dependants entitled to the pension.

That is the proposal of Mr. Lesage. Then the revised Canada Pension Plan announced on April 17 by Mr. Pearson contained the following provisions, and this is where we stand today:

Coverage is to be compulsory for all employees including the self-employed except that no contributions would be required from an employee earning less than $600 per year or from the self-employed earning less than $1,000 per year. The new earnings limit is to be $5,000. Pension payment is to be 25 per cent of average adjusted earnings to a maximum of $104 per month, and then of course the old age security payment of $75 per month is in addition to this. Contribution suggested is 1.8 per cent for both employer and employee on earnings between $600 and $5,000.

The earnings basis will be adjusted according to a wage index, and pensions in course of payment will be adjusted with the cost of living. The transition period in this plan is ten years. In other words, someone who pays in for ten years can receive full benefits. Until that time they will increase at ten per cent per year. Pensions presumably rise by ten per cent each year from the time the plan starts until the full 100 per cent of payment is reached. There is to be a widow's pension and a disability pension but details of these have not been specified. I assume they are being worked out and I suppose really the government of Canada could not spell out these pensions until they are constitutionally able to provide them.

Mr. Sopha: Why is it necessary to amend the constitution?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Because that is the way The British North America Act was originally drawn. Then there was an amendment which is 94-A. I am not here prepared to give you the full particulars of the constitutional problem. It is a relatively simple amendment.

The question of survivor benefits is completely within the jurisdiction of the provinces, and it will—

Mr. Singer: Below the age of 70.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Below the age of 65. That was taken care of. At one stage of the game there was no power in the federal government to deal in pensions at all. There was one amendment but it did not go all the way. I cannot talk about it any more completely than that but I can—

Mr. Bryden: It created concurrent jurisdiction, I believe, and said nothing about survivor benefits.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: It is not a difficult thing if we can get all the provinces to agree, because we have not yet in this country been able to figure out how we can amend our own constitution, much less what we are going to amend.

In any event, the final detail of this plan that I wish to mention here is that the provinces are to get 100 per cent of the investment fund that is created by payments from employers and employees in and out of that province. Any province is free to pass its own legislation and to administer its own plan. That is the situation factually, in these proceedings to date.

I wanted to make a couple of points here that I think should go on the record. As I said before, I am going to quote from an address given by Robert M. Clark at the Canadian pension conference held at the Royal York Hotel on April 23 last. Dr. Clark is a professor from the University of British Columbia and—

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): He was proved to be basically wrong about his approach.

Mr. Bryden: He certainly gave us a wrong steer.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: It all depends on what your basic approach is. In any event, I am going to quote his computations. These are mechanical computations as to what can happen under this plan and I point this out simply from the point of view of information so that it will go on the record.

This plan simply means this, that those people in Canada who are aged 65 when this plan is introduced will receive no benefits from it whatsoever.

This is just a straight fact. The plan, as drawn, will not benefit anyone who is 65 at the time it is introduced.

In 1961 there were 1,391,000 persons aged 65 and over in Canada, so if anyone says to you that we have a great universal plan, factually it is not so. The plan does not cover this age group—

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could address a question to the hon. Prime Minister?

Are these remarks of Dr. Clark's criticisms that the hon. Prime Minister is presently levelling against what is proposed? Does he associate himself with them or is this just sort—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: No. I am setting these things out, Mr. Speaker. What I am attempting to do here tonight is place before the hon. members of this House the facts, nothing more than the facts. There are no conclusions in what I am saying except perhaps some conclusions I mentioned about the events of last September.

Mr. MacDonald: They are the analysis of one of the nationally known critics of the plan.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I took them because it was the easiest place I could find where research had been done and the figures had been dug out. There is no opinion of Dr. Clark's in the fact that this plan does not cover anyone over 65 years of age and in the 1961 census there were 1,391,000 people in Canada who were over 65. There is no opinion involved in that. That is straight fact and I am not attempting to give opinions here tonight. What I am attempting to do is to give the facts of this whole pension—the whole procedure of dealing with this pension and what—

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask, Mr. Speaker, does this analysis bear upon the Lesage-Pearson understanding?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: No, this is simply an analysis of the final plan as I have sketched it out.

Mr. Oliver: But not the latest—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Yes, the latest.

Mr. Singer: The final one, or the final final one.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: The final one from the point of view that it is the last one that I have received.

Mr. Singer: And this is a comment on that?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: This is a comment on that, yes. There may very well be more changes in it and do not think for one minute that I am criticizing anybody for making changes in it because I am not. I think it is a matter of such enormous complexity that to approach it with anything other than an open mind and to examine all these things and see what they mean, would be the height of folly if we did not.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I would criticize no one for making changes in this because through changes we have been able to achieve something that might have been impossible, if certain actions that had been urged upon us were taken some time ago.

This is the type of thing, in my view, of which an analysis should be made. I am not saying this is right or wrong, I am simply saying that these are the facts. If you have two contributors under this present plan who are aged 55 at the inception of the programme, one of whom earns $2,400 a year and the other who earns $5,000 or more, over the ten-year period while the plan matures to full payment of pension, the man earning $2,400 a year will contribute $324, and the man earning $5,000 a year will contribute $750. So the man with the lesser income contributes $324 and the man with the larger income contributes $750.

If you assume that each of these men lives according to his life expectancy after age 65, then the man who will have paid directly $324—this will have been his contribution into the plan over the ten-year period—will receive a graduated pension on top of his old age security of $600 a year for 13.53 years, according to the life insurance tables. This means that he will be paid a total of $8,118.

The man who directly contributed $750 over the ten-year period will receive a graduated pension of $1,248 a year for the same period, or in total, estimating his life expectancy according to the table, he would receive $16,885.

You can see that with a ten-year maturity, the man who earns the most pays in the most and takes out the most, and the man who earns a lesser amount, pays in a lesser amount and takes out a lesser amount, but he needs the pension the most. This is—

Mr. Singer: How else can you start unless you wait the 40 years as was originally suggested, and nobody gets anything until the year 2005?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: You can do it in 40 years, you can do it in 20 years, you can do it in 15 years or you can do it in ten years. All I am trying to do is point out that you will get a degree of equity, regardless of how you do it. But is it not wise that the people who are going to live and pay for this, should know this? That is my point. I am not saying that this is wrong. Perhaps socially, it is the right thing to do. Let us be knowledgeable about what we are doing. That is my only point.

Mr. Bryden: I would like to ask the hon. Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, if this comment or criticism, whatever it may be, that is now being attributed to Dr. Clark is not exactly the same criticism that the hon. Prime Minister himself was making in his words and on his own responsibility a couple of months ago. If it is, has he moved away from it personally but still thinks it is a good one for Dr. Clark, or how does he explain the present method of presentation?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I will go through my own position in this matter in a moment. I keep reiterating it and probably I shall be criticized in any event for having said it, but I am simply trying to point the facts out. I am making no comment on them. I am not saying they are right or wrong. All I am saying is that this is what will happen, and those to whom it is going to happen should know.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Dovercourt): May I ask the hon. Prime Minister: Are we listening to statements of opinion or statements of facts by others? Are we going to hear a statement of opinion or a statement of fact or are we going to hear how the hon. Prime Minister of Ontario stands on this plan?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Just be patient, I will get to it.

I would like to remark upon some of the comments that I have made and the positions I have taken in this matter, and this is what the hon. member is waiting for.

Mr. Sopha: No, pick up the one that is yours.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: The one what?

Mr. Sopha: The one that is yours.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, I am going to quote from some statements that I have made over the past year or so. This is a statement I made in Ottawa on July 26. I said:

The Canada Pension Plan has undeniable attractions. It provides a quick and generous payment and I am sure will have appeal and will meet many pressing needs. However, where irrevocable and irreversible decisions are made which will affect our people for generations, frank and full discussion with adequate time for examination of the subject is not only desirable but imperative.

This statement was made at that conference on July 26, and I believe that was made before there had been any comment as to what I should do or should not do. I am only pointing out that my position has been the same since the beginning.

I continue to quote:

And I cannot emphasize too strongly that pension legislation is for all practical purposes perpetual and irreversible. Once instituted, it is not likely to be rescinded and therefore we should approach these questions with great care, not only to ensure that the benefits are in accordance with needs, but also to ensure that the financial impact and burdens are kept within manageable dimensions.

We live in a highly competitive world and our progress and future prosperity depends on how sensibly and soundly we plan and legislate today. The pension plan, like other vital measures, must be examined and considered fully and dispassionately. I do not think it would be unreasonable for us to expect full and ample opportunity to be given for discussion and examination of these important questions.

I have outlined a number of important changes which have taken place since then, so in retrospect it does not appear that this request was too unreasonable.

On August 2, 1963, I was quoted thus:

While Ontario has reservations as to the overall effect of the new federal contributory scheme as proposed by the Ottawa government, Mr. Robarts said Ontario is not raising any constitutional questions, and is fully in accord with the announced intention of advancing monthly payments of $75 to those who qualify. Mr. Robarts stated his willingness to attempt every means possible to bring about a suitable arrangement whereby the portability principle for those who are committed to payment under private pension schemes will be recognized.

Then on September 9, 1963, in Ottawa, I said as follows:

At the outset may I make it crystal clear that Ontario will co-operate with the federal government to the fullest extent in initiating and implementing a sound and equitable pension plan for the people of Canada. We are prepared to join with our sister provinces and the federal government in working out such an agreed plan.

It is well understood that any province has the power to initiate and operate a pension plan, even one such as proposed by the federal government, but we recognize that a pension plan that is nationwide has advantages.

Mr. Sopha: That is when the hon. Prime Minister dashed into the meeting and dashed out.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: The hon. member is quite right.

Extensive studies leading to the enactment of The Ontario Pension Benefits Act, 1962-63, have always emphasized the desirability of a plan national in scope.

So if I wanted to document it fully, I could go back to where this has been said time after time over a period of years.

The federal government can count on the fullest support from Ontario in working out such a plan. I do not come to this conference to magnify difficulties but rather to find ways and means to give to our people the very best contributory plan which can be devised. I have already indicated—

Mr. MacDonald: It was a good political statement in the middle of the election campaign.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I am prepared to make the same statement here. I am reading it into the record tonight, so it could not have been made for purely political purposes.

I have already indicated that I would approve in principle a pension system operated by the federal government. I am prepared to recommend the amendment of the Ontario plan to conform with such an agreed national system, subject to the protection of Ontario workers from double imposts. In other words, there should be ample time and provision for integrating the new plan with existing employee-employer pension plans and contracts.

I think we all recognize that this must be done.

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary): The hon. member for Sudbury nods his head in approval.

Mr. Singer: Did the hon. Prime Minister say that before he said he would not talk to Judy, or after?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I cannot recall. I forgot about that as quickly as possible. That whole incident is in the past as far as I am concerned.

November 2, 1963—this is after the election—I was quoted:

Once again Mr. Robarts, in an interview at Queen's Park Thursday, repeated his belief that a national pension plan has advantages over a provincial scheme and stated that the federal government could count on the fullest support from Ontario in working out a national plan.

On November 23 in Toronto:

We support any action by the federal government to develop a pension system best suited to our needs. First, we are prepared to amend our Act to conform to such a system because I believe that with flexibility, goodwill and a respect for facts on both sides, differences between the Ontario and federal approaches to pensions will be overcome.

I could go on but I think perhaps I do not need to.

The next point I want to make—

An hon. member: Hit them again, they are still breathing.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I really did not expect a much wider approach to this problem than that. None are so blind as those who will not see, Mr. Speaker.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Singer: What is the hon. Prime Minister's position?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I think from all these quotes, you can see what we were seeking. We were seeking the best plan possible. We have not the full details. The hon. member for Downsview has already admitted it in this debate and almost said, "Don't bother saying this tonight because you really have not got the final details." But I am just trying to give him the details as far as we have gone, and of course we have not the complete details. We did not have the complete details last September when I was being asked to accept the plan regardless of the amount of detail there was.

I made a statement here in the House in April after Mr. Pearson made his statement and I am not going to put that back into the record—

Mr. Bryden: It was not quite as conciliatory.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I am not being conciliatory, I am just telling the hon. member what I said. Everything I have said here I have said before.

I think that we are approaching some of the objectives that I have had over this period of time. First of all I think we are developing a plan, with the changes that have been made and have been influenced by all these events, and this plan is developing into a better plan than previously. Certainly we have achieved what has been my ultimate objective. It is rooted back in the bill that we were considering before this debate started under the aegis of which this debate is taking place, and that is national portability.

Mr. Singer: There is little similarity in the bill.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: We in Ontario are unable to legislate for all of Canada. When we started there was no portable legislation anywhere in North America. We started where we could. Even when we started there, we said time after time that a national plan was better than what we were doing, but we were unable to create a national plan.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: I am going to ask the members to address their questions to the Chair. I have been lenient for the past half hour in permitting the members to speak back and forth across the floor. I think perhaps we could have more order in the debate if the members who have questions to be addressed to the Prime Minister while he is making his statement would ask the Chair if he was prepared to answer a question.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Now, what I would like to do, Mr. Speaker, is just to state some of the problems that we are faced with in this province. I said that I would accept a national plan. I think we are getting to that point. I have indicated to the federal government and I have indicated in this House that we are very pleased with this legislation as it is coming out. We have not yet seen it, and I am not rushing the federal government to produce it. I understand what they have to do, I understand the constitutional difficulties, and I would like eventually to see a piece of legislation similar to Bill C-75 to which I have referred, and the particulars of which will be spelled out and we will be able to study and assess in minute detail.

I think the problem that faces the province—and I think this is obvious from the discussions over the past few weeks—is really whether we want to avail ourselves of the provision that it appears will be in the bill, and that is to pass legislation and operate the scheme ourselves. Now mind you, in the operation of a pension plan, this will not make any difference in the actual day-to-day operating or functioning of the plan whether it is done by the federal government or the provincial government. There are questions of administration, of course, and these are very great, and they are being very closely investigated now as to which is the most efficient way of doing it.

There are, too, the questions that arise as to the security of the plan. If we have our plan in the province of Ontario then, of course, we have control over it and if there are to be changes made—and I have made this point many times before—if there are changes to be made in a national plan, we, as a province, will have to be consulted. I see some virtues in this as far as our own people in the province are concerned, because this government is very closely controlled by the people of Ontario and if we have to decide in this Legislature what changes are going to be made in the plan certainly the people of this province will have a good deal to say about it.

This might be achieved in other ways. There are other areas of approach that we could take. For instance, it could be done by the federal government administering the plan in Ontario on some form of contract basis, just as they now collect certain taxes for us. This is a possibility which in my view would bear a lot of exploration. This would leave us with control here but then it would leave one collecting organization on a national basis—with the exception of the province of Quebec. This might be a good move from the point of view of ease of administration and efficient administration and at the same time would reserve to us the control which I think we must seek in the interests of our own people.

There is another problem, and at the present moment there is research going on and we will come forward with proposals in this area, but now I am putting forward to you some of the things that I think we have to consider. There is the question of the investment fund that will be created; how is it to be dealt with by this province? The federal government has indicated that if they administer the plan and put it into effect, and if it is their plan, they will still put this money back into the province. This is a matter that will require a great deal of very close investigation and the position of this fund vis-à-vis the overall economic position of the province, how it is to be used, by whom, how it is to be divorced from politics—there are a whole host of questions in connection with that fund that I cannot answer here tonight and which the government is having investigated so that we will have an intelligent position to put before the people of the province in due course.

The other very large problem which faces anybody who administers it—and it has no bearing as to whether the federal government or the provincial government does it—is the question of the integration of private pension plans with this plan, regardless of who has the responsibility for administering it. One might ask why integration is necessary.

Well, in the first place, both employers and employees will probably object to paying into a private plan and a government plan. As I mentioned earlier, we have to look at the effect of integration from the point of view of what, for some people, is going to be the total of these three pensions they will receive—a federal pension, an old age security payment plus a pension from a private plan. It does not appear to be fair that one would just simply deduct from a private plan the amounts that would be payable under a national plan, because this would mean that the employee would receive no benefits from this piece of social legislation. In other words, he has looked after himself to X so far, and the state comes along and gives him an opportunity to advance that X by another area; why should he lose that benefit?

These are some of the problems that I see. The other very large problem is the enormous variety of pension plans we have in this province. It may be necessary to devise a great many different means of integrating these plans, sir, because if there is a variety of plans, then what will serve as a satisfactory level of integration for one plan might very well not serve as a level of integration in another plan.

So that is where we stand at the present time and I hope that the hon. members will be able to work out where we stand, from these few remarks, and see where we do not stand as well, and see the areas in which we have not yet the answers—in which the answers have not been forthcoming. They will be forthcoming in due course. I think we have made great progress since last September. I am not concerned with the speed with which we have moved, I think we have accomplished a great deal and I think there is more still to accomplish. That is where we stand today.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few brief remarks on this subject. I do not intend to go into as much detail as the hon. Prime Minister but I should like to start with a categorical statement which I think will be accepted for the intrinsic validity that it has among all Canadians, except perhaps those who sit opposite and to the left and who support those who sit opposite.

If we are to have a national pension plan in this country it will be as a result of the tremendous act of national statesmanship of the Prime Minister of Canada, the Rt. hon. Lester B. Pearson.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sopha: The second categorical statement I will make, Mr. Speaker, is that some day somebody will write a book and the model will be The Education of Henry Adams, a very famous classic. They will call it "The Education of John Parmenter Roberts." Because out of this pension business, I am sure his education went on at a great pace and more expeditiously than he could ever have hoped.

From the outset in this whole pension business, the hon. Prime Minister of this province seemed to deal with detail and trivia. I should not say trivia, but he seemed to be obsessed with detail. As I said before, I drew the contrast between him and the Prime Minister of Quebec, in relation to the municipal loan fund and I said in respect of that, that one could see the difference between the approach to a national issue as a matter of principle and as a matter of detail. In the municipal loan fund, the Premier of Quebec always took the position that "I will have no part of your municipal loan fund in Quebec, because municipalities are a creature of the province and the federal government may not come in and interfere with those things that are a matter of exclusive jurisdiction with us." The hon. Prime Minister of this province took the position—although I never can get it straight which it was—that they favoured small municipalities at the expense of big ones, or big ones at the—

Hon. Mr. Roberts: We take the position we would not accept it because it would not work in Ontario.

Mr. Sopha: Yes. Always the matter of details. The reason, of course, that Quebec was always willing to be left out and I do not put words in Mr. Pearson's mouth when I express these thoughts. I do not speak for him, but I put it forward as an educated guess that the reason that Quebec was always willing to be left out by the federal government was that large amounts of capital for investment for the development of that province were not available in the way they are in Ontario.

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): Why? Tell us why!

Mr. Sopha: Well, let us not go into the question of why. They are not.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Oh, yes. Tell us!

Mr. Sopha: They are not.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: The hon. member is not going—

Mr. Sopha: That has no bearing. The large amounts of capital were not available and the federal government was always willing to leave Quebec out to operate its own pension scheme on a properly operated basis, and to use the capital that it would accumulate through the operation of a pension scheme without joining in a national scheme.

Mr. Bryden: The hon. member knows as well as we do that was not the reason.

Mr. Sopha: Oh, yes. The same considerations never applied to Ontario.

Now, the next thing of importance to realize is that the hon. Prime Minister of this province seemed to be obsessed with the idea of what is going to happen to the existing plans. That seemed to obsess him. It seemed to be a fetish with him. He seemed to be committed to a scheme run by private insurance companies.

We do not need to repeat objections we made a year ago about the bill that was tendered before this House and how long it would take for the full benefits to accrue to the people of this province, or the fact that under that bill only half the people of the province would be covered. All of those are matters of history now. I am not going into the history.

However, finally, at the end of March, the hon. Prime Minister marched his small army, his satraps, down to Quebec. Now I want to make this point, Mr. Speaker, that nowadays, in the constitutional relationship in this country, it seems that we have ten Balkan states, and when we have a meeting with the central government, then the ten provincial Premiers assemble their small army and they descend on the place where the meeting is going to be held and they act as if they are sovereigns of independent countries.

They get down there and the first thing we read—and I followed these things very closely—the first thing we read was that Ontario's Prime Minister exhibited some petulance. He was petulant. If Quebec can be left out, then so can we; we can stay out.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sopha: I will take my bat and ball home and I will not play. That was the first thing.

Mr. E. A. Dunlop (Forest Hill): Will the hon. member promise?

Mr. Sopha: Then the next thing we notice, Mr. Lesage unfolded his scheme and the hon. Prime Minister of this province had a look at it and he said, "My, that is wonderful; that is just what we need in Ontario, that is better than anything I have seen since; I think I will take that one home."

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Tell me, just quote where I ever said that.

Mr. Sopha: Pardon?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Quote where I ever said, my, that is wonderful, that is just what we need in Ontario.

Mr. Sopha: I am not quoting, I am paraphrasing.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sopha: It is a fair summary of what the hon. Prime Minister said.

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture): The hon. member is making it up.

Mr. Sopha: No, he became enamoured of Mr. Lesage's scheme and he said "I will take that back and we will have a look at that and maybe we will have that in Ontario."

The point was, when he arrived back in Ontario he was in a bad position, because Quebec was going to be left out—and for reasons that Canadians from coast to coast could fully accept and understand, because of the special characteristics of the Quebec economy, the special pressures that exist on Mr. Lesage which do not exist on the hon. Prime Minister of this province—and he was in a bad way. Then, to sum it all up, and here was the coup de grace, he sat around in the orchard long enough and finally the apple fell into his mouth and now we are going to have a national pension plan.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: May I just make one comment with reference to what my hon. friend said? I would never in any way attempt to take any of the credit from Mr. Pearson for what has been done in the course of these negotiations. I do not think that anything in my remarks would indicate that I did in any way. I do not think he is necessarily seeking great kudos, and I certainly do not think I am, and I would not want to have any remark of mine taken as deprecating anything the Prime Minister of Canada has done on the national scene.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, the hon. Prime Minister this evening provided us with what I would call a complete and unabridged history of the great pension negotiations, leaving out only those portions that the hon. Prime Minister would like to forget. His position was not quite as noble and virtuous, nor as consistent, as he led us to believe. His statement, I may say, was not quite as non-political as he attempted to suggest.

The difficulty that I saw in these negotiations and in the development of this matter, Mr. Speaker, was that on more than one occasion, the whole concept of a Canada Pension Plan, almost foundered. In my opinion the blame, at least in part, rested on the hon. Prime Minister of this province for his failure to take a clear-cut, forthright stand. His position pretty well through the piece, until now—and I think everybody is agreed we are going to go ahead with some form of national plan—his position could very well have been summed up in a paraphrase of a statement once made by another political leader in Canada with whom the hon. gentleman opposite has much in common. I would say that the hon. Prime Minister's position for months was: a Canada Pension Plan if necessary, but not necessarily a Canada Pension Plan. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, that was not the kind of leadership we needed in the situation.

True, as the hon. Prime Minister said, he made many general statements about being prepared to co-operate with Ottawa, but at the same time he was always cavilling about some detail, as my hon. friend from Sudbury pointed out. He was very concerned about the cost; he was very concerned that the rates might become impossible 50 years hence; he was very concerned about people who would not be contributing and therefore would not be getting benefit; he was very concerned that some people would get more benefit than their contributions merited. Always, he was cavilling about some detail of the plan.

Our position from the beginning, from the day that the federal government announced it was interested in this matter, was simply this. We did not suggest that the hon. Prime Minister should accept a plan sight unseen; all we asked him to do, and I think he should have done it, was to state, clearly and unequivocally, that he was in favour of the principle of a national pension plan, he wanted it and he would sit down right then and there and negotiate the details with Ottawa, instead of always objecting to some detail.

There was a period last fall, prior to Christmas and a little beyond, when the insurance companies were really putting the heat on the federal government to wreck the whole concept. To be honest about it, at that period it was hard to know where the hon. Prime Minister of this province stood. I think he would have helped to stiffen the backbone of the federal government which was wobbling badly at the time, if he had come out point blank and said, "The insurance companies might as well pack up, they are out of the picture, we now have the way to the real solution of this problem, which is a Canada Pension Plan." But no, he was quibbling. He was using the same sort of criticisms as they were—

Mr. Dunlop: Will the hon. member answer a question?

Mr. Speaker: Will the member answer a question?

Mr. Bryden: Certainly, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Dunlop: Mr. Speaker, I would be interested in the hon. member's view on this point. What might have happened to the state of our union had Ontario unequivocally accepted a plan which is unequivocally unacceptable to Quebec?

Mr. Bryden: Well, I think the question is based on about three false premises, Mr. Speaker, and it would take a little too long to try to straighten out the premises. However, I will try to answer it at least as far as I think the basic intent is concerned. I believe that this province should persistently take a position of co-operation with the federal government, should take it clearly and unequivocally and I say this now in a non-political sense. I do not care what government is in office here, I do not care what government is in office in Ottawa; I think we have a responsibility of leadership in the Canadian Confederation. At the same time I think we should accept the fact that there is a totally different situation in the province of Quebec from that which exists in this province and that it is not our job to comment on their position.

However, let me get back to the pension plan—

Mr. Dunlop: He did not answer the question.

Mr. Bryden: There was no question. The question was an argument, and it was a very weak one.

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): You were weaseling.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Bryden: The hon. Minister of Health, I know, is a great authority on weaseling but he should not attribute to others his own qualifications.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: We could not help it after watching you.

An hon. member: He is trying to ruffle your feathers now.

Mr. Bryden: In addition, Mr. Speaker, I think that the federal plan has certain undesirable features in it to an important degree because of the influence of the hon. Prime Minister of this province.

Several hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacDonald: What are you protesting about? You should listen. You may hear something.

Mr. Bryden: The hon. Prime Minister has been objecting persistently. I regretted to hear him state the same objection tonight, although in the mouth of another man, to the fairly rapid maturity of the plan, the effect of which is to give benefits out of proportion to their contributions to some of the older people, the people in the 55 to 65 age group. He was quite positively, and I would say almost vehemently, opposed to that feature in a statement he issued a month or two ago.

He now is retreating behind the words of Dr. Clark, but I hope he is not going to pursue that objection to the plan. I think it is a heartless attitude to take. I described it before as a calculating-machine attitude and that is what it is. I believe that the older age groups should get it. The people who did not have the chance over the years to contribute to the plan should get benefits out of proportion to their contributions, somewhat higher than in proportion to their contributions, and I hope that the hon. Prime Minister will drop that objection. I thought he had dropped it but now we have it coming in the back door again, and I am a little alarmed.

My basic criticism of the position he took was his insistence through the piece that the plan be funded. In fact, originally, I think, his position, as far as one could gather from his rather unclear statements, was that he wanted the whole thing funded.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I never took that position.

Mr. Bryden: Well, at any rate he was objecting to the lack of funding in the federal plan.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I really was objecting to the lack of any investigation into what the lack of funding would mean to the economy. That really was my objection.

Mr. Bryden: Well, we can see now—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: It was never indicated to me that any study had been made of it and we were not furnished with any information as to what it would mean.

Mr. Bryden: At any rate we now can see what his position has produced. It has meant that the contributions that people have to make are much larger than they would have been in relation to the benefits they are going to receive. Let us bear in mind that these contributions are regressive. They are proportionate up to a certain income level, but at that level there is a ceiling. They bear most heavily on the lower income groups. As a result, I suggest, of the position taken by the hon. Prime Minister of our province, there is now going to be a substantial volume of investment funds accumulated under this plan and these investment funds are going to come primarily out of the pockets of the lower income groups, the very people who can least afford to put them up.

He also argued at great length with Ottawa as to whether or not 50 per cent of the investment funds or 90 per cent of the investment funds would come back to Ontario; as it turned out he is now getting 100 per cent as a result of the intervention of Premier Lesage. So what is happening? We are putting a tax on the little man to provide investment funds for this province. That is what is happening.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, where would it go otherwise?

An hon. member: The federal government.

Mr. Bryden: Why are the investment funds not raised from the people who have the money rather than from the little guy who has nothing?

Mr. G. H. Peck (Scarborough Centre): We are all little guys.

Mr. Bryden: The man with an income of under $4,800—he is the man who proportionately will pay the most.

Mr. Dunlop: Would the hon. member allow another question?

Mr. Bryden: By all means.

Mr. Dunlop: Did the original Canada Pension Plan bear any less hard on the little man than what we understand to be the new plan? The original plan bore on those with maximum earnings of $4,500, but we understand that the present plan is $6,000. Now I would like the hon. member to explain how that change which bears more on people of higher incomes has been in any way a regressive step?

Mr. Bryden: It certainly has been. In relation to what he gets, the little fellow is paying a higher percentage than he would otherwise have paid. Already one per cent has been tacked on to his income tax up to a limit of taxable income of $3,000 for the increase in the old age security. He is still going to pay approximately the same contributions to the pension plan without any increase in benefits. As a result there is going to be a fund available which this province is going to use for investment purposes. I do not deny that we have a great need for investment funds, I just do not think we should get them by enforcing saving upon people who cannot afford to save. This, I submit, is a—

Mr. Dunlop: That one per cent was tacked on by the government of Canada to increase the $65 to $75 as a result of Quebec going out of the scheme. I wish the hon. member would master some facts.

Mr. Bryden: I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that if the hon. gentleman wants to make a speech there are all sorts of opportunities for him to do it. But if he makes a speech perhaps he should master some facts. The facts of the matter are that the contributions in effect now have been increased and it was Ontario that was forever pushing for some funding. I admit that the Quebec approach from the beginning has been for even more funding. I am not letting them out of the picture, but Ontario was pushing for more funding and as a result, the little guy is being compelled to save money that is going to have to come out of his food allowance or housing allowance in order to provide investment funds, when in my opinion there are better ways of providing investment funds.

Mr. Peck: What does the hon. member suggest?

Mr. Bryden: We have been raising substantial amounts of investment funds in this province already. Let the people who have money to invest, invest it. Do not force the little fellow who has not got money to invest it.

Mr. Peck: We are all the little fellows.

Mr. Bryden: I know for a fact that anybody in this House is earning more than—or is being paid, I will not say earning—more than $4,800 a year. That I know for a fact, so we are not all little fellows in that sense.

However, Mr. Speaker, I suppose it is not necessary to thresh over old straw. I regard one or two of these most recent developments as regrettable. I do, however, regard the overall development as welcome. I think it is most desirable, as I have said all the time, that we should have a Canada Pension Plan.

I hope now that the hurdles have been cleared and even though there are details to be worked out, we are going to have, in fact, a Canada Pension Plan even if it is defective in detail. Once we have the principle established we can always work on improving the details at a later date.

Mr. Speaker, I will give credit to the hon. Prime Minister for this. I give credit to him for a great many things, but there is one thing in particular that I would like to single out. I would give credit to him for having seen the light at last, and having abandoned entirely his concept that we can handle social security in the pension field through private insurance companies, and for having accepted, and I think without reservation, the principle that social insurance of this kind can only be done adequately through a public universal plan. I think that is what the hon. member for Sudbury referred to as the "Education of John Parmenter Roberts."

I think that when a man is willing to change his mind it is a credit to him. It took quite a lot of pushing but he did change his mind. He has seen the folly of his position of a year or two ago.

I would like to leave one last thought with the hon. Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. Now that he has seen the folly of the proposition that old age security can be adequately provided for through private plans, I would like to suggest to him that he might also consider the same principle in relation to Medicare and car insurance. He should complete his education by admitting that the only real way to handle either Medicare or car insurance is also through a public plan.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, I do not pretend to know a lot about the pension plan, but I am one of those kind of people who believe, and some of the things that we have heard here tonight have been most misleading as far as pensions and the benefits of the pension plan are concerned.

We have heard a lot of things said about the fact that the hon. Prime Minister has been misguided, that he has been led down the garden path. I would like to say this, Mr. Speaker, that the advantage of portable pensions in the province of Ontario is attributable to one man only and that is to the hon. Prime Minister of Ontario today.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, if there is a group of people in this House who are supposed to be interested in the welfare of the workers of the province, it is the famous group of seven across the way and who are they complaining about? The man who is responsible for portable pensions in Ontario and now in all of Canada, because of his actions, is the hon. Prime Minister of our province today.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. Stewart: We have heard a lot of editorials read. We have heard a lot of quotes from newspapers here and there. I would like to read a quote from Thomas Green that appeared in the Winnipeg Tribune, and it reads as follows:

WHAT OTHERS SAY: "ROBARTS DID IT"

The real hero of the pension drama, if there was one, was Premier John Roberts of Ontario. If Canadians in all provinces are paid uniform pensions in the years ahead, they may thank the quiet-spoken earnest man who now occupies the corner office on the second floor in Queen's Park.

He is the one chiefly responsible—

Mr. Sopha: Is that from the Dalton Camp agency?

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: My hon. friends do not like to hear the truth. This is what they do not want to hear. I continue:

He is the one chiefly responsible, not Prime Minister Pearson or Premier Jean Lesage of Quebec. Roberts was the key piece in the pension jigsaw. If he had succumbed to the Ottawa pressure during the Ontario election campaign and had accepted the LaMarsh version of the Canada Pension Plan, at least two different schemes would have come into force, one in Quebec and another in the rest of Canada.

If he had buckled under to federal pressures after the Dominion-provincial conference last November when he was being accused of scuttling the plan for national pensions, the same thing would have happened. Ottawa could have gone ahead with its scheme without Jean Lesage but it could not proceed without Jean Lesage and John Robarts, in spite of the brave boast to the contrary that came from the federal government. Robarts' firmness was therefore a major factor in causing Mr. Pearson to negotiate with Quebec.

This, Mr. Speaker, is an article which did not appear in the press in Ontario. This appeared in the Winnipeg Tribune, and I suggest, Mr. Speaker, when all of the things are said about the pension plan we will look to the hon. Prime Minister of Ontario as being the real author of pensions in Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I had no intention to enter this debate and I shall not enter it for any great length of time, but I just want to draw your attention to the fact that a few moments ago the hon. Prime Minister said, "I am not detracting one iota from what the Prime Minister of Canada has achieved." Then one of his minions from the front bench gets up and says, "The real man who did it was John Robarts, everybody else is out."

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald: I will give you a very short and unabridged version of what happened in pensions, in my view, in this country, Mr. Speaker. The hon. Prime Minister and the insurance companies pushed—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, a year ago this government was in favour of private pension plans through the insurance companies—essentially the insurance companies' position. The pressure of the insurance lobby at Ottawa and the pressure of the stand of the government here in the province of Ontario beat those weaklings at Ottawa down from the original promise of $167 a month—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. members just make a noise and do not even follow what is being said. What I am saying, and perhaps they will listen and agree with me this time, is that the insurance companies beat the Liberals at Ottawa down from their original offer after the 1962 campaign—when it was made by Paul Martin—of $167 a month or $2,000 a year, to Judy's version a year ago of $100, and then down to $75 in the bill. We were in danger in this country of having no pension. The insurance companies were driving us right down into the ground.

If you have to give anybody any credit for rescuing the situation, it was a group of people in Quebec City who suddenly unveiled the Lesage plan. It was so far ahead of what the Ontario government was offering and what Ottawa was offering, that they had to come back with a more adequate proposal. This is what rescued a pension plan for us—one that is at least tolerably acceptable.

I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, to the tub-thumping Minister of Agriculture that he might follow the tactical advice of his own Prime Minister and not try to detract from other people and stop in a political fashion, trying to claim the kudos for his own leader. His own leader waffled all over the lot and stood with the insurance companies in beating Ottawa down for a whole year until this nation was faced with a crisis in which we were disintegrating. We were disintegrating when Quebec was pulling out. Suddenly the hon. Prime Minister of the province of Ontario said, "Well, I will pull out." And where was Canada, Mr. Speaker? Canada was disintegrating.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order! I advised the members before that I wanted a little bit of order in this debate. For a while I thought I was getting that order. In the last few minutes I have not been getting that order and I am going to appeal to the members once again to try not to be so heated in their arguments and come back to a reasonable debate on pensions. I am also going to warn the members that are doing the shouting that I am going to insist that they not shout across the floor at any other member who has the floor. If you ask a question, you ask the Chair. Now I am going to insist upon that rule, and I am going to ask you to debate.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, I thank you, Mr. Speaker, I had finished. I appreciate your comments that it was sad we departed from a reasoned approach to it. I trust you looked square into the eye of the hon. Minister of Agriculture, because it was he who got us off onto the unreasoned approach. I must say I was finished and I am glad that the dulcet tones of your firm control of the House can be taken as the footnote to my remarks.

Mr. A. H. Cowling (High Park): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a word on pensions.

Mr. MacDonald: Here are the insurance companies back in the picture.

Mr. Cowling: That is a fact, Mr. Speaker. I think it is about time something was said about the private insurers and the great job they are doing for the people of the province. Now, it is all very well to say we need a pension plan, we want a pension plan for everybody; but have we forgotten, Mr. Speaker, the thousands and thousands of people in our province who have provided their own pension plans—

Mr. R. M. Whicher (Bruce): Including ourselves!

Mr. Cowling: —through private insurers and others, and they are well satisfied with them. Now, it is fine to say let us get the government into the pension business. Let us get the government into medical care insurance. Let us get the government into the automobile insurance. What are we going to do for ourselves? How far are we going to go with socialized insurance in government? I get sick and tired of it, especially from the hon. member opposite.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. Cowling: Now, I agree with everything the hon. Prime Minister has said. I say again, if it was not for the hon. Prime Minister of Ontario we would not have a national plan of any kind.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. Cowling: We are devoting a lot of time and energy to getting pensions for everybody. Let us not overlook all these people who have provided a plan for themselves. The thing I am interested in is the integration into a national plan of the existing plans.

I have one. You have them. We are interested, we are concerned about what is going to happen to them. The Canadian government has been in the pension business for many years. They sell the Canadian government annuity.

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. member has been opposed to those, too.

Mr. Cowling: I have not. I have one. It is the best $100 worth of pension anybody can buy in Canada.

Mr. Whicher: But it is not enough.

Mr. Cowling: I know it is not enough, it is a beginning, though. It is only $100. But the point I want to make is this, Mr. Speaker, one of the recommendations of the Glassco committee which studied economies in Ottawa was that the government should get out of the annuity business. The reason they should get out of it was because it was costing the taxpayers of Canada millions of dollars every year to supplement the owners of Canadian government annuities. That is why I bought one, because I am helping to pay for it. What does the hon. member think of that?

Mr. MacDonald: If the hon. member is benefiting from it, I am regretful.

Mr. Cowling: I thought the hon. member would be, but I wanted him to know that he is helping my plan, so I thank him very much.

The private people, the insurance companies and trust companies and others who are selling pension plans in Ontario, will supplement any plan that is brought in by this government or on the national basis, but, Mr. Speaker, I just want to say again, let us not be overcome by all this talk of providing pensions for everybody and at the same time overlook the thousands and thousands of citizens of our province who have provided their own pension plan and will continue to do so regardless of what type of plan we bring in in co-operation with Ottawa. I think it is about time we took a long look at that aspect of pension plans.

Mr. MacDonald: If the hon. member was in control it would be a long long look.

Mr. Cowling: That is right!

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Speaker, could the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests (Mr. Roberts) go to the wiener roast now?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Did the member for Dovercourt wish to speak now?

Mr. Thompson: Yes, I do, Mr. Speaker.

I would say, Mr. Speaker, that I am encouraged to take part. By your ruling, previous to the last hon. speaker, we should now have calm and dignity in the House during the debates. I think I have been encouraged to speak in this debate, sir, by the elucidation of the hon. Prime Minister concerning his stand, and I think I am encouraged to speak by the objective way with which the hon. Minister of Agriculture approached the problem. I think, sir, I am further encouraged to speak on it by the very clear and thoughtful approach, that helped us see just exactly where the government stands, on the part of the hon. member for High Park. If I could say, sir, it was typical of his usual contribution and most constructive, in his usual way, to the understanding just exactly where this government stands on the pension plan.

Mr. Peck: Now, how about the hon. member being constructive?

Mr. Thompson: I would like to say, sir, that I was asked how about being constructive. Really, sir, is not this what we have hoped, not only from the Parliament of Ontario, but the hon. Prime Minister of Ontario? He, after all, when he goes down to Ottawa, is representing the hopes and ambitions of the people of Ontario, indeed the people of Canada. We have listened to him reiterate and reiterate that he made the statement he believes in a national pension plan. But a lot of guts have got to go into developing a national pension plan, and all I can say, in connection with the contribution of the hon. Prime Minister, is that there was a great poet, John Milton, who perhaps wrote the line that best suits the hon. Prime Minister in this whole thing: "They also serve who only stand and wait."

As far as we are concerned on this side, and I think the people of Ontario, we have had some disappointment that Ontario, through its Prime Minister, appeared to raise straw men in connection with difficulties about the plan.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Did the hon. member know his pension plan was two years ahead of the national one?

Mr. Thompson: Did I say, sir, that among some of the straw men he raised, for example, was the problem of integrating existing plans in a broad national plan? I would say, sir, it struck me as peculiar that he would take, for example, Professor Clark, and refer to Professor Clark as being an authority and decide that he would quote him as issuing statements of facts. Therefore, sir, I will just take a remark by Professor Clark in connection with the problem of existing plans and the overall plan. Professor Clark said, with respect to the problem of integrating the existing plans into a national plan, and I suggest that the hon. Prime Minister might quote this, or some of his advisers might: "Really, this was no difficulty and it could be worked out technically."

Is that not of the straw men that the hon. Prime Minister has raised?

I would say, sir, that we had hoped, on this almost final night of the session, that we might now hear from the Prime Minister of Canada what his real objections are, if he has any, to the plan—

An hon. member: A fine man!

Mr. Thompson: I meant the hon. Prime Minister of Ontario; what are the real objections, if he has any? We have not had either a clear approach from him or a constructive approach from him. I wholeheartedly agree with my hon. colleague from Sudbury when he said that the people who have contributed to get this so necessary measure, which will unite our country with benefits and contributions of equal basis across the country, and permit mobility—and we want to stress that—of Canadians from one part of Canada to the other, were the Premier of Quebec and the Rt. hon. Prime Minister of Canada. When these men get up with this almost idolatry that they have toward the figure of a Prime Minister and quote that he was the man, the architect, I suggest to them to give us, in fact, just one constructive contribution that he made to hammering out this plan. He was silent; he ran with the ball, as I said in a previous debate; he ran and he swerved and he dodged and I congratulated him on it. But the point is that in any game at some point one has to get to the line and make a touchdown.

Mr. A. V. Walker (Oshawa): The man with the ball runs the game.

Mr. Thompson: And he ran and he ran and he ran with the ball, and he ran round and round and round in a circle and the people of Ontario in this discussion tonight would have hoped to know where the hon. Prime Minister is running to with the ball and we do not know.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, is it not true that the man with the ball generally runs the game?

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): I have seen plenty that fumbled through.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order, order!

Mr. Dunlop: Mr. Speaker, I have been in this House only a relatively few months but I have found this the most disappointing debate of that short career in the Legislature. What has disappointed me very much is the intentional distortion of facts, or if not, the unintentional distortion which might follow from an ignorance which I hope would not be characteristic of hon. members of the House on the opposite side. I have particular reference to the remarks of the hon. members for Sudbury, for Woodbine, and very recently for Dovercourt. I will not outline the distortions; I think they are intentional because I do not think they are that ill-informed.

Mr. R. Gisborn (Wentworth East): What has this got to do with pensions?

Mr. Dunlop: What disappointed me more were the remarks of the hon. member for York South, for whom I have a high regard—his apparent inability to recognize on the part of the hon. Prime Minister, the magnanimity of his remarks toward the Rt. hon. Prime Minister of Canada.

As to the principle of the bill before us, there was, as we know, a defect which grew in the orderly evolution of private pension plans. This was the lack of sufficient vesting to protect the interests of those who participated when they moved from job to job. Regardless of what the hon. members may say about the origin of The Pension Benefits Act, one of its original and main purposes was to make sure that people in existing pension plans could have an adequate position of vesting, and could move from one job to another without losing their interests. That was one of the original purposes and that purpose is still with us in the bill before us now, and thank God it is.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE PENSION BENEFITS ACT, 1962-1963

House in committee on Bill No. 140, An Act to amend The Pension Benefits Act, 1962-1963.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2:

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Chairman, when I discussed this bill on second reading I indicated my disappointment that the government has still not seen fit in section 14 of the Act to make any provision whereby an employee who is covered by a plan, can inspect the information return which under the Act must be filed by the employer, with the pensions commission. I consider this to be a grave weakness in the Act, which otherwise—as far as its provisions relating to the security of the funds are concerned—is quite satisfactory.

I suggest that an employee who is covered by a pension plan and whose money is going into the pension plan has as much right as the employer or anyone else to know what is happening to his money, how it is being invested, what sort of refunds, if any, are coming to the employer from an insurance company which may be underwriting the plan on behalf of the group. I believe also that a representative of a trade union that represents employees covered by the plan has a right to get that information. There are too many cases where employers are not actually making the contributions that they are claiming to be making. They are getting what amount to kick-backs which are called dividends from insurance companies. Most insurance companies now provide dividends on policies. I would say that if such dividends become available under a private pension plan, they should be to the joint benefit of the employer and the employees in proportion to the contributions that they make to the plan.

But there is no way now of finding out what is going on in most of these plans. There is a great deal of suspicion as to what is probably going on but it is a closely guarded secret and the government is going to permit it to continue to be a closely guarded secret under the legislation that is now before us. The one change in the existing situation will be that an employer must not only file an initial prospectus of his plan but year by year he must file an information return in the prescribed form indicating what has been happening under the plan during the year. This is a very important provision, I am not objecting to the provision. I am just objecting to the failure to put in an additional provision to the effect that a person who has a direct interest in a plan or his union representative should have access to that information.

We raised this point with the government last year. The hon. Prime Minister on the various points we raised last year took the position that "We were still feeling our way and thinking about these things." In effect he said, "Let us try it out for the present and see how it works and if it is found not to be satisfactory, we will change it." Admittedly, the law has not yet come into operation so he has not had any practical experience with it, but he has had a year now to think about it. I think that the proposition that I am putting before him is a reasonable one, and one that he should now be prepared to accept.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I move that subsection 4 of the proposed new section 14 to be enacted by clause 2 of Bill No. 140—when you deal with these amending statutes it is sometimes hard to describe the precise clause you are talking about, and for the information of hon. members I will mention that the clause I am talking about is clause 4 at the bottom of page 2 of the bill—which provides for the filing of information returns and I am moving, Mr. Speaker, that subsection 4 be amended by adding thereto the following:

and any employee covered by the pension plan or any duly authorized representative of a trade union representing employees covered by the pension plan, shall be entitled to inspect such information return and extract information from it during the regular office hours of the commission.

Mr. Chairman: Members have heard the amendment. All those in favour say "aye."

Hon. J. P. Roberts (Prime Minister): Mr. Chairman, I would like to speak against the amendment. There is a provision in section 19 which permits the individual who is covered by a pension plan to get full information from the company concerning his own position in the plan and the whole purpose of this Act is to provide portability of pensions.

It is not a disclosure Act. We are not gathering this information together in this Act for the purpose of disclosing it. We are gathering it together in order that we may satisfy ourselves that these plans are being properly operated for those people who are the beneficiaries of them and the employee is given an opportunity to obtain information as far as his own position is concerned.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Chairman, I want to make a brief comment here. Some six years ago a number of members who are now sitting on the Treasury benches, and I, plus some from the Liberal Party, were in the select committee looking into The Labour Relations Act. We had many representations made to us of difficulties that developed in labour-management relations in collective bargaining because of the fact that the Act was so set up that pensions—even when there was a contribution by the employee—were, in effect, the private concern of management. The investment of the funds, exactly how they were handled, was a secret concern that management could withhold from the union or from the individual worker. We made a recommendation that this should be brought to an end. Now that was just six or seven years ago.

In the fullness of time presumably it will get through to this government.

A year ago we discussed this matter and the hon. Prime Minister pointed out precisely what he pointed out now, that the individual can go to the company and find out what he is entitled to. That is not the point, Mr. Chairman. The point is that a group of individuals who are contributors to a pension plan surely have the right to find out the details with regard to the financial position of their plan and all the other factors with regard to it.

Why should this be the exclusive prerogative of management? Last year the hon. Prime Minister explained this and said he would ponder the other point. He has been pondering it for a year. Mr. Chairman, there is absolutely no doubt now that the conclusion is that the government is determined to have this information withheld from the employees and available only to the company.

In other words, here is a clear-cut, unmistakable pro-management bias. The proposition that people who are investing money in their own pension plan should be denied details as to the handling of that money, is an intolerable one and I find it difficult to believe that the government would have the face to put through an Act like this, after two years of discussion on it. It is just so blatantly prejudiced and biased, sir, that I have difficulty in figuring out how they would have the face to do so.

Therefore, I think there is no alternative but to move this amendment and record the government's position.

Mr. Chairman: All those in favour of the amendment say "aye".

All those opposed to the amendment say "nay."

In my opinion the motion is lost.

Call in the members.

Clerk of the House: Mr. Chairman, the "ayes" are 23, the "nays" 54.

Mr. Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

Sections 2 and 3 agreed to.

On section 4:

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, this section re-enacts with changes made necessary by other amendments embodied in the bill, section 18 of the Act. I think at this stage one can say, in view of what has now been taken out of the Act, that section 18 is the key section of the Act. It is the section that, in effect, guarantees portability. It provides for vesting—and I will accept the hon. Prime Minister's correction—vesting and locking in of contributions to be held and become available to certain employees in the form of deferred annuities. I stated on second reading that, in my opinion, there should be full portability. In other words, contributions should be vested and locked in—I will accept it both ways—from the date an employee becomes a member of a pension plan.

I will not now repeat the arguments I made not long ago on second reading in favour of that proposition. It seems to me that the validity of the proposition is, in any case, self-evident. I rise now only because we have reached the spot in the bill where it would be possible to make a quite simple amendment to alter the watered-down and inadequate portability that the government favours, or has favoured until now, and substitute the principle of full portability.

If hon. members will take a look at clause (a) on page 3 of the bill, clause (a) of subsection 1 of section 18 of the Act as it is being re-enacted, they will see that in its governing clause it provides:

A member of the plan who has attained the age of 45 years and who has been an employee of the employer for a continuous period of ten years in entitled upon termination of his employment prior to his attaining retirement age to a deferred life annuity equal to—and then the conditions are specified in a number of sub-clauses. I suggest that we should now accept the principle of full portability. To do so all we have to do is strike out of clause (a) the words starting with “who” in the first line and all the words following down to “a continuous period of ten years.” Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I move that clause (a) of subsection 1 of the proposed new section 18 to be enacted by clause 4 of Bill No. 140, be amended by striking out the following words in the first, second, third and fourth lines:

Who has attained the age of 45 years and who has been an employee of the employer for a continuous period of ten years.

We will provide full portability if we take that out. It will then read, Mr. Chairman:

A member of the plan is entitled upon termination of his employment prior to his attaining retirement age to a deferred annuity equal to—

of the pension benefits provided in certain specified ways.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I am going to oppose this amendment and I am not going to repeat the arguments I made on second reading. We have debated this, discussed this and I would only ask that these provisions in this Act are better than the provisions that were in the old federal Income Tax Act. My hon. friend is aware of that. He appeared to be in favour of that. These are superior to the provisions that were there, but in any event the basic argument is that we want to get this plan working, with all the complications that it will have, and in the course of time no doubt improvements will be made.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Dovercourt): Mr. Chairman, from our viewpoint, after a consultation with my hon. leader (Mr. Oliver) and my hon. colleagues, in connection with this amendment it would seem to me the principle of the bill itself, I would hope, has something to do with mobility. We feel that the hon. member for Woodbine is emphasizing, as he did this afternoon, the necessity—which I am sure, as he said, the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Rowntree) appreciates—for mobility in our society. In view of the difficulty for a man of 45 in our society to take up another job, and of a number of those points so ably expressed by the hon. member for Woodbine, I would suggest and hope that the government would also agree with us and vote for the amendment.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I think it is a very simple proposition. If you vote against this amendment you are not in favour of portable pensions. That sums it up.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: All those in favour of the amendment please say “aye.”

All those opposed to the amendment please say “nay.”

In my opinion the nays have it.

Call in the members.

Clerk of the House: Mr. Chairman, the ayes are 23, the nays 54.

Mr. Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

Hon W. G. Davis (Minister of Education): Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to section 9. I move that section 9 be struck out and the following substituted:

9. Section 38 of The Teachers' Superannuation Act is amended by striking out "and as apportionable to the date of death" in the second line so that the section shall read as follows: "Every allowance is payable in monthly instalments."

This change in wording further simplifies the administration by referring the payments-in-advance feature until the current review of integrated data processing application permits the adjusting of existing schedules.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): That is a very good amendment.

Section 9, as amended, agreed to.

Bill No. 89, An Act to amend The Schools Administration Act.

Bill No. 90, An Act to amend The Public Schools Act.

Bill No. 98, An Act to amend The Ontario Food Terminal Act.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, there is one brief point I would like to make that has not yet been drawn to the attention of the House in connection with Bill No. 99. There was a great deal of debate and the majority resolved that the holding of in-camera sessions will be at the direction, as it were, of the witness. In other words, in trying to cope with as reluctant and as tough characters as are the leaders of organized crime, we have decided that they will have the right as to whether or not this will be an in-camera session.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, it is my understanding that there could be no debate on third reading of a bill.

Mr. MacDonald: Where did the hon. member get that?

Mr. Speaker: There can be a short debate.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): You can even move amendments.

Mr. MacDonald: Exactly. We have a self-appointed obstructionist here.

The contrast that I wanted to draw to the attention of the House, Mr. Speaker, is that in this same bill we have clauses with regard to how you are going to cope with a policeman when he has been charged and is going to be brought before the police commission and disciplinary action may be taken. In fact, his future livelihood may well be at stake. Yet, Mr. Speaker, I draw to your attention that when that kind of session is held, the policeman has no alternative; it will be an in-camera session. In other words, Mr. Speaker, the policemen of this province, the people on whom we count for law enforcement, have fewer rights than the leaders of organized crime when they are brought before the police commission for investigation. I think this is a rather anomalous situation that I ask the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Wishart) to ponder for the next year when he considers amendments to the Act.

Bill No. 99, An Act to amend The Police Act.

Bill No. 100, An Act to amend The Law Society Act.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

FRIDAY, MAY 8, 1964

The House met at 10.30 o'clock, a.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: We are pleased to welcome to the Legislature today in the east gallery, students from Regent Heights Public School, Scarborough, and in the west gallery, students from St. John the Evangelist Separate School, Weston, and St. Mary's Separate School, Toronto.

Presenting petitions.

Presenting reports by committees.

Motions.

On motion by hon. J. P. Robarts, seconded by hon. J. N. Allan.

ordered, that the select committee on The Municipal Act and related Acts be re-appointed with the same powers and duties as heretofore, its membership being expanded as follows:

Mr. Beckett (chairman), Messrs. Cowling, Evans, Farquhar, Gomme, Gordon, Hodgson (Scarborough East), Olde, Pittcock, Reuter, Singer, Whitney and Young.

On motion by hon. Mr. Robarts, seconded by hon. Mr. Allan, ordered, that the select committee on the cost of credit be reappointed with the same powers and duties as heretofore but with its membership expanded as follows:

Mr. Price (chairman), Messrs. Bukator, Edwards, Hamilton, Kerr, Lawrence (St. George), Letherby, MacDonald, Oliver, Reilly, Rowe, Whicher and White.

On motion by hon. Mr. Robarts, seconded by hon. Mr. Allan, ordered, that a select committee of this House be appointed to conduct a comprehensive inquiry into and report upon the special needs of youth with particular reference to educational, cultural, recreational, and employment opportunities, as well as the health, welfare and sports facilities now available to youth, and the steps to be taken which in the opinion of the committee would ensure a wider participation by youth in the life of the community;

To conduct hearings for the purpose of receiving representations from organizations and individuals engaged in youth activities and to hold meetings to study the experience of others in the youth field; and to engage the necessary staff to provide study papers and research materials;

And, that the select committee shall consist of 14 members and shall have authority to sit during the interval between sessions and have full power and authority to appoint or employ counsel and secretary and such other personnel as may be deemed advisable and to call for persons, papers and things and to examine witnesses under oath, and the assembly doth command and compel attendances before the said select committee of such persons and the production of such papers and things as the committee may deem necessary for any of its proceedings and deliberations, for which purpose the Honourable the Speaker may issue his warrant or warrants;

The membership of the committee to be as follows:

Mr. Apps (chairman), Messrs. Brown, Butler, Ewen, Gaunt, Lewis (Scarborough West), McKeough, McNeil, Morningstar, Newman, Peck, Troy, Welch and Wells.

On motion by hon. Mr. Robarts, seconded by hon. Mr. Allan, ordered, that a select committee of this House be appointed to inquire into and review the problems inherent in the field of aging in Ontario which are of major concern to older citizens and to all of our people, having particular regard to the size, distribution and composition of the older population of the province and the promotion, development and creation of opportunities for self-help to their own satisfaction and advantages as members of society as a whole, including preparation for retirement leisure and the benefit of educational opportunities in later life;

And without limiting the generality of the foregoing, to inquire into and review current policies which have a bearing on aging and the economy, involving employment, income - maintenance, and health measures, services and facilities of organizations, government and otherwise, including government-sponsored programmes on housing, long-term care, and other related services;

To conduct hearings for the purpose of receiving representations from organizations and individuals, particularly from those who work with older people, and to hold meetings to study the experience of others in the field of gerontology;

To engage the necessary staff to provide study papers and research materials;

And to that end, after due consideration, to make such recommendations as the committee deems to be appropriate;

And that the select committee shall consist of 14 members and shall have authority to sit during the interval between sessions and have full power and authority to appoint or employ counsel and secretary and such other personnel as may be deemed advisable and to call for persons, papers and things and to examine witnesses under oath, and the assembly doth command and compel attendances before the said select committee of such persons and the production of such papers and things as the committee may deem necessary for any of its proceedings and deliberations, for which purpose the Honourable the Speaker may issue his warrant or warrants;

The membership of the committee to be as follows:

Mr. Carruthers (chairman), Messrs. Carton, Davison, Dunlop, Knox, Lawrence (Russell), Mrs. Pritchard, Messrs. Racine, Sandercock, Trotter, Villeneuve, Walker, Worton and Yakabuski.

On motion by hon. Mr. Robarts, seconded by hon. Mr. Allan, ordered, that a select committee of this House be appointed to inquire into and report upon methods of stimulating prospecting and mining exploration and development in Ontario and, without limiting the generality of the foregoing, such matters as the services available to the mining industry, regulations governing the financing of mining prospect and developments, the effects of mining taxation on the growth of the industry, health measures in the mining industry, and any other related factors the study of which would bring about renewed interest and activity in that industry and thus strengthen the economic position of the northern communities and Ontario as a whole.

And, that the select committee shall consist of 13 members and shall have authority to sit during the interval between sessions and have full power and authority to appoint or employ counsel and secretary and such other personnel as may be deemed advisable and to call for persons, papers and things and to examine witnesses under oath, and the assembly doth command and compel attendances before the said select committee of such persons and the production of such papers and things as the committee may deem necessary for any of its proceedings and deliberations, for which purpose the Honourable the Speaker may issue his warrant or warrants.

The membership of the committee to be as follows:

Mr. Brunelle (Chairman), Messrs. Bales, Demers, Eagleson, Freeman, Henderson, Hodgson (Victoria), Mackenzie, Noden, Rollins, Sopha, Spence and Taylor.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the hon. Prime Minister and ask whether, in his opinion, the terms of reference are wide enough to include the part played by stock exchanges?

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): I would think so, Mr. Speaker, because I included in the terms of reference the—I do not know the exact term—but I wanted the method of financing to be open to investigation by the committee and I believe it is included in this.

It was my intent that the committee would have power to look at that aspect of the mining industry as well as others. I think, if this is examined, it will be found to be included.

Mr. Sopha: We will have the advantage of referring to the hon. Prime Minister's remarks in Hansard if this problem comes up.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Of course the hon. member will.

Mr. Speaker: Introduction of bills.

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I want to make a statement. I notice hon. members have been given wide privileges so I want to refer to something akin to the committee on youth. Last night in the press it was announced that a very fine young gentleman from Ferris in my riding was named as the outstanding young man in the National Hockey League for a combination of skill and sportsmanship. He is Kenny Wharram.

Kenny, I think, is an outstanding example to the youth of this nation, and also the nation to the south of us, because he is not a big man but he has all that it takes to make a real champion and I can to some extent bask in reflected glory because Kenny was one of those with whom I had some connection on his way to stardom.

There is one more thing. It has to do with our history. On August 4 of this year, we will commemorate the 50th anniversary of the beginning of World War I and many, many people in this great province of Ontario gave their lives in that great war and I think that day, August 4, will be a great memorial day for the people of this nation.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I would like to file answers to questions numbered 15, 17 and 18 on the order paper.

The hon. Prime Minister tabled answers to questions as follows:

15. Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Inquiry of the Ministry—1. Did any Minister of the Crown during the months of August and September 1963, appear in person and turn over, either to representatives of municipal bodies or to executives of private voluntary organizations in the communities of Terrace Bay, Gull Bay, Geraldton, Macdiarmid, Nakina, Longlac, Manitouwadge or Beardmore, in the riding of Port Arthur, any cheques or letters confirming payments from the provincial Treasury? 2. If so, (a) who was the Minister; (b) what were the organizations; and (c) what was the authorization for such practice either in statute or regulation, or in any constitutional reference confirming the practice?

Answer by the hon. Minister of Mines (Mr. Wardrobe):

1. Yes.

2. (a) The hon. G. C. Wardrobe; (b) Treasurer, township of Terrace Bay, for Terrace Bay Swimming Pool and Athletic Field, Indian Council, Gull Bay Indian Reserve, for Community Hall; (c) Under The Representation Act, service to all the people of the Port Arthur riding in northwestern Ontario.

17. Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Inquiry of the Ministry—1. What hotels, inns, taverns, restaurants or public houses in the Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto were granted licences by the Ontario Liquor Licensing Board during the years 1960, 1961, 1962 and 1963?

2. Who was the lawyer, or legal firm, representing the successful applicants in each case before the Ontario Liquor Licensing Board?

Answer by the hon. Provincial Secretary (Mr. Yaremko):

1. and 2. 1960: Danforth Hotel, J. E. Eberle; Capriccio Restaurant, N. J. DeLella; Hungarian Village Restaurant, S. A. Bjarnason; Four Seasons Hotel, Paul Henry; Carson Hotel, W. S. Restaurant Tavern, D. Vanek, QC; Mr. Tony's Place Tavern, V. K. Colebourn; Fran's Restaurant Tavern, S. H. Brown, QC; Del Monica Restaurant Tavern, none; Balkan Restaurant, R. Rohmer, QC; Le Provencal Tavern, J. L. C. Jenner; Hotel Pierre, W. E. MacLatchy; Cafe Jules Tavern, J. H. Campbell, QC; Canadeuro Tavern, H. C. Kerr; Panonia Restaurant, H. Graner, QC; Cyrano's Tavern, D. F. Meyrick; Diana Sweets Tavern, M. Des Brisay, QC; Latina Restaurant Tavern, D. S. Dignam; Saxony Tavern, J. R. Casey; Fifeshore Hotel, D. B. Goodman, QC; Motorway Hotel, E. A. Jupp; Four Seasons Hotel, Paul Henry; Conroy Hotel, none; Steak Pit Tavern, none; Holiday Inn Hotel, C. M. Neiman; Le Gourmet Tavern, D. B. Black; Fisher Hotel, H. H. Solway; Nikko Gardens Tavern, John A. Gordon; Forum Tavern, V. K. Colebourn; Eastwood Park Hotel, none; Rib 'N Beef Tavern, D. A. Bales, QC; Piazzis Romi Tavern, D. J. Walker, QC; Canadiana Hotel, none; Guild Inn Hotel, none.

18. Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine)—Inquiry of the Ministry—1. Will the cost of the dinner and dance, scheduled for Thursday, March 19, 1964, to which the Prime Minister and Members of the Government have invited the Press Gallery of Ontario and other Press, Radio and Television guests, be defrayed out of public funds? 2. If so, (a) what is the estimated cost; and (b) out of what appropriation will it be paid?

Answer by the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Roberts):

1. Cost of dance and entertainment—No. Cost of food—Yes.
2. (a) $1,423.96; (b) Vote 1701, item 5.

Clerk of the House: The 1st order. Resuming the adjourned debate on the amendment to the motion that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair and the House resolve itself into committee of ways and means.

ON THE BUDGET

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, as we move into the traditional windup of the debate, we are provided with an opportunity to review a session which is coming to a close, I am informed, today.

In many respects, Mr. Speaker, it has been a very remarkable session. Normally, the session of a Legislature following an election is a rather tame affair. Indeed, early in March this year I remarked on the frequency with which there appeared in the newspapers, articles to the effect that little was happening at Queen's Park, it was all very dull. In retrospect, for the last six or eight weeks I think no one could say that Queen's Park has not been a place of considerable interest, and indeed excitement.

I want to say, in my overall comments in regard to this session, that I think our basic problems arise from the fact that we are still unwilling to devote enough time to the business of this province. I notice in the paper this morning a tabulation which shows that this year's session, assuming it closes today, will be for 70 days; 52 of them, I believe, before Easter and 18 of them since. That is three more days than the session a year ago which, in the experience of the last generation or so, was the longest session, during which we sat for 67 days.

But again, as the newspaper story this morning reminded us, Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to recall that more than 40 years ago this Legislature, on two succeeding years, met for 81 days and 71 days; so that even when the business of the province was represented by a Budget that was down in the few tens of millions of dollars, they were spending something approaching four months time to do that business.

I think it is also rather interesting, Mr. Speaker, to note the fact that in the province of Quebec, which is the only other jurisdiction in Canada with a comparable legislative load, in the year 1960-61, the Legislature sat for 107 days. In 1962 it sat for 93 days; in 1963 it sat for 92 days. In other words, it was sitting for some two to three or four weeks beyond the four months period which I have often suggested in this House would be an appropriate length of time for us to be devoting to the business of the province.

I reiterate that suggestion, because I think some of the difficulties that we got into this year—and I hope without rubbing any salt into the wounds that this will be a point that will be acknowledged by the government more than anybody else—arose from an unwillingness to do adequate work at committee, caucus and even Cabinet levels until it is discovered that issues of an explosive nature had finally gotten out on to the floor of the House.

I was interested in an editorial in the Toronto Telegram, following the whole Cass affair, which had this as its opening paragraph:

When everything is added up, what makes a democratic system work is simply work.

And I submit to the hon. members that this is the answer to the issue.

I would hope that the government would be willing to give some consideration to ways and means by which it might be possible to provide to all the members of the House, and perhaps particularly the backbenchers on the government side, a more meaningful participation in the work of the House so that they would not be overcome by the boredom which tends to create in this House on occasion an atmosphere of "Let's get the whole thing over with and go home."

One of the arguments that was used by the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Roberts) last fall, when we had a rather heated discussion on the question of a fall session, was that he felt a fall session was broken by a Christmas recess, and made it very difficult to plan. I was very interested in seeing exactly how the hon. Prime Minister was able to implement the planning on the pattern that he, himself, chose—namely, a session that would begin in the middle of January. I think it is rather significant, Mr. Speaker, that of the 140-odd bills which finally found their way onto the order paper during that session, no more than about 60 of them had been introduced by March 1, some six weeks after the Legislature had been called.

So I am led, at least on this level, to the conclusion that skipping the fall session, and permitting all the planning which would be possible by uninterrupted departmental work in the fall and the early part of the year, still did not make it possible for the government to get even half of the bills on the order paper in the first six weeks of the session so that they would be there for the study of both the members and the public who might be interested in them.

Indeed, I think this whole tendency to rush the business, creating an atmosphere of "Let us get this over with and go home," was perhaps best illustrated when we were dealing with the very important estimates of the hon. Minister of Education (Mr. Davis), estimates which represented something in excess of over $400 million.

In the middle of those estimates, sir, the hon. Minister, because of pressures on him from behind the scenes in his own party, had to come in and say that he hoped we might be able to speed the estimate up during the course of that evening's performance.

I suggest that is not the way we should be conducting the business of the province. I plead once again with the hon. Prime Minister, and with the House, to recognize the fact that if we are going to do justice to the business of the province with a budget of well over $1.25 billion—which, as I have so often indicated, is larger than the budget of the federal House of Commons in the latter part of the thirties—it cannot be done in less than four months, which is at least a minimum of 80 sitting days. That would be getting back to what was done by one of the best governments we have ever had in this province 40 years ago, namely, the Farmer Labour government.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman — Mr. Speaker, rather — we have been in committee for so long perhaps you will forgive me for persisting in referring to you as Mr. Chairman — I want to turn to one or two other aspects of the session's operations.

First, the question of committees. I think that the combining of committees, in the fashion the hon. Prime Minister did this year, was a step in the right direction. I think when we had 18 committees we were trying to go in too many directions at the same time. There were too many committee meetings being held on the same morning and it was impossible for the members to get to them. I think this, generally, resulted in a lower standard of work being done.

I want to suggest, Mr. Speaker, that we still do not have an effective operation of committees, though we may have the basis for it. For example, I recall one time going into a committee—and when I name it, surely it is obvious how important a committee it is, namely, the committee on education, health and welfare, a committee which represents departments which in turn have jurisdiction over the spending of some $600 million or $700 million or $800 million in this province every year. Indeed, if one takes the hospital services commission, it is perhaps even more than that.

The first meeting of this committee, Mr. Speaker, was sometime well into March. And there was a very ironical little situation when the chairman—and I do not say this critically of him except for the timing of it, if he had anything to do with it—extolled the importance of this committee. This was, he said, a very important body. But there was the obvious contradiction in the fact that if it was a very important committee, then it should have been called for its first meeting earlier than the month of March.

I submit to the hon. Prime Minister, just as we have said about the public accounts committee and other committees, that if our committees are going to do the job, and if they sit down to examine what their job may be, they can find work to do from the opening weeks of the session instead of getting under way when we are about half-way through the session.

However, Mr. Chairman, there is another aspect of committee work to which I want to draw the attention of the House in the strongest possible protest. We have on the order paper two bills, one dealing with Westminster College and one dealing with Rochdale College. My hon. colleague from Yorkview (Mr. Young) referred to this yesterday. These bills came before the private bills committee, they were discussed in considerable detail, there was rather a sharp division of opinion, and finally they were passed.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Westminster, by a big majority.

Mr. MacDonald: As my hon. colleague from Woodbine reminds me, Mr. Speaker, the Westminster bill was by a huge majority. The bills came back and they are sitting on the order paper; and I can only conclude at this stage of discussion, Mr. Speaker, that it is the government's intention that these bills will die on the order paper.

Mr. Speaker, this is unforgiveable short-circuiting of the legislative process. We have people who go through the normal requirements of bringing in a private bill—there is a petition, and other committee requirements before it comes into the private bills committee. It is discussed; it is voted on; it is passed; and it is sent back here as part of the work of this Legislature, because the committee is a part of this Legislature. Then somebody behind the scenes intervenes and decides that these bills are going to be killed.

Mr. Speaker, I ask you this question: Who did this? Who is responsible for killing these bills?

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): The hon. member is asking the wrong man.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, I put the question to Mr. Speaker and then he can redirect it to whomever it should be redirected.

Mr. Singer: It might not get an answer.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, I am just pausing for a moment in the hope that we will get an answer. In the earlier part of this session we had quite a vigorous display from some of the newer hon. members of the House in the back benches expressing new ideas, and acting as though they were going to be a ginger group within this government.

Well, the ginger has been directed primarily in recent weeks at the Toronto Stock Exchange and not to what has been going on in this House. Because where are the people who spoke with such vigour in the earlier days in the session; where are those people today? When they stood up and they fought—I put it to the hon. member for London South (Mr. White) who sponsored the Westminster bill and got it passed with a big majority: Why does he sit in his seat silent today, when somebody—

Mr. Bryden: When the rights of this Legislature—

Mr. MacDonald: When the rights of this Legislature are being violated?

An hon. member: It sounds like an echo chamber.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, conceivably it is the emptiness in some portions of the chamber which create the echo. We have had a great deal of discussion, Mr. Speaker, during the course of this session about the exercise of arbitrary power. Indeed, sir, there is one Cabinet Minister absent in this government because of the mismanagement of arbitrary power, and yet, here is the most blatant exercise of the arbitrary power—a short-circuiting of the official procedures of this Legislature.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): You just had a bad night.

Mr. MacDonald: I did not have a bad night. You are having a bad day.

I would say, Mr. Speaker, that the intervention of the hon. Minister of Labour is rather a strange one. When people of this province follow the necessary regulations to get a private bill introduced, and then suddenly somebody unknown, some lobbyist, somebody within the government, frustrates the operation of the law why should the hon. Minister of Labour—a lawyer—treat it lightly and say that I perchance had a bad night?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: That is just the overstatement you continually make.

Mr. MacDonald: I am not making an overstatement. I ask this House what has happened to the legitimate rights of a group of people who brought their case before this House, referred it to a private bills committee where it was passed and then somebody had killed it?

Now instead of interrupting, I invite anybody who chooses to rise and explain this situation. In fact, I will give it in a moment or so.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, this appears to be a laughing matter. Mr. Speaker, contempt of this House and its procedure is a laughing matter.

You know, Mr. Speaker, I am reminded of an incident some ten years ago in this Legislature, back about the year 1952, when the government brought in a bill. It was introduced by the then hon. George Dunbar, a very endearing creature. It was a bill authorized by this government to change the business assessment on chain stores so that the assessment would be related to the volume of business rather than the frontage. It was to get a more equitable business tax from these larger businesses as compared with smaller businesses and the government, with Mr. Dunbar bringing the bill into the House, sent it out to the committee. Unfortunately there was a weekend intervening and in that weekend the chain store lobby got into action with the result that government members killed the government bill. It died and it has never been revived.

Now the question I ask—and again I direct it to the benign countenance of the hon. member for London South in the back benches there: Who killed this bill, the bill that he sponsored and on which he now sits silent? Well, we will let those who wonder what happens at Queen's Park pursue the issue, and I can assure them that we will assist them.

There is another area of the session's work, Mr. Speaker, that I want to speak about briefly, and that is the whole question of bills and resolutions put on the order paper in the name of private members. Once again we have made absolutely no progress. I assume we are moving to the close of this Legislature and most of the bills and resolutions that have been put on the order paper are treated with the usual indignity and discourtesy of not being called, of being ignored, of dying there once again.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): The hon. member is quite wrong.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I invite anybody to take a look at the number of bills and resolutions on the order paper. How many of them have been called? Indeed, even those that were called were once again called in the late hours of the night, 10.30 and 11 o'clock—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, I would point out, if I may, that I called some of these resolutions and the hon. member who had them on the order paper stood up in this House and said: "Well, we got all this in during the estimates." Now we spent hours and hours on the estimates and every point covered by these matters was debated during the estimates. Some of the bills have been called, the only problem is that we really cannot discuss everything four times.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, just let me take one example. I have a bill on the question of lowering the voting age on the order paper. We have not discussed that four times.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, we had a long debate on another resolution dealing with it.

Mr. Singer: And many other things.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker I just would like to suggest to the hon. Prime Minister that since his Throne Speech this year included that rather intriguing phrase about the "all-encompassing participation" of youth, then I trust that on the youth committee he will perhaps refer to this issue of the question of lowering of the voting age—because his own definition of the all-encompassing participation of youth was in terms of the number of young men who are getting into politics as evidenced in the last election. I hope that some of these other matters will be referred to committees where they will be looked into in detail.

Mr. Speaker, I want to suggest again that there is another way that has been tried and proven to be an efficient, orderly way of dealing with the bills and resolutions on the order paper, in the name not only of Opposition members but of government backbenchers. That is the procedure of setting aside a specified time, a half an hour or an hour, once a week or, for whatever interval you choose, so that these will be dealt with in rotation and we will know when they are coming up. The person in whose name it stands will have an opportunity to prepare and not be called in suddenly at 10.30 or 11 o'clock at night.

This, I submit, will give an opportunity for some of the government members who have indicated some refreshing new ideas to put these ideas in the form of a resolution or a bill, to have them debated and give them an opportunity to express their views. Indeed, it will give the government an opportunity to fly kites on policies through some of its own back bench members. This is the orderly, and I suggest the traditional, way in our Parliament of dealing with this kind of thing. I hope that sometime soon we can be persuaded to move towards it in this House here.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to turn to a final aspect of this year's session, something I have been able to deal with only in passing during the course of the session, and that is the consequences of your ruling on reading a statement of claim insofar as the business of the House is concerned. I am referring to the ruling you made following the reading of a statement of claim against Melchers which I made in the House. I am not disputing the ruling, but I want to draw to the attention of the House the serious consequences that this raises for dealing with the business of the House in the fashion which traditionally has been regarded as the responsibility of the members of the Legislature. I am going to quote from a few of the paragraphs in one of the ablest comments on this whole situation, namely that of Ron Haggart in the Toronto Daily Star. His summation was:

The ruling which Mr. Speaker Morrow then made on Friday morning is a calamity for free discussion in the place in Ontario which should be most free, the Legislature. Indeed he—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. Is this not using this Budget debate as a subterfuge to debate and question a ruling of the Speaker in the House?

Mr. Bryden: He has accepted the ruling.

Mr. MacDonald: I have accepted the ruling of the Speaker.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Well the hon. member is still debating.

Mr. MacDonald: I am not. Mr. Speaker, I have accepted the rule and I am now drawing to the attention of the House the consequences of that ruling, and I invite you to reflect on some of the observations of people who have looked into this whole matter.

Mr. A. H. Cowling (High Park): This is the third time around on this.

Mr. Bryden: It has not been dealt with yet.

Mr. MacDonald: Right, the first time I have been able to deal with it in some substance.

As Mr. Haggart stated in his column:

If the Toronto Daily Star, the Telegram and Mr. Speaker Morrow have their way any vital question of public policy which happens also to be the subject of a private dispute can be bottled up forever and prohibited from public discussion by the simple expedient of having the private disputants file the writ then adjourning the case forever without it coming to trial.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, it was rather interesting to follow the development of thought in the editorial offices of the Star on this, because they started by saying that it was unfair and then they ended up, after Mr. Haggart had entered the picture, by saying that if in a few months the Court had not acted, that then the House should assume its responsibilities in dealing with this matter.

Presumably what was wrong at one stage will become right at a later stage. There is perhaps a point in their observations.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): It is not always easy to follow.

Mr. MacDonald: At least give the courts time to adjudicate on this private dispute. But this is not simply a private dispute. This is a dispute that impinges on the public welfare of the province of Ontario.

Then Mr. Haggart turned to one or two cases, which I think should be pondered by the hon. members of this House because we are now in the position that the members can pick up a newspaper—and I have a number of them in my file which I invite hon. members to read if they are interested—which spells out the details of a case as reported from a statement of claim. It is presented in considerable detail for the public to read. Yet if I were to rise in this House now, Mr. Speaker, and attempt even to read that newspaper clipping, because of your ruling I would be out of order.

Now, this is infringing on even normal rights of free speech, let alone the broader rights of free speech which are normally the rights in any Parliament or Legislature. This is what I want to point out in the cases to which Ron Haggart drew attention.

It is just for such a reason that great leeway is given to elected members to speak the truth as they see it. More than 50 years ago an aggrieved citizen named Ward sued Alderman Sam McBride. The Ontario Court of Appeal upheld McBride's rights, in fact his duty to speak out, and Mr. Justice Riddell said of the elected representatives:

They should show no fear, favour or affection. It is their right and their duty to speak their minds fully and clearly without evasion or equivocation. They should show no fear, favour or affection and it is their duty as well as their right to use all legitimate means, oratorical or otherwise, to impress their fellow legislators of the righteousness of their views.

They have no need to be mealy-mouthed and should call a spade a spade, nor should they in such a case as this necessarily confine their arguments to the immediate facts. So in the present instance the defendant has the right as an alderman to say anything, however false, which he honestly believes to be true.

Now, that is the end of the quotation from Mr. Justice Riddell.

Mr. Singer: Riddell.

Mr. MacDonald: Riddell; sorry if I am mispronouncing the name. Mr. Haggart commented:

Does the Toronto Star really believe that politicians speaking in the privileged sanctuary of the Legislature should confine their discussion of disputed facts to those facts proven in the court of law?

What then does the Toronto Star say to George Wiggs, the military critic of the British Labour party, who had only a rumour to go on and who rose to ask a question in the House of Commons saying: "In actual fact these great press lords, these men who control great instruments of public opinion and of power, do not have the guts to discharge the duty that they are now claiming for themselves. That being the case I rightly use the privilege of the House of Commons, that is what it is given to me for, to ask the Home Secretary."

And with that the lid was off the Profumo case.

Mr. Sopha: Quite a difference.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, when you have a case which in the first instance may be a dispute between individuals but in fact relates to issues which impinge very seriously on the public welfare of the province, I invite you, Mr. Speaker, to examine the consequences of the ruling which I recognize you made in accordance with the rule of the House but which I submit is going to be a serious infringement on the necessary free speech of any Legislature, particularly this Legislature in the future.

Let me turn to one or two related issues concerning policy. I want to begin with a comment that was made by the hon. member for London South during the course of the Budget debate on February 26. He was speaking about the SIU trusteeship and he had this to say:

I am distraught, sir, that there were no voices raised against the SIU trusteeship plan introduced by Ottawa. It may have been the best solution to the problem, but I am shocked that there was no voice of dissent raised in this country and that the four parties represented in Ottawa would not stand up and question its merits, having in mind that it is the first time in the history of the free union movement that a government has imposed this kind of trusteeship over a free collection of its workers.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would agree with the hon. member that he has put his finger on a very delicate issue.

I suspect I am accurately reflecting the views of some people in all parties and, I will say, all the people in the New Democratic Party, who came to the decision they did, in support of the SIU trusteeship, only after profound misgivings and soul-searching. Rightly or wrongly they came to the decision that there was no other way of coping with the situation. However, Mr. Speaker, I am intrigued that somebody in this House should have risen and pointed to the dangers in this kind of principle.

For years I have been trying to point out in this House that this government's control over free collective bargaining, as it is exercised on the farm front through The Farm Products Marketing Act, is precisely the kind of thing which has been done in the SIU trusteeship. In other words, through the amendments of the so-called Bill No. 86 some years ago, this government has taken unto itself the power through its agency, the Ontario Farm Products Marketing Board, to intervene in the operation of a local marketing board which represents a group of farmers—indeed to say to them regarding the raising of their money, the spending of their money, the regulations and the operation of their collective bargaining, that if they do not do as they are told they will be put under trusteeship. Indeed, I quoted, in the instance of the tobacco situation some weeks ago, during the course of the Throne debate, an instance where, in the case of the tobacco board, it was told that such and such would be done or else it would be put under trusteeship.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I want to draw to your attention the consequences flowing from this. I have here a clipping from the Simcoe

Reformer of Friday, April 10, which is headlined: "Tobacco board found guilty of grave sale Act violation." In other words what had happened here was that Stanley Smith, the former president of the tobacco board, had taken the tobacco board into court because of its grading procedures this particular year and he got a conviction. I am sure he was not so much interested in putting the tobacco board on the spot, but he was interested in clarifying the situation. And I want to draw to the attention of the hon. members of this House precisely what happened during the course of the testimony in the court hearing.

You will find on February 19, in the report of the Simcoe Reformer of the court hearing, the following excerpt, which I am going to quote into the record without comment at the moment.

Director Rene Strobbe of district five was called as a witness by the prosecution. He told the court that the method of grading had been changed from the previous year. Mr. Strobbe said, "I was at the auction the day that the flat 46 was sold and was talking to Mr. Smith." He told the court that a resolution was passed by the tobacco board on November 5 which stated that the method of grading tobacco for the 1963 crop was to be the same as the previous year.

He was asked, by Mr. Harris, who had changed the grading policy as the resolution was unanimously approved by the tobacco board. Mr. Stobbe replied that The Department of Agriculture called the chairman and told him the method that was to be used to grade this crop. "In other words, your board had no alternative," said Mr. Harris.

Lawyer Stafford asked, "Was there ever any written notice of this order placed before a meeting of the tobacco board?" Mr. Strobbe replied, "Not to my knowledge, and I have not seen a written order."

Mr. Harris then produced a letter which he claimed was sent by the department to the tobacco board but Mr. Stafford refused to allow it to be placed in evidence. Magistrate Barnum commented, "It looks to me that the book says one thing and the man on the other end of the telephone comes along and says it another way."

In other words, Mr. Speaker, here you have testimony in the course of a trial on which there is now a conviction against the tobacco board for its grade procedures—testimony which was never denied—to the effect that the grade procedures for which they have now been convicted were made on the direction of The Department of Agriculture. This is just how far we have gone in implementing a concept of trusteeship in which the government intervenes and, in effect, violates the normal rights of free collective bargaining at least on the agricultural front.

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture): Why does the hon. member not go on and tell the whole story?

Mr. MacDonald: I have told the whole story.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: He has not told the whole story.

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer): How much was the fine?

Mr. MacDonald: The fine was only $10.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: A nominal fine.

Mr. MacDonald: Oh, I agree, Mr. Speaker. We are not dealing with fines. This is the reason why I said Mr. Smith had taken the case—

Hon. Mr. Allan: Did not Mr. Smith and Mr. Strobbe get defeated in an election?

Mr. MacDonald: I do not know.

Hon. Mr. Allan: You do not know?

Mr. MacDonald: No.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Oh, yes, you do.

Mr. MacDonald: But once again this is irrelevant.

Hon. Mr. Allan: You said that they were not trying to put the tobacco board—

Mr. MacDonald: Once again, Mr. Speaker, this is not relevant. We are talking about the law, and the violation of the law was imposed by direction of The Department of Agriculture on the tobacco board, and it was taken to the courts and they were convicted. Sure, it was a nominal fine; but the fact of the matter is that they were convicted. They were forced, under direction of The Department of Agriculture, to violate the law.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, will my hon. friend permit me to tell the real story?

Mr. MacDonald: In your time.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I can do it right now. If you want to tell the facts, the facts are completely irrelevant to what you are saying.

I think it is a complete distortion of the facts, and typical of the hon. member and his party.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. MacDonald: I think in the course of this morning we will leave this as a task for the hon. Minister of Agriculture next year.

However, Mr. Speaker, I just invite the hon. member for London South and other government hon. members to notice the inconsistencies in principle in approach to the process of collective bargaining. I was most interested this year to take a look at a couple of bills which were brought in by The Department of Agriculture. One is Bill No. 82; and in section five, referring to the collective bargaining in the milk industry, it points out that when collective bargaining by the representatives of the producers and distributors:

—has proceeded for 14 days or sooner if the representatives of either party are satisfied that agreement cannot be reached in respect of one or more matters of collective bargaining under section 23, they may by notice to the representatives of the other party and to the board require all matters on which agreement has not been reached to be referred to the board.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, here is a solution to the problem of the refusal to bargain in good faith. This government has been searching for this solution on the trade union front. They were confronted with it in Trenton; indeed the civil servants now feel that they are confronted in their bargaining with the government itself at the present time.

Repeatedly, every year, we have cases of what is construed by the workers as a refusal by management to bargain in good faith. Or on some occasions it is construed by management as a refusal by the workers to bargain in good faith. We have in our law a stipulation that you must bargain in good faith, but it is meaningless; and yet here on the agricultural front, the government has the answer. If after 14 days either party comes to the conclusion that there is no solution available, then they can move forward to the next stage. I invite the government to be consistent in the application of its principles.

Indeed, we have another bill which was brought in—The Farm Products Marketing Act, Bill No. 83. We amended a subsection which requires producers of the farm products to pay a licence fee to the association. In other words, whether they like it or not, if they are producers they must pay for a licence from the association; they cannot be a free-loader.

What is the basic principle, Mr. Speaker? It is essentially the same basic principle as a person being a member of the union so that he could have a check-off of union dues. Indeed, there has come before this government the proposition of revocable check-off of union dues so that it will be voluntarily agreed by each one. Indeed, this plea has been put once again to the government through the hon. Minister of Labour. And I think it is pretty well known that some Cabinet colleagues, including the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr. Spooner), have argued—at least in front of delegations and I assume he did the same thing when he got in front of the Cabinet—that he was in favour of amendments to The Labour Relations Act to grant what is now granted in six or seven of the other Canadian provinces: the right to revocable check-off of union dues. But the government brought in its amendments to The Labour Relations Act and once again we have not got it. Why this inconsistency in the application of principles?

We are coming to a long and, I trust, leisurely summer in which I invite particularly the hon. member for London South to reflect on the application of these principles and perhaps come back and give us the benefit of his reflections next session.

Mr. J. H. White (London South): I have to leave these matters to the farmer from York South.

Mr. MacDonald: You know there were a lot of people on that side of the House, even lawyers, who said, "I will have to leave matters pertaining to the police commission to the Attorney General." And did they get their fingers burned! Collectively and singly. So perhaps with four months session, with the odd evening of leisurely preoccupation with the business of the province, you would get into these matters.

Mr. Speaker, I turn briefly to another matter I have been espousing in the last week or so in this province and that is the issue of a few little people out in the Woodstock area who are being pushed around by a local agency which is the recipient of grants from this government. It was rather ironical last week, in fact just a week ago today, Mr. Speaker, that the very day on which the hon. Prime Minister announced he was setting up a Royal commission to examine the many ways in which the individual rights can be encroached upon by the arbitrary exercise of power, I had come to my office three of the 46 property owners who are about to be ousted from their property for the building of the so-called Gordon Pittock dam. Incidentally, it is a project they all very earnestly support; they are very much in support of it.

I listened to the pleas of these people and I put out a press release. The comments from the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Pittock), who is the chairman of the Upper Thames River Authority, was that the land had been assessed by professional assessors. I had noted in my release, on the basis of the evidence given to me, that there had been an approach to the authority through Donald Middleton of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture, in an effort to get an independent evaluator to take a look at the situation. Once again, sir, in spite of the representations and the support of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture, the authority has refused. Indeed, the group had asked that they as a committee be allowed to sit down and iron out some of these differences. The authority has refused.

Mr. Speaker, I acknowledge that every time you have to expropriate property you are going to have one or two people who will try, if I may put it in very blunt terms, to gouge the public Treasury to get more than they are entitled to. I acknowledge that this is a problem you always face. But I submit, Mr. Speaker, that if you have 46 people who are going to be expropriated, and to whom offers have been given by the authority and only 12 of them have accepted—14 now, two more in the interval, the hon. Minister says—in other words, 60 per cent or more have refused, then, Mr. Speaker, I suggest to you that it is quite possible that there is some validity in the case that the offers being made are not reasonable offers.

Indeed, I want to bring the picture up to date with a telegram which I received on Monday morning, commenting on the chairman of the authority and his observations on Friday that there had been a professional assessment:

IN REFERENCE TO REPLY BY GORDON PITTOCK IN TORONTO DAILY STAR DATED SATURDAY THAT LAND HAD BEEN EVALUATED PROFESSIONALLY. ONE MAN WAS LOCAL BANKER AND RETIRED PREMATURELY. HE THEN SOLD FARM MACHINERY WITH LIMITED SUCCESS THEN TRIED REAL ESTATE. ABILITY AND QUALIFICATIONS OF THIS MAN LIMITED. HE IS STILL WORKING FOR AUTHORITY AS LAND BUYER. OTHER TWO APPRAISERS FROM OUT OF THE AREA. ONE A LOG BUYER RETIRED STILL WORKING FOR AUTHORITY AS LAND BUYER. OTHER APPRAISER AUCTIONEER IS STILL EMPLOYED SELLING PROPERTY FOR AUTHORITY LEFT FROM OTHER PROJECT. THESE APPRAISERS TRAVEL TOGETHER. SPENT ONE hour on three hundred acre farm and looked in no buildings. were half mile from property buildings appraised. Upper Thames Valley has refused to meet a committee of the property owners to discuss the problem. If land owner says he should have more money he is told to arbitrate. They have not negotiated as only one price offered. The properties cannot be replaced at the prices offered. Properties appraised one and one-half years ago and prices have risen locally since. All local banks have refused to loan money on upper Thames River Authority written offers. So far five people have not been paid on date promised others are afraid to be caught in the same circumstances. Appraisers and buyers for upper Thames made derogatory remarks about properties and showed definite bias. Authority will not discuss size or reason of amounts or units to them. Signed by Bill Goodwin, Gord Harwood, Ross Hewitt, Wayne Gardhouse and Stan Down, five of the 46 people.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I suggest to you that in light of that kind of a record the hon. Minister should be intervening rather than letting the rights of these little people be overridden in the fashion that they are. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Oxford, when I raised another point in this connection a week or two ago—to the effect that he had given them a commitment that they would not be ousted without at least two years' notice so that they could buy alternative property—said that he gave them that commitment in 1962 and that was two years ago.

I have on my files now two affidavits from people who contend that he made that commitment at the East Zorro township meeting in 1963, not 1962 as he said to the House. It is a very mixed and unsatisfactory picture, and perhaps it is one that just underlines the need for establishing a Royal commission that would protect the rights of the little man as he gets pushed around by the arbitrary exercise of power by the government or some of its agencies.

Now in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to turn to two aspects of the Budget and the raising of money. This is of concern to the hon. Provincial Treasurer. The government contends that it is striving to balance its revenues and its expenditures. It refuses to raise money where there is a legitimate case for doing so.

If I may, I will return to an old theme of mine in this House, the resources revenues.

Our revenues from the whole mining industry during the past year have been $11.3 million. We had reports given recently to the annual meeting of the International Nickel Company that its net profit after taxes for roughly the same period were $106.3 million. This, incidentally, was an increase from $94.2 million the year before.

In other words, the increase in one year in International Nickel's profits after taxes is greater than the mining revenue of this province from the whole industry, including International Nickel. Now on the basis of simple justice, Mr. Speaker, on the basis of the public interest, this is completely indefensible, I suggest to the hon. Provincial Treasurer. Little wonder that when the Windsor Star on April 17 was congratulating the north on the recent discovery in the Timmins area it had this to say:

Mineral and timber resources in Ontario have been exploited and developed principally for the profit of the private investors. True these, via taxes, have made substantial contributions to the federal and provincial coffers, but these haven't been anything like the same proportion as in Alberta.

Now if I may just interject here, Mr. Speaker, Alberta's high revenues are not so much from taxes as they are from the outright sale of oil resources.

In fact, Saskatchewan's record of resources taxes, which did not cripple development, is one worthy of examination. But the Windsor Star's conclusion is a pertinent one nonetheless.

Had this province raised as much as the western provinces Ontario would have had need for less revenue from other forms of taxation, and been able to get by with less public debt while at the same time offering more in the way of service. It is rather queer that Ontario receives little more in direct revenue from the forest industry than she pays out in fire protection services at the expense of the taxpayer.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, this government's expenditures in servicing the forest industry actually exceeds the revenue in most years. So the net effect is that the people in the province are subsidizing the forest industry instead of receiving revenue from our timber resources upon which the industry exists.

Now there is one area—

Hon. A. K. Roberts (Minister of Lands and Forests): If I may interrupt on that—

Mr. MacDonald: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The Minister may ask the member for York South if he would care to answer a question.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I would just like to correct him, Mr. Speaker, because the statement he made that fire fighting costs exceed the revenues is completely wrong.

Mr. Bryden: The hon. Minister is completely wrong as always.

Mr. MacDonald: Now let me turn, Mr. Speaker, to a final area in which this government, I want to submit to this House, is not raising revenues as it should be. This deals with two problems at once, a revenue one and the whole operations of the Jockey Club on which I have done a little bit of research work. This is perhaps something of concern to many of the hon. gentlemen.

The Jockey Club has established a virtual monopoly in Ontario racing, and it has been able to do so with the approval of the government through the Ontario Racing Commission. The contrast was very striking earlier this year when the Labatt's brewing firm was up for sale. E. P. Taylor, through Canadian Breweries, did not even dare put in a bid—although there was some public announcement that they considered it, but did not think it was a wise thing to do—for fear of the consequences under The Combines Act. Yet E. P. Taylor, through the Jockey Club, has been able to establish a monopoly control over racing; and do so not only with impunity, but with the provincial government aiding and abetting him in his efforts.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Wait till the hon. member reads the Windsor Star. There is a $5 million proposal there.

Mr. MacDonald: I am talking about monopoly at the moment, or virtual monopoly.

I now wish to present to the House the results of some research on the apparent results of the monopoly operation of the Jockey Club. I am tabling a second copy of this material, so that it will be available for examination by anyone who may be interested. This research covers the years 1959-63 inclusive.

Let me state, first, conclusions which emerge from this research, and then I shall proceed to document them.

From the monopoly position which the government has in effect granted to the Jockey Club, racing is now operated for the benefit of a few horsemen in the province, to the detriment of the many. The "stake" and "allowance" races are so arranged by the Jockey Club that the few enjoy profitable operations, while the many sustain consistent losses. The situation becomes even more questionable when it is noted that among the few who enjoy the profitable operations are a significant number of the directors of the Jockey Club, so that in effect they are in a position to reap profits from racing which they themselves arrange.

Finally, and of particular concern to us in this Legislature, the government persists in financial arrangements with the Jockey Club which result in the public Treasury being deprived of many millions of dollars which, on the basis of the law in other jurisdictions, it should be enjoying. In considering the Budget, this is a matter of immediate concern to us as legislators.

In going back to document these conclusions, let me say that in the interests of time I shall use only the figures for 1963. I might add that the conclusions which emerge from the 1963 figures are substantially the same as those emerging for the four previous years for which statistics have been tabled.

In 1963, there were 73 stake races arranged by the Jockey Club. I am informed that there are some 1,400 horses racing in Ontario, yet analysis of the results reveal that all the stake races were won by 47 horses. Thus, while the purse distribution for the year was $4,020,300, a very large proportion of that amount, $1,027,220, went to the owners of the 47 horses who won all the 73 stake races, leaving only $2,993,080 for all the others. Furthermore, five of the 37 men who owned these 47 stake horses were directors of the Jockey Club.

Furthermore, analysis of what happens in these stake races reveals that the Jockey Club is operated in the interests of the few horsemen, rather than in the interests of the shareholders of the OJC, because consistently over the years, the Jockey Club has lost money on stake races.

For example, in 1963 the betting pool for the 73 stake races was $7,480,520. The Jockey Club's nine per cent take therefore represents $684,008. Yet the purses paid out—with most of them being shared by a few owners—represented $837,500, so that the shareholders of the Jockey Club experienced an overall loss of $153,492 on these races which provided rich gains for a few horsemen, among them five Jockey Club directors.

Let us carry the analysis a step further. In 1963, the 73 stake races were won—first, second and third places—by 113 horses owned by 70 men. The total purse was $4,020,300. Of that amount, $1,568,005 was shared by the 70 owners of the 113 stake horses, leaving a balance of only $2,452,295 for all of the rest of the horsemen in Ontario.

If one estimates—and I am reliably informed that this is accurate—the cost of maintaining a horse at a conservative average of $3,000 a year, that means that the cost of upkeep for the 113 stake horses was $339,000, leaving their owners a profit of $1,229,005; while the upkeep of the remaining 1,287 other horses would be $3,861,000, representing a loss to the owners of $1,408,705.

To the few who hath, a great deal is given —by the Jockey Club which is dominated by that few—and the rest of the horsemen sustain the regular losses. In fact, in 1963, 67 owners shared all of the stake purses, finishing first, second or third, and among them hon. members will find a very liberal sprinkling of Jockey Club directors.

Let us turn now to a comparison with other tracks in North America. New Orleans, I am informed, is the one most comparable to those in Ontario operated under the Jockey Club. For example, the average amount wagered per day at New Orleans, in the year 1960, was $411,306; the average in Ontario was $460,281. From that amount, it is interesting to note that the profit to the track in New Orleans was $12,671 per day, while in Ontario the profits to the Jockey Club are $22,108 per day.

Thus Ontario is permitted by government policy to make $9,457 more per day than New Orleans, even though New Orleans has only 84 racing days, and Ontario has 196 racing days.

Now we begin to see where sympathetic government policies make it possible for the Jockey Club to add to its profits at the expense of the public purse. In the United States, all uncashed tickets go to the state; in Ontario, the money remains with the Jockey Club, a figure that must now represent a sizeable amount. I think we were given that amount in the committee once but it was not recorded anywhere officially to my knowledge.

Furthermore, in the United States, breakages are usually split 50-50 between the track and the state. I might explain that the term breakages is used to describe the uneven amounts of money that are not paid out, since the practice is to pay off to the nearest 10 cents. During the years, 1956-61, the breakages in Ontario amounted to a total of $3,189,303—all of which was added to the profits of the Jockey Club, with none going to the government Treasury.

It is interesting to note, Mr. Speaker, how the Jockey Club, under the direction of E. P. Taylor, has been able to increase the daily earnings to the few who share stake races, while maintaining it at the same, or a lower figure, for all other horsemen. For example, in 1955, before E. P. Taylor took over, the daily average purse was $15,603, of which amount $2,015 was taken off the top for stake horses, leaving $13,588 for all others. In 1959, after E. P. Taylor had taken over, the daily average purse distribution was up to $18,798 from the $15,603, of which amount $6,180 was taken off the top for the stake horses, leaving an even lower figure—as compared with 1955—of only $12,618 for all others. Since 1959, the amount taken off the top for the few stake horses has continued to climb. By 1963, the daily average of purse distribution had risen to $20,512, with $8,000 being taken off the top for the stake horses, and the same figure of $12,512 for all other races.

For some years now, hon. members will be aware that we have had an annual discussion in the standing committee on government commissions as to whether or not the nine per cent for the Jockey Club and only six per cent for the government Treasury, of the fifteen per cent take of the betting pool, should be changed to bring more revenue to the public Treasury.

In view of what I have just spelled out, Mr. Speaker, I think the case is conclusive. When racing was "small business" in Ontario, there may have been some justification for a nine-to-six split in favour of the Jockey Club. But racing today is "big business," with 196 racing days, so the income to the Jockey Club would be adequate with a lower cut. It is significant to note that racing in Winnipeg, with only 40 days, operates on a nine per cent; yet here in Ontario, with 196 days, we still give the Jockey Club nine per cent and it is much lower in many American states. The public Treasury is entitled to millions more of this money instead of swelling the profits of the Jockey Club, whose monopoly operations are conducted to meet the interests of the few who dominate racing in this province, even at the expense of the shareholders who sustain the regular losses on stake racing days.

In considering this picture, let me recall that my hon. colleague, the hon. member for Woodbine, was finally given the answer to his question concerning the amounts of money that went to the few who dominate racing, from the approximately $70,000 a year grant to thoroughbred breeders. The reply indicated that, for the year ending March 31, 1963, there were only eight breeders receiving over $1,000; and, of these eight, one was E. P. Taylor, who received $18,385. In the year ending March 31, 1964, there were ten receiving over $1,000, all of them in the $1,000 to $2,000 bracket, while E. P. Taylor received a cool $20,996.

Mr. Speaker, it is beyond my comprehension how the government can defend this subsidization of the rich man's hobby from the public Treasury. And when that situation is considered in light of the whole monopoly operation of the Jockey Club, for the profit of a few and the losses of the many horsemen in the province, I think the time has come for the provincial Treasury to quit complaining about high outlays and limited revenues, and do something about protecting the public interest. And for that reason, when we have a vote somewhat later, and not too much later, we have no alternative but to vote non-confidence in the government's handling of the revenues of this province as represented by the Budget.

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this is the day, if not the hour, when Kipling would have said that the tumult and the shouting dies and the captains and the kings depart. We have been here, as has been said by the hon. member for York South (Mr. MacDonald), for a longer period of time than any other Legislature in the past 40 years, I believe. And, like the hon. member for York South, I want to deal this morning with what has gone on in the session in an objective sort of way. I do not want to try to thresh old straw, I do not want to revive debates which have gone on in the Legislature. To me the record of this Legislature has been written. It is on record. It is in Hansard; and, for one, I am content and my party is content to let it be and let it speak for itself for those who care to analyze it in the days that lie ahead.

It is true, as the hon. member for York South has said, that it was expected that this session of the Legislature would be a routine sort of a sitting, inasmuch as the government had come back from an election campaign with strengthened numbers in the House, and inasmuch as in the session prior to the election they had brought in a considerable number of new pieces of legislation. I do not think that the coming election, of course, had anything to do with this influx of legislation but it was there nevertheless; so, when the first session after an election takes places, it is reasonable to assume that the government will back away from very much in the way of new legislation.

That new legislation will come as the government gets nearer to the next election. Apparently, it is thought to be political and, in fact, it is almost proven to be political, that what is done in a legislative way following an election does not have too much effect or too much impact on the next election contest, so that this session set out to be a rather routine affair. But I want to analyze the session and to say to the House and to the province that two or three fundamental things came out of this session which makes it stand out in my mind, and I think in the minds of all thinking people, as a very outstanding session.

We have had, as the House will recall, very careful scrutiny of the estimates of the various Ministers of the Crown and I am proud of the part that the Opposition has played in scrutinizing the estimates and putting forward proposed legislation by way of resolutions and private bills on the order paper. That is the proper, the fundamental and the historic role of Oppositions down through the years. But in addition to that it can be said that oftentimes the Opposition Party—or parties, as hon. members would like to call them, it does not matter to me this morning because I am speaking of opposition as such—and the work they do in the Legislature becomes more or less routine and is not accepted by the public in the nature of being spectacular; it is what is expected of them. But in this session I am going to say to the House this morning, or this afternoon, that the Opposition, to me at least, and to the House and to the public, emerged to the position and to the place that they should have long ago occupied in the public mind. They are now, I think, recognized as having the ability and having the position to play a dominant role in government.

We have always been wont to say that the Opposition is less important than the government in the governmental scheme of things. We have said that, but somehow or other we have said it with our tongue in our cheek, but in this session it fell upon the Opposition to provide the atmosphere and to create the image that an Opposition is really just as important as the government itself and that it can and does, when the occasion arises, have a terrific impact upon government legislation, both in opposing legislation that in our judgment is not for the public good and in proposing measures of legislation which we feel, if it were enacted, would be for the public good.

Of course what I am basing my claim on this morning is in relation to Bill No. 99 and other things that I will speak about in a moment or so. I do not want to discuss Bill No. 99 or its merits or demerits. That is a page of history that we will read over and over again and the government will make reference to, I am sure, from time to time as the months go by. But in relation to Bill No. 99, the Opposition in this House was able to play their traditional role and was able to emphasize that traditional role to the public to the point that in this session, more than any other I have been in, the Opposition have been able to take their proper place. Not that they have not taken their proper place in past sessions, but they have been able, in this session, to stress their ability to take their proper place and to get it across to the people of the province and to the media that disseminates news throughout this province of Ontario.

In that debate in relation to Bill No. 99, the Opposition were able to stop the government in their tracks. They were able to bring them to their knees. In fact, it could be said that Napoleon's retreat from Moscow many years ago was an orderly withdrawal in comparison to the utter rout of the government forces before the enlightened onslaught of outraged Opposition members in this House.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that in that analysis that I make this afternoon, I say it not only to pat ourselves on the back but I say it for this purpose, that I think because of this incident we have as an Opposition assumed our proper role in the public mind. And that is not only for our good, it is for the good of the government, it is for the good of the people of this province. I think the people, perhaps more than at any other time, now feel that they have in the Opposition in this House those people, those men, who are intelligent, who are able to appraise and to analyze legislation and if they feel that they are being mitigated against and that the public need is not being served, they have the courage to get up and say so and fight until the public will is preserved. That was our position in relation to this bill and it will be our position in relation to all other matters that come before us.

I would say too that what happened in relation to Bill No. 99 has had a salutary effect in other phases of our activities during this session. I say to hon. members it is my opinion that I doubt very much if we would have ever had the McCrur commission had it not been for the debate that centred around Bill No. 99. I believe that the McRuer commission is an outcome of the debate in respect to Bill No. 99.

Now for many years in this House, as older hon. members will recall, I have argued for just such a commission. I have felt that we should examine the government's activities fully, and their rights and powers, and see how these rights trampled on the rights of the individuals. I have argued that we should look closely into the powers of commissions and boards that we have appointed in great numbers in this province of Ontario. So I am glad at this time, glad that Mr. Justice McRuer is going to examine fully all aspects of these things that we have talked about for years. But I suggest again that we would not have this commission being formed at the present time were it not for the emanations that came from the debate in respect to Bill No. 99.

In another regard I want to say this, with respect to hospital beds—I say this with deference to my friend, the hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond)—there is not a doubt in my mind but that the continued analysis of our lack of hospital beds in this province forced by members of my party and of the NDP over this last two months has at last roused the hon. Minister of Health to action where there was inactivity before. The criticism has brought the hon. Minister to an appreciation of the government's responsibility in this matter for the first time. Before that time he seemed to very effectively shelve that responsibility and pass it off on the other side.

But the determination of Opposition members in this Legislature, I say, has brought home to the hon. Minister that he has, as a member of the government, a tremendous responsibility to supply hospital beds for people who are sick in this province. As a result of this activity on the part of my hon. colleagues and my hon. colleagues to the left, Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister, I think, is moving now, reluctantly perhaps, but moving in the right direction. I do not think he would have moved had it not been for the criticisms levelled at him by the hon. members of the Opposition.

So taking it all in all, I am very proud of the record of the Opposition in this session of the Legislature. I want to say here and now that I am particularly proud of the co-operation and the support of my hon. colleagues during this session of the Legislature. All of us, I think, appreciate that this party came back from the last election with something less than complete victory in their pocket.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): That is one way of putting it.

Mr. Oliver: In fact we came back without a leader, and it was a situation that was disturbing, not only to this party but to the Legislature as a whole which felt that there should be an Opposition which could oppose and constructively suggest to the government.

Mr. A. F. Lawrence (St. George): It is still a problem.

Mr. Oliver: No, it is not a problem now. I think the hon. member is underestimating when he says that. I really do, because in this session of the Legislature, and my hon. friend knows it, my hon. colleagues have taken their full part in the discussion of all public questions which have come up. They have made their points known and I suggest to you that we have played, along with our hon. friends to the left, a constructive and a real vitalizing part so far as an Opposition is concerned.

I want to go back to my friend the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) for a moment, and I am bringing to mind some of the things my hon. friend from York South has said about committees and about the conduct of the House itself. I would be less than fair if I did not say to my friend the hon. Prime Minister that in his conduct of proceedings in this House there has been an improvement in the last year or so. There is no question about that. I mean we would be less than frank if we did not say that. That comes, Mr. Speaker, from the lips of one who lived under "czarist" rule in this province for a number of years in relation to these matters.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): I thought you sat on these benches here under "czarist" rule.

Mr. Oliver: Oh, no, no. It was under a benevolent democracy; there is no question about that. It was not a dictatorship at all.

But I say seriously that there have been improvements made. My hon. friend has tried at least to improve the workings of the Legislature within this Chamber. He has tried to meet, in a measure, reasonable suggestions that were made.

An hon. member: That will be his epitaph!

Mr. Oliver: Yes, that may be the thing he is known for best; I do not know. I wanted to say this before I went to the matter having to do with my hon. friend further—

An hon. member: The epitaph.

Mr. Oliver: I want to make reference, while I am in a mood to commend, to the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests (Mr. Roberts). He does not know that I think he is a pretty good administrator in this government; I think he is. And I think it should be said—I mean the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr. Spooner).

That was, Mr. Speaker, perhaps the most unfortunate mistake; but I wanted to say this, and I think it should be said on the part of public men, that I have regretted and my party has regretted and we have been almost ashamed of the treatment my hon. friend has received this last few days. We in this House are able to recognize courage when we see it, and my hon. friend in a certain committee of the House exhibited that courage. It so happened that the exhibition of that courage coincided with our views in respect to that particular matter. To have what I think is very unfair criticism levelled at my hon. friend, as he stood up for what he thought was right, then I say to you that that should be made mention of by those who recognize the situation and appreciate it.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, in respect to committees of the House, two or three things. We have this year, indeed this morning, appointed five new select committees. For this I commend the government. The government in this province has become so big and so complex that to delegate some of the responsibilities to committees is a good thing; I commend the government for it. I notice, to my pleasure, that in the reading of the list of the members and the chairman attached thereto, unless I misread it or did not hear it correctly—and I think I did hear it correctly—there is not one Cabinet Minister as chairman of a committee. Had that been done this morning I was going to have really reprimanded the hon. Prime Minister. I think—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Sorry to disappoint you.

Mr. Oliver: No, no, it was not disappointing me; but I do feel, Mr. Speaker, that having a Cabinet Minister as chairman of a committee is a retrograde step. A Minister has not the time in the first place; and he is very apt to reflect government thinking and government policy to too great a degree so that the committee could not have an untrammelled view of the whole situation. I hope that we do not go back to that condition.

I want to say a word about the public accounts committee and my hon. friend from St. George. I believe it was yesterday that there was laid on our desk a copy of the report of their activities during the session of the Legislature. I thought it was a very good report. Some of the recommendations are very worthwhile. But I want to point out to the House, and to the hon. Prime Minister, that some day we are going to have to waken up to the responsibility we have to provide greater scrutiny of public accounts and of the affairs of government than we provide during the session of the Legislature.

The public accounts committee, in my judgment, should sit between sessions of the Legislature, and should have the time and the opportunity to go wholly into these matters. We are running a business in this province now and we should act like good big business men, and approach these problems in a businesslike way. To try to do this when the session of the Legislature is on, presents, I am sure, what everyone would agree are very tactical limitations and obstacles.

I know that my two hon. colleagues who went on the committee—the hon. member for Downsview (Mr. Singer) and the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher) oftentimes went to that committee because it diligently did its work during the session—went to the committee when they should have been doing something else.

There was not, and there cannot be, the opportunity to give full scope and full analysis to the problems which come before that committee while the session is on and while the members are engaged in the work of other committees. I say to the hon. Prime Minister that one thing I think he should do at the next session of the Legislature is make provision for a committee which will sit between sessions, to have the powers and the duties and the responsibilities as encountered this year by the committee headed by the hon. member for St. George.

Under the circumstances, and within the limitations imposed upon this committee this year, I think they did a remarkably good job; but it is impossible, and it takes away from the effective working of other committees, and the effective working of the House as a whole, to ask this committee to sit almost constantly during the session of the Legislature. There is not any reason, in my judgment, why that committee should not sit between the sessions of the Legislature when it would have ample time, full opportunity, to fully analyze these great questions and problems and bring back to the people of this House its analysis, its deductions and its conclusions. I hope my hon. friend will give that some thought.

Another thing I want to say is with regard to the rules of the House. I feel that the time has come when we should set up a select committee of this House to go into the rules of this House itself. I want to say to the hon. Prime Minister, and I think he will agree with me, that it has been a long time since the rules of this House have been revised. Great changes have taken place and in other jurisdictions the rules have been revised two or three times since ours were revised with respect to this Legislature.

Incidents have happened in this session of the Legislature. I do not want to enumerate them or to evaluate them or to pronounce upon them, but I just want to say that over the years we are continually feeling the need for a revision of the rules of this Legislature so that they may conform with the present-day needs of the legislators themselves. At Ottawa they are almost continually revising the rules. At the present time I understand they are seriously going into this problem.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: They had better.

Mr. Oliver: Well, maybe they had better but we had better here, too.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Oliver: I wanted to point out that, in Ottawa, one of the subcommittees engaged in revising the rules is headed, I understand, by that veteran parliamentarian from Winnipeg, Mr. Knowles. I think they are seriously tackling the problem of bringing their rules up to date, more in conformity with the needs of the times.

I can remember when there was a committee in this House established to assess the rules and to bring in a new set of rules. It was something like the committee on commissions. It fell down on its work, and I do not think the report was ever presented to the House.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Oliver: No, you let it die and no amount of—

An hon. member: You let it die. You were too busy—

Mr. Oliver: That was perhaps most unfortunate, but I wanted to say this, and I think it should be said—

Hon. A. K. Roberts (Minister of Lands and Forests): Sorry to disappoint you.

Mr. Oliver: No, it was not disappointing to me.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: The hon. member for Essex North (Mr. Reaume) was on this committee with others, and it was brought in.

Mr. Speaker: The leader of the Opposition has the floor.

Mr. Oliver: Well, my friend, the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests, might have it right this time. We will let him have his hour; at the moment I do not want to get into a dispute. I do not know what he is talking about actually. I do not know whether he does or not.

I would say, Mr. Speaker, that at the next session of the Legislature I feel there should be a select committee to study the problem of the electoral reform in Ontario. I am telling you in lots of time so you can prepare for it. To me it is most important that we bring our election law up to date in this province of Ontario. I have been through a lot of elections in Ontario and I tell you that the time has come now when expenses in connection with elections must be cut down, or we are going to have it in this province that only the wealthy can afford to be legislators—and that is not the prime purpose of membership in this House.

This committee should be set up, I suggest Mr. Prime Minister, with the widest possible powers, long enough before an election so that its report can be studied, evaluated and analyzed. And I hope, trust and believe, that we should not move into another election until we have completely reformed our electoral law in this province, having to do with all the aspects of that mentioned by the hon. member for Dovercourt (Mr. Thompson).

Then I would say, Mr. Speaker, that in respect of committees as a whole I believe that the select committees which have been appointed will do good work. I have a feeling, and it may not be shared by other hon. members of the House, that we should not get into the practice of allowing select committees to go on and on, year after year. I think the committee appointed should be given time enough and should meet often enough to assess whatever problem is put before it and report back to the next session of the Legislature unless there are very special reasons why it should not do so. I think we are getting away from the spirit and fundamental intent of these committees if the committee members themselves feel that, "Well, we will just carry on for a while now, then we will ask the Legislature to renew our powers and we will go on and on indefinitely." I think committees should be told that the work assigned to them has to be completed within the year and that the report on their work should be given to the next session of the Legislature. It seems to me that this would bring not only dispatch but a better understanding and a better appreciation of what committees really mean.

So far as the legislation which has been brought down this year is concerned we have said what we wanted to say in respect to it. It is on record; I am willing to abide by that record. As we move forward into another session we shall, of course, move into that new session with the same determination as we approached this one.

I wanted to say one more thing in respect to what my friend, the hon. member for York South said about resolutions and private members' bills. I could not agree more with him when he said there should be a place on the order paper, a specific defined place on the order paper, for the discussion of members' resolutions and private bills introduced by the members of the Opposition, or the members of the government for that matter.

An hon. member: An hour a week.

Mr. Oliver: Yes, an hour a week; or maybe more. Because I have a great appreciation—and somehow I think the hon. Prime Minister has, too—of the good that flows from resolutions introduced by the members on the opposite side of the House. They have not been introduced frivolously; they have been introduced because those members felt that that resolution pointed the way to either removing a grievance or setting out a better procedure, or changing policy so that more people would be helped and the general good served.

A lot of thought goes into the preparation of these resolutions and these private bills, and I am sure it can be proven that much of the legislation governments introduce from time to time really have their birth in these resolutions and private bills introduced by the members of the Opposition. Government members would be the last ones to admit that. At the time they throw it off to one side, they dismiss it with hardly a wave of the hand and yet, as night follows day or as day follows night, they invariably find that government legislation in the next year, or the year after, reflects the thinking contained in those resolutions and in those private bills. So I say, if we believe that—and I do—then it should become a more important part of the proceedings of the House than it has been up until this time.

I hope that at the next session of the Legislature we will have, as has been suggested by the hon. member for York South, a real opportunity to express our views because we represent people, too; we have ideas as to how the people should be served by legislation and we should have an opportunity, a stated time.

The other thing about it is that the practice has been in this House to allow these resolutions and private members' bills to go along, in the main, toward the end of the session. There could surely be a more orderly disposition of the feelings of the Opposition as expressed in these resolutions than to bundle them all up at the tail-end of a session and perhaps, even as my hon. friend said, not call them at all.

We have three more years in this Legislature. We have time yet to make it, insofar as the business of the House, the running of the House is concerned, the best Legislature we have ever had in this province. The opportunity is there, and the lead is there, and all we need is the willingness to grasp the opportunity and the necessity. I urge upon the hon. Prime Minister not only to give that passing thought, but very serious consideration.

I have no more to say this morning. We are now moving very close to the end of a session and we have, as I say, discussed all the things we wanted to discuss. We have not left undone any of the things we should have done, and I think we have done all the things that we should have done; and because we have proceeded in that manner I think we have made a great contribution—perhaps it will not be admitted on the other side—but a great contribution to the welfare of this province.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I, too, will echo some of the sentiments expressed about this last debate in this session. When I think of it I think particularly of the new hon. members who came in here "bright-eyed and bushy-tailed" and ready to go, and I think they are probably a little wiser in the ways of our democracy. I think that they have added a good deal to the proceedings of this House and, from what I have seen I would prognosticate that they will add a good deal more in the future. I hope I will be able to make what few remarks

I have to make without any interruptions from Woodbine.

I am quite prepared to answer any questions, as always.

I think I will start by dealing with some of the comments that have been made concerning the session. I, too, am aware of the length of this session. This came as no surprise to me and I did not, as did the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Oliver), look forward to this session as being a dull one.

We have quite a record of legislation. Some 144 bills reached the order paper—those are public bills—133 of them passed. There were 34 private bills introduced; 26 of them passed. I do not think it has been a dull session. I did not anticipate that it would be, nor did we cut down our full legislation simply because it happened to be the first session after an election. This may be the way it was done in years past when other people occupied these Treasury benches, but not today.

I think we can look forward to longer and longer sessions. I have said this before, and perhaps I am being proven right, but I refuse to get into any comparisons with Quebec or with British Columbia, or particularly into comparisons with the House of Commons; because as we all know, they are having their difficulties in processing one-quarter of the legislation that we are able to deal with in this House.

We, I think, have been able to adjust our procedures as we have gone along. We have attained a degree of flexibility, and I want to make it very clear that I do not consider this Legislature to consist only of the government benches and the seats of those who support me in the government.

I am very aware of the position of the Opposition in our democratic system and I have attempted in my time of operating the House to provide opportunity for full discussion of all matters that are of concern and I do not think, even though the hon. member for York South (Mr. MacDonald) would like to stay for another month in order to say that we have been here for another month, I do not think he can say that there has been anything he wished to discuss that has not been discussed and an opportunity given so to do. We have not only bent the rules, we have badly fractured them on occasion in order to give opportunity for debate of matters that would not have otherwise reached the floor of this House at all.

My own approach to the rules and the functioning of this Legislature is that the less formality we have in the way of rules the more effective an instrument we can develop, because we will make it fit the need of the day and the need of the hour. The difficulty with rules is that they become very rigid and then people begin to use them for purposes for which they were not intended. I have an idea that this is a part of the trouble in the House of Commons. They simply have too many rules and those who choose, on either side, to use the rules for purposes for which they were not intended, can make it difficult to conduct business.

Mr. Stanley Westall has an article in this morning's Globe and Mail in which he says: "Closure, spring tonic for a restless parliament." But he has one comment which certainly appealed to me when I read this this morning—if I can find it—in any event I can paraphrase it. He says really that to get business done you must have an attitude in which the members wish to get business done. And this is the way it will be done, rather than revising our rules and setting up a great number of rules and regulations which can be twisted and turned and used. If we all come into this Legislature with a full knowledge of the instrument it is and how it can be used for the people of the province, then we will have a Legislature that will function properly. Personally, I would prefer to do it that way rather than get into the rigidity of many rules.

A reference has been made to two private bills that are on the order paper and it was asked who is responsible for their disposition, and once again the inference is that there is some great bogey man walking around in the background who is pulling a lot of strings. Well, the government, of course, is responsible, because the government runs the order paper.

Now in regard to these two bills, the first one provides for something that is contrary to government policy and this was dealt with in the private bills committee. The government takes complete responsibility for leaving it on the order paper and not calling it, because it would establish a precedent which is contrary to present policy and which in the opinion of the government would cause a great deal of difficulty throughout the province. That is why it was left there.

As far as the other bill is concerned, the private bills committee did the reverse with this. We can accomplish what is wanted without a private bill and those concerned have been so informed—at least I asked that they be informed and I assume they have been.

So that is the story. There is no great ogre in the background. There is no pressure group. There is no lobby. It was purely a government decision.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Why did the government not have the courage to place its decision before the House by calling second reading of the bills?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: We have to take the responsibility for it.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: There was also some mention made of privilege in the House, and I think we must be careful of privilege. I think one should be free to say what one thinks and one believes, but I think there should be an honest belief in what one says if one is going to take advantage of privilege in the House—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I think this is something that we all, as individuals who are protected by the privilege of the House, should bear in mind when we take advantage of privilege. If a member honestly believes something, then he is free to say so.

The only other point about privilege is, of course, we still live, I hope in this province and in this Legislature, by the old maxim where a man is innocent until proven guilty, and it does not fall to any individual to have to prove his innocence, his guilt should rather be proven.

Now, in regard to the time that is taken with the private members' public bills and the resolutions, I have gone over the list very carefully and I am not going to itemize it, but as I said earlier, many of these were discussed during the estimates. We have developed a procedure in the House, and I am sure my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition is well aware of this, sir, because back in the days when he was a member of the government, all the estimates of the government were passed in one night and there was no procedure at all such as we presently have. Maybe that is why he enjoys this present procedure so much.

By this I mean the way we treat the estimates and the great latitude that is permitted on every vote. This is where many of these matters are discussed and debated most fully and, as I said earlier, in calling several of the resolutions as I have done, of course we always meet the plaintive cry that they are called late at night. Well, there are lots of things called late at night. If the House is going to sit until 11 o'clock, something has to be done between 10.30 and 11. A lot of important government business is settled in this chamber in the late hours of the evening. Indeed, it is quite wrong to say that these things were called late at night, because if hon. members will check Hansard they will find that they were not.

Many of the hon. members who had items on the order paper indicated that they had already debated them fully and put them before the House during the course of the estimates. In fact there was almost a diffidence to introduce the matter again.

In regard to the bills on various matters dealing with elections and voting age, which the hon. member for York South mentioned, there is a resolution covering the whole matter which was debated here for an hour and a half—nearly two hours—

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): The hon. member for Dovercourt's (Mr. Thompson's) resolution.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Yes. Now that was debated in the first week of the session. So the Opposition members cannot very well say it was all left to the last few days. I am quite prepared to provide time for these things to be debated. I am not necessarily prepared to provide time for them to be debated three or four times. That is the point. If I look at it and I see it has been dealt with, I think it is a reasonable proposition to say, "That has been dealt with here, the points of view have been put, and it is not necessary to go over it again."

As far as the committees are concerned—

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): The hon. Prime Minister is not prepared to accept the principle—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Of course I am.

Mr. Sopha: He instructed the hon. member for High Park (Mr. Cowling) to adjourn the debate.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Of course.

Mr. Sopha: And that was the major—

Mr. A. H. Cowling (High Park): How else are we going to stop the hon. member?

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, Mr. Speaker, I cannot really understand the finest nuance of thought of every hon. member of the House.

The adjournment of a debate being taken as an insult is a brand-new one to me. However, if you care to speak to me about it in private, I will see if I can arrange this. But I can assure you that these matters you put on the order paper will be debated; you will have an opportunity to discuss them. This is the basic principle I operate by, that everything anyone wants to say in this House can be said and there will be a place found for them to say it.

In regard to the select committees, I can only say that I am a great believer in the select committee system. I think in our committees we perhaps get away from some of the rigid partisan positions which are taken in certain matters and in certain fields in the Legislature. They are all-party committees and the party lines break down in committees. In my view they do a good job and I think, from these committees we have appointed this morning, we can expect good results. I can assure you that, in the thinking of this government, we are agreed, unless it happened to be exceptional circumstances, that Cabinet Ministers should not sit on select committees. In any event, there never has been a Cabinet Minister sitting on a select committee, unless he was appointed while he was there, or something of that nature.

But the public accounts committee, you will realize, was an innovation. We were starting from scratch because we changed the size, the composition, and the function of that committee this year; and I, too, am pretty satisfied with how it went. I felt there was a high degree of responsibility shown by the members of the committee. This is encouraging, to the point that we will enlarge the functions of this committee after we have had a chance to analyze the report and the procedure and see the changes which might be made.

There is only one other question. That is the standing committee of the House. We revised its organization this year. I am not yet satisfied that it is functioning as it might. On the other hand, there seem to be some underlying difficulties which are hard to overcome; but it will be our intent to examine the function of them during the session to see if any further changes are necessary and might be made.

I wanted to perhaps just speak about some of the things which have happened. We have had, in my view, a very productive session. There has been a great deal done and in some very important fields. I think of what has been done primarily, and as soon as you start assessing the function of any session, one of the first things that comes to mind is education—and particularly I think the implementation of the foundation tax plan this year is something of which we might all be proud.

It was a difficult plan to devise. It was two or three years in the making and was backed up by money you voted here, to the tune of $285 million. I think, in terms of its results across the province in the provision of true equality of education, that the results will justify the time it took to develop and the amount of money involved.

There are other areas in which we have broken new ground. Perhaps the field of law reform is one. The establishment of the law reform commission is not particularly a startling piece of legislation. It does not create any great public impression. But when you delve into it a little bit, you will find that we have research going on in practically every area of human activity except the law. I hope to be able to make an announcement concerning it very shortly, because it is my hope to have it functioning and I think, over the years, it will make a very large contribution indeed. I foresee it will function on almost a permanent basis over a long period of time.

I want to speak for a moment about various matters which have been raised by hon. members of the Opposition in this debate.

I was rather interested in going over the comments of the financial critic for the Opposition. He asked, at one point—if I can just find his exact quotation, perhaps I know it anyway, but he said: "Are the tax rates and the general economic atmosphere such in this province that industry is avoiding us?" This is a paraphrase of his remarks.

This struck that old note of pessimism and "What is wrong with us?" that I find so disturbing in the minds of many of our people in Canada. So I just asked about some of the things which have happened in Ontario in the last year so that I can disabuse his mind of any idea that this province under this government is just backsliding and everybody is leaving. We had 173 new companies set up business in this province during 1963. We made 78 manufacturing arrangements between foreign and Ontario companies, and these manufacturing arrangements are to manufacture products in Ontario which were formerly manufactured outside the province. This was the largest number of new industries to locate in this province during the past ten years.

There were 487 Ontario manufacturing concerns who made additions to their plants and production facilities in 1963. The gross provincial product increased 6.9 per cent in 1963 over 1962. Unemployment dropped from 4.3 per cent in 1962 to 3.8 per cent in 1963; and, as of March, 1964, was down to 2.5 per cent.

Finally, labour income in the province rose by seven per cent over 1962 to over $9 billion, and there were 124,000 more people employed in the province as of March, 1964, than there were in March, 1963.

I suggest to you, sir, in capsule form, that that is a record of the progress of this province and is the answer to any suggestion that industry is moving out and that this is not a good place in which to live and do business.

Mr. R. M. Whicher (Bruce): The hon. Prime Minister has told us everything except how much taxes we are going to have to pay.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, we will deal with taxes in a moment.

I wanted to speak for a few minutes, too, about water. I am not going to speak about this at any great length, but the question has been discussed here and debated and the hon. member for Grey North (Mr. Sargent) spoke about it yesterday and the day before, and I can assure him that we share the anxieties he has expressed. As I said once before in this House, this is truly an international problem and it has to be approached. Of course there are two sections to the problem.

There is the international problem which concerns the level of the lakes and then there is the purely internal problem in this province which concerns dropping water tables and drought. The two are interrelated at least to this extent, that it is generally conceded by those who know and have the scientific knowledge that the reason for the low levels in the lake, at least in part, is because we have had an unusually dry three or four years. This drought, or this lack of rain, has had two effects. One, it has pulled down the level of water in the lakes; and two, it has pulled down the level of water in the ground.

Mr. E. Sargent (Grey North): We are not concerned with causes, we want to know what the hon. Prime Minister is going to do.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: If my hon. friend will be patient; if he has not learned anything else in his first year in this House he should have learned to be patient, because if he stays here very long he will learn to be very patient.

In any event, these are the causes and they are very great causes indeed. They involve problems over which man at the moment has little control. There may be solutions to the level of water in the lake, I do not know, but the solution to the drought in some of our dry areas, in my view, poses even greater problems. But we have a solution, we have measures that we have taken and they have been explained to this House and I am not going to go into them again. We have taken certain measures to assist the farmers through the construction of reservoirs and farm ponds and things of that nature.

As far as the level of the lakes is concerned, we have been carrying on conversations with others concerned. In our own government, the people who are most able and have the greatest amount of knowledge and have done the most research over the years are the experts of the hydro-electric power commission, because flow of water to them is of course life blood, and the water resources commission. We have brought them together with representatives of ARDA and we have been dealing with the federal government in this water problem. We propose shortly—we are setting up the organization now—to call an international meeting. In other words, we are going to call a meeting with the federal government and with the province of Quebec, and also communicate with the states bordering on the Great Lakes, in order that we may ascertain what joint action we can take. Even a very brief analysis of the problem would indicate that no one jurisdiction can make any dent in this problem at all.

These meetings will be set up as quickly as we can arrange the machinery. We have already been in touch with the federal government. There have been two or three meetings held already in order to start this going. Where it will lead to I do not really know. Perhaps eventually it is something that should be done by the federal government. I would say this, that through the states that border the Great Lakes and are our neighbours, I am quite sure we will reach the federal government in Washington. I think it is a problem of sufficient international interest that it will involve our own federal government, it will involve the government of the United States, it will involve all the state governments and it will involve at least two provinces. To bring all these people together is going to take a little time, but that is what we propose to do.

I wanted to mention minimum wages. I think that this is a very forward piece of legislation which we have processed through this House in two steps during the last session and this session. Of course our hon. friends opposite, and perhaps this is their traditional role and I do not blame them for taking it, but of course whatever it is it has to be more from their point of view. But I would point out to hon. members that British Columbia has a general rate of $1 per hour for men and women and they have no exceptions. We have certain exemptions here. But apart from British Columbia, there is no province in Canada that has a higher minimum wage than we have. When we think of our neighbouring province with whom we are, at least to a certain degree, in economic competition—I am speaking of course of Quebec—and their minimum wage there is 70 cents for men and women in Metropolitan Montreal and 64 cents for the remainder of the province.

I would just point out that our minimum wage legislation has been generally very favourably received. The public response has been good. We were told for many years that it could not be done. All I have to say is that we did it and we are proud of it.

Mr. Speaker, before I sit down, and I know everyone is waiting for those words, I just want to make a few comments about an event which probably will take place before we re-assemble here. I might say that this has been referred to by the hon. leader of the Opposition and my remarks will be kind. We are watching the agonizing reappraisal that is taking place in the ranks opposite, and we may have a second Thompson, who knows? I must say history is wonderful, experience is wonderful. We sat here and took many, many jibes. They were all passed across this floor in a spirit of the greatest of good fun and fellowship, and I am sure that hon. members opposite will take any remarks that I may make in exactly the same spirit that they made them about two years ago. I remember all the comments about the leadership race that we had, and now I am very interested in watching their own.

It seems to me that—what have we got, five candidates already and not even a date picked yet. It is interesting to watch the change in the demeanor of people as they get into this leadership affair. You notice subtle changes in their approach to many problems, and I wish them all well.

But way back at the beginning the hon. leader of the Opposition said that this session would be characterized by a consistency, was it? Well, we were going to have a real exercise in consistency in the next few weeks, because the hon. member for Bracondale (Mr.

Could), who is one of the leadership contenders, in his magnificent address to this House, which lasted for I forget how many hours, he suggested in his speech—and this intrigued me ever since—he suggested in that speech that we would cut $150 million out of the estimates of The Department of Highways. In order that we preserve this jewel of consistency, I assume that this is going to be done, this is going to be part of the platform, and I was wondering how it was going to be done.

First we could eliminate all the work carry-over from last year and just stop, that would save about $60 million. Then we could eliminate all the new work proposed for this year, and that would save $54 million. Then we could eliminate all the services associated with this work and that would save about $26.5 million. This would leave about another $10 million to eliminate before we got rid of the $150 million. This could be done by cutting the annual highway maintenance right across the province by 50 per cent—that means we do half as much snow clearing and half as much sanding. And then, to complete the job, we just take the $6 million subsidy off the Bloor-Danforth subway. If we did all those things, we would get rid of $150 million from the estimates of The Department of Highways.

The hon. member for Bruce will be interested in this because he thinks we are starving the municipalities. We give them 47 cents out of every dollar we collect. I do not say we give it to them; we return it to them. In any event, in carrying out this proposal of one of the contenders for leadership of the party, if we were to eliminate all the aid we give to municipalities, we would save $112 million. Then this would leave $38 million.

We could eliminate the maintenance programme entirely. This would have some effect on school buses and things of that nature in the winter time, but nonetheless we would save the $150 million. That would take $15 million. Then we could stop all work on Highway 401, and the hon. member for Kent East (Mr. Spence) would be interested in that, and the hon. members from the Windsor area. We would just completely stop all work on 401, including the Toronto by-pass.

These are just two alternatives. You could keep putting these things together for some hours and come up with some really beautiful results.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Dovercourt): Is the hon. Prime Minister supporting him?

Mr. Sopha: Is he the hon. Prime Minister's candidate?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: No, no. I am just referring to this jewel of consistency; if this is going to be policy, I am just interested in how it would be done.

But in any event, I wish you all well and I will be watching with great interest. And if it should come about—I have no idea of whether this is even a possibility—but I will say this in any event. If it should come about that the hon. leader of the Opposition were not to be here as House leader when this House reconvenes, I for one will be very disappointed.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I was thinking this morning about some of the discussions we had here last night. I thought perhaps I could say, in closing these remarks, that in the situation in which we find ourselves in Canada today it would be a very bad thing for all of us, from coast to coast, if we were to even in a joking way introduce partisanship into the affairs occupying men in our country in the very great events which will come upon us, and the very great events with which we have to deal. I can only say, as far as I am concerned, that I am not the least bit interested in getting any kudos for anything that may be done. I do not think the Prime Minister of Canada is, and I do not think the Prime Minister of Quebec is; in fact, neither do I think the leaders of the ten provincial governments are, or the federal government. I think it would be unwise if we were to approach some of these things from that point of view. I think our final goal, what we are after, is not a headline but a united Canada.

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer) moves that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair and the House resolve itself into the committee of ways and means.

Mr. Speaker: The amendment is as follows:

Mr. R. M. Whicher (Bruce) moves, seconded by Mr. H. Worton (Wellington South), that the motion that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair and the House resolve itself into the committee on ways and means be amended by adding thereto the following words:

That this House regrets that the Budget fails to exhibit that the government is aware of the urgent need to encourage, develop and expand the foundations of the economy of this province.

And this House regrets that the Budget indicates the government is content with the makeshift policies of the past rather than to adopt a broad, new, imaginative outlook paralleled with measures that would eliminate areas of poverty within the province, widely expand opportunities for expansion of existing industries and promote the establishment of new industries, using our great natural resources, increase the real wealth of our people and greatly increase our population.

And this House regrets that instead of being offered an energetic and vigorous economic programme, for our great province, our citizens are merely being asked to bear increased taxation and they and their children to assume an even greater debt burden.

The vote will be on the amendment. As many as are in favour of the amendment, say "aye".

As many as are opposed, say "nay".

The amendment was negated on the following division:

To these Acts the Royal assent was announced by the Clerk of legislative assembly in the following words:

Clerk of the House: In Her Majesty's name, the Honourable the Lieutenant-Governor doth assent to these bills.

Mr. Speaker: May it please your Honour: We, Her Majesty's most dutiful and faithful subjects, the legislative assembly of the province of Ontario, in session assembled, approach Your Honour with sentiments of unfeigned devotion and loyalty to Her Majesty's person and government and humbly beg to present for Your Honour's acceptance a bill intituled, An Act granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the fiscal years ending March 31, 1964 and March 31, 1965.

To this Act the Royal assent was announced by the Clerk of the legislative assembly in the following words:

Clerk of the House: The Honourable the Lieutenant-Governor doth thank Her Majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, accept their benevolence and assent to this bill in Her Majesty's name.

The Honourable the Lieutenant-Governor of the province was then pleased to deliver the following gracious speech.

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Lieutenant-Governor): Mr. Speaker and hon. members of the legislative assembly of Ontario, during this second session of the 27th Parliament, hon. members have accomplished much in the way of legislation, the Budget review, the study of the estimates of the departments and the reports of the various departments, commissions and committees. I commend you for the arduous work you have carried out during the last few months.

The legislation that you have passed will lead to further opportunities and benefits for all the people of Ontario and will ensure that their rights are more fully protected. Many of the bills approved by the House were designed to modernize the administrative functions of the departments and their branches in the light of present needs and to bring up to date the provisions of our earlier legislative enactments. As a result, two new departments have been established and the activities of a number of others reorganized in whole or in part, while many of our statutes have been considerably revised. Among the measures that have comprised the government's programme and that have received your lengthy consideration have been the following:

University development: this session marked the beginning of a new era in government-university relationships with the passage of Acts creating The Department of University Affairs and the Ontario universities capital aid corporation, which, in conjunction with the existing advisory committee on university affairs, will give consideration to university matters. The formation of the new department will enable the government and the universities to maintain constant communication on matters of mutual concern and to undertake fundamental studies in areas related to provincial assistance to higher education and the co-ordination of future growth. The new corporation will permit the province to spread the tremendous costs of capital expansion over a longer period of time while placing the procedures for capital assistance on a year-round basis, thus facilitating the planning and development of our universities.

Two further Acts enable the province to continue its programme of university development and expansion, to meet the needs of rapidly increasing enrolments. New charters were approved for Brock University and the University of Guelph. The first created an entirely new institution to serve the people of the Niagara peninsula. The latter arose from the solid foundations already existing in the federated colleges of The Department of Agriculture at Guelph.

Grants to the universities for operating purposes, totalling nearly $48 million, were approved by the House.

Education: several statutes of great importance in the field of education, including Acts amending The Public Schools Act and The Secondary Schools and Boards of Education Act were approved by the House. The establishment of the township school area as the general unit for the administration of the rural and small urban public schools and the requirement that all parts of a county be included in a high school district will lead to more effective educational opportunities for pupils living in rural communities. Public school consultative committees will be appointed in every county to consider the enlarging of county school areas. Provision has also been made for crediting the attendance of pupils for grant purposes on days when weather conditions interfere with the normal operation of the schools.

The Ontario foundation tax plan has been implemented and you have voted the sum of $285 million for general legislative grants to be paid the various school boards in the province.

Amendments to The Schools Administration Act will enable a school board consisting of more than three trustees to pay an honorarium on an established scale to its members, if the board so desires.

Funds have been voted to enable free textbooks to be provided to Grade 9 and 10 students, beginning in September of this year.

Vocational centres are being constructed at Ottawa, London and Sault Ste. Marie, while a new institute of technology is being built at Ottawa and an addition is being planned at Kirkland Lake.

Financial arrangements have been made for defraying the cost of operating schools for retarded children through the province paying a large percentage of the expenditures, with the remaining small balance coming from the local municipalities. This new legislation removes the necessity of raising money for this purpose through donations from the public.

Health: to assist further in the provision of hospital accommodation, The Public Hospitals Act was amended to permit low cost loans, up to a maximum of $5,000 per bed, to active treatment general hospitals. Funds were provided to enable hospital construction grants to be increased to approximately $5,300 per bed.

A forward step was the legislation to provide homes for special care, for those discharged from Ontario hospitals for the mentally ill, but without home or family. This will enable the Ontario hospitals to carry on their normal function and, at the same time, will provide a more homelike setting for these patients.

A new principle, in keeping with modern concepts of treatment and care of the mentally disturbed, was seen with the establishment of a board to operate the institute of psychiatry, now under construction in Toronto.

A new programme was set up to assist municipalities with their air pollution control problems, whereby a board of health instituting an approved programme of control will be eligible for grant assistance.

Public welfare: hon. members have given approval to several amendments to The Mothers' Allowances Act, reducing the waiting period for the granting of these allowances. A deserted mother may be granted an allowance after three months, instead of six months as previously. The allowance to unmarried mothers may be paid when the child is three months old, instead of six months. Mothers whose husbands are imprisoned may obtain the allowance when the husband enters prison, instead of having to wait till the husband has served six months.

By an amendment to The Day Nurseries Act, the province has extended to nine years the age of children for which it will share with municipalities in the costs of providing day nursery care, where the mothers are employed outside the home. Previously, the provincial contribution was limited to the costs of day nursery care for pre-school children.

Pension plans: The Pension Benefits Act was amended to repeal all of its provisions dealing with standard pensions, so that there is no longer a requirement to establish a minimum pension plan. The parts of the Act pertaining to supplementary pension plans and solvency requirements were retained. In addition, the portability rules for supplementary plans were extended to all pension plans, regardless of the number of employees.

The pension plans for our public employees—as set out in The Public Service Superannuation Act and The Teachers' Superannuation Act—were changed to bring them into line with the provisions of the amended Pension Benefits Act.

Your government is awaiting with a great deal of interest, more details of the revised Canada Pension Plan.

Housing: The Ontario Housing Corporation Act is legislation of major significance and its passing will enable the government to take full advantage of changes proposed in the federal housing statute. The first task of the housing corporation will be to eliminate bottlenecks in the housing programmes and to assist those families whose incomes are such that they cannot obtain adequate accommodation on the private market. The housing corporation will be given the responsibility of evolving and putting into effect the arrangements necessary to ensure that rental housing in Metropolitan Toronto and other areas of the province is substantially increased.

Labour: in the field of labour legislation, important new programmes have increased the rights of our working men and women. A comprehensive minimum wage programme, designed to prevent exploitation of the province's labour force, is being brought into effect throughout the province. It provides for a general minimum wage rate of $1 an hour, to be introduced by stages in all parts of the province.

The important amendments made in The Industrial Standards Act will increase both its usefulness and its flexibility as a means whereby employers and employees can negotiate and establish fair working standards for their industry or trade.

With the passage of the new Apprenticeship and Tradesmen's Qualification Act, the basis has been established for a complete modernization of the apprentice training system and its introduction into new areas of industry where today's economic developments urgently require highly-skilled manpower.

Significant steps were taken to protect the safety of working people throughout the province. The Industrial Safety Act constitutes a complete modernization of the former Factory, Shop and Office Building Act. The Workmen's Compensation Act was amended not only to expand its benefits, but also to promote safer practices in industry and to effect a closer co-ordination of safety education programmes.

Amendments were made to The Labour Relations Act to simplify and expedite certain of its procedures, mainly in the area of conciliation.

Administration of justice: the desirability to protect the public in certain fields has been met by the introduction of a number of important statutes.

The Ontario Law Reform Commission has been established with an unrestricted discretion to investigate into and report upon any laws of the province which, in the opinion of the commission, might be revised or otherwise made more consistent with the society in which we live. While the commission may take under advisement matters which are referred to it by the Attorney General, it is not restricted in any way as to the laws it may review.

Under the provisions of The Used Car Dealers Act, a system of licensing used car dealers and salesmen will be set up. This Act will provide a means of supervision, the administration of which will be assisted by the industry itself.

The House has made uniform those licensing procedures which are presently available for the assistance of the public and which relate to real estate and business brokers, mortgage brokers and collection agencies.

Our system for the administration of justice has been further improved. Provision has been made in The Magistrates Act for the appointment of a chief magistrate who will be of assistance in the organization of the work in all of the magistrates courts in the province. This office will perform a function similar to that of the chief judge of the county courts. The Crown Attorneys Act provides for the appointment of special Crown attorneys who may be utilized in any part of the province.

Provision has been made for hearings by the Ontario police commission, to assist municipalities and boards of police commissioners in determining the adequacy of their police and law enforcement services. These and other amendments which are contained in The Police Act should materially assist in maintaining law and order throughout our municipalities and in continuing to keep criminal forces at bay. The bargaining procedures which are available for the police forces of the province have been improved.

Municipal affairs: the amendments that have been introduced to municipal legislation are designed generally to improve, and make more efficient, administration in the province.

The Assessment Act amendments authorize the appointment of district assessors who will carry out the assessment for all the municipalities and localities in a district. The system of county assessment commissioners and district assessors will provide the machinery by which uniform assessment of real property throughout the province may be more expeditiously achieved. Another amendment will ensure that owners of land subject to tax sale proceedings will receive actual notice of their right to redeem.

Amendments to The Department of Municipal Affairs Act will give the department clear authority to investigate any of the affairs of a municipality on its own initiative. These powers are in addition to the powers to conduct an audit into the financial affairs of a municipality upon petition of a certain number of ratepayers. The department, as a result of a provincially-ordered municipal audit or of an inquiry or investigation, will be able to make orders requiring the municipality to correct any errors or deficiencies disclosed by such inquiries.

The Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto Act was amended to authorize agreements with any governmental authority to carry out studies of the entire Metropolitan Toronto planning area.

Amendments to The Municipal Act clarify the powers of the Ontario Municipal Board when dealing with annexations, so as to permit the creation of urban service areas. A municipality or a local board is given the power, with the approval of the municipal board, to expropriate from another municipality or local board with similar powers of expropriation, to prevent the possibility of important projects being held up indefinitely. A new section designed to prevent irresponsible persons from preying on the public will permit the municipal licensing of chimney repair men and persons in the business of repairing or renovating buildings or constructing fallout shelters. The present limitations on expenditures for publicity purposes based on assessment have been removed and a limit of $60,000 substituted.

Amendments to The Planning Act provide for the transfer from planning boards to committees of adjustment the power to consent to the conveyance of land, where a by-law for subdivision control is in effect, and certain powers to impose conditions to the consent are clarified. The effect is to leave with planning boards their prime function of dealing with an official plan, while a committee of adjustment will have the complete machinery for handling consents to conveyances, whereas previously only a rejected or an objecting applicant could appeal.

Municipal councils are authorized to pass by-laws setting out standards for maintenance and occupancy of residential property and requiring it to be maintained to comply with those standards. A committee may extend the time during which such repairs or maintenance have to be done. This legislation gives municipalities the means to prevent the creation or extension of blighted areas.

Economic development: hon. members have given approval to the government's economic development programme, which has contributed greatly to the present prosperous state of the Ontario economy. Additional funds have been voted for the promotion of manufacturing exports, which have been rising at an annual average rate of more than 20 per cent for the past three years, and for financial and research assistance to manufacturing and other industries. This assistance has contributed to increased production and employment in the economy to the extent that, by March, unemployment had fallen to its lowest level in seven years, and employment had increased by 124,000 from the previous year.

Legislation was passed to establish the Sheridan Park Corporation, which will ensure that the area centred in the Ontario Research Community on the fringe of Metropolitan Toronto will be devoted solely to creating the largest industrial research complex in Canada.

Energy and resources management: One of the most important duties of the new Department of Energy and Resources Management involves a provincial water management programme, co-ordinating the efforts of the agricultural rehabilitation and development directorate, the conservation authorities and the Ontario Water Resources Commission. The last two of these have been made the responsibility of the Minister of the expanded department. As a result of the plans made by the government to relieve the water shortage in certain areas, a new three-point provincial programme in regard to Ontario's water problems and resources has been effected. Under it, the government will give increased financial support in three fields: the construction of water supply reservoirs, the construction of farm ponds, and an emergency rural water supply for drought-stricken areas.

The Energy Act and The Ontario Energy Board Act were revised and updated in the light of experience, in order to improve administration. The Ontario Energy Board Act was changed to clarify the powers of the board, an interpretation section was added, its provisions relating to the storage of gas were strengthened and the pipeline provisions were broadened to deal expressly with pipeline stations. The procedures for appeal to the Lieutenant-Governor in council from orders and decisions of the energy board were brought into line with those of the Ontario Municipal Board, thus bringing about uniformity of practice in these matters.

Agriculture: several Acts designed to maintain the modern concept of the family farm and to strengthen the position of the rural producer were introduced. The Junior Farmer Establishment Act was amended to increase maximum loans to junior farmers to $40,000 from $20,000. Over 500 loans have been made since the Act was amended in the 1962-1963 session of the Legislature.

The Farm Products Marketing Act was amended to enable farm producer associations to raise funds for improved marketing of their commodities through promotion, education and research. The apple growers, after a vote, have already availed themselves of this new provision of the Act.

The Department of Agriculture Act was amended to provide assistance through bank loans, guaranteed by the government, to farmers required to haul emergency water supplies.

To strengthen the agricultural rehabilitation and development organization in Ontario and to develop effective local programmes, ARDA committees are being formed in every county and will provide a direct link with the Ontario ARDA directorate.

A barberry eradication programme will be initiated this year by The Department of Agriculture, while a study and research programme to deal with the problem of damage to crops by blackbirds has been established.

A mastitis control programme will be initiated this year to deal with this disease, which seriously affects milk production among some of the dairy herds of Ontario.

Under an amendment to The Plant Diseases Act, municipalities may pass by-laws enabling them to administer and pay the cost of programmes to combat designated diseases, such as Dutch elm disease.

Lands and forests: members have voted large sums to enable The Department of Lands and Forests to expand its forest and park development and wildlife protection programmes and to open additional parks, waterfowl hunting areas and public fishing ponds. The innate qualities for forest protection and fire-fighting of the Ontario Indian will be further recognized in the organization for forest protection this year, with their inclusion in special fire-fighting units. The number of junior forest rangers will be increased to 1,600, distributed in 66 ranger camps in northern Ontario.

Amendments were approved to The Crown Timber Act to modernize some of the procedures in regard to licences, and to The Game and Fish Act to improve practices involved in the sport of hunting.

Mining: the recent mining discoveries in northern Ontario have been most gratifying and it is to be hoped that they will result in an early expansion of our mineral production. The systematic mapping carried out at intervals by The Department of Mines in the Timmins area and the compilation map of that mining district recently prepared have been, and will continue to be, of great assistance in the widespread explorations taking place. Two geological field parties are being diverted to the new discovery area.

Funds were voted to increase the department's survey and mapping programmes, to carry out a new programme of seismic exploration along Hudson and James bays, and to permit a continuation of the airborne magnetometer surveys.

The Mining Act was amended to modernize some of its procedures in line with present-day practices.

Highways: with respect to the new legislation affecting the highways of Ontario, the underlying purpose has been to facilitate the granting of still greater financial assistance to the municipalities. Agreements with municipalities providing for a more generous provincial sharing of the costs of controlled-access urban expressways or freeways were authorized. The contribution of a city or separated town to a suburban roads commission will be based on the local assessment as adjusted by the provincial equalizing factor, thus permitting a more uniform sharing of costs.

An amendment to The Highway Improvement Act will enable roads that are partly in territory without municipal organization, as well as those wholly in such areas, to be designated as tertiary roads.

The Local Roads Board Act enables the formation of such boards on a voluntary basis, in place of the present statute labour boards. The new Act will make possible a more efficient and equitable method of administering some 5,000 miles of public roads in those parts of the province that are without municipal organization. The rate of financial contribution by the province will vary between 66.66 per cent and 80 per cent, compared with the standard 50 per cent basis applicable to the statute labour boards. In addition, Department of Highways staff will perform the work laid out by the representatives of the local people who will be elected to the local roads board.

Funds have been voted for the one-third subsidy on construction of the right-of-way for the Bloor-Danforth subway in Metropolitan Toronto, and for the purchase of a further $20 million worth of debentures for subway construction purposes. The Metropolitan Toronto Transportation Committee has expanded its fields of study.

An agreement has been made with the federal government whereby it will pay about 38 per cent of the costs of the crossings involved in the twinning of the Welland canal.

Transport: as the mandatory impounding of motor vehicles following conviction for certain offences has, in some circumstances, led to hardship for the members of an offender's family, The Highway Traffic Act was amended to remove mandatory impounding and to replace it with provision for discretionary impounding by a magistrate or judge. In the interests of greater traffic safety and to ensure that a motorist travelling through different municipalities in Ontario will not be met with conflicting laws, the Act was also amended to provide for uniform regulation of traffic at pedestrian crossovers. Buses may proceed without stopping at railway crossings protected by warning lights, as is presently permitted when the crossing is protected by gates. Urban municipalities have been given the authority to increase the speed limit on limited access highways within their jurisdiction to 60 miles per hour.

Tourism and information: in line with its expanded responsibilities and reorganized administration, the name of The Department of Travel and Publicity was changed to Tourism and Information. Regulations under The Tourist Establishment Act, administered by the department, were altered during the current session to make them more effective.

For the first time, the department has published major travel publications in both of Canada's official languages, as the first part of its programme of reorganization of publications. Copies of the department's advertising schedules have been sent to regional tourist councils, chambers of commerce and other interested bodies in an attempt to secure co-operative advertising in local, national and U.S. media.

The department, in conjunction with the University of Western Ontario, will commence the reconstruction of Fort Ste. Marie I during the summer of 1964, with the anticipated date of completion being 1967. It is the site of the first white settlement in Canada west of Quebec City and already attracts a quarter of a million tourists each year. The work on the fort is the first stage of the reconstruction of the historical and archaeological sites in the area.

Tax-sharing arrangements: in the field of federal-provincial relations, the government welcomes the new improvements that have been made in our tax-sharing arrangements with the federal government. These improvements, which provide the province with a larger share of the succession duty and personal income tax fields, represent a more adequate recognition of the increasing burden of provincial responsibilities.

At the conference last November, the federal government undertook to increase the abatement of federal tax in the succession duty field from 50 per cent to 75 per cent, effective April 1, 1964. At the request of my government and the government of our sister province of Quebec, the federal government agreed to compensate these two provinces in the current fiscal year by direct payment of an amount equivalent to the 25 per cent abatement. This arrangement has enabled the government to defer amendments to The Succession Duty Act until the Ontario committee on taxation has completed its inquiry into the provincial tax structure.

In April of this year, following the conference in Quebec City, the federal government announced an acceleration in the rate of federal withdrawal from the individual income tax field over the remaining two years of the current tax-sharing arrangements. The federal abatement, which is 18 per cent in the current fiscal year, was formerly scheduled to rise by a point a year—to 19 per cent next year and 20 per cent in the following year. The acceleration will now be increased to three points a year, and the federal abatement will rise to 21 per cent next year and to 24 per cent in 1966.

On the basis of current tax yields, it is estimated that the improvements in the provincial share of the succession duty and of individual income tax fields will produce, when fully implemented, an additional tax revenue to the province of $57 million a year, in addition to the increases under the present arrangements. In view of its expanding responsibilities, the government is gratified by this upward adjustment in its share of the major fields of direct taxation.

Committees: an interim report of the select committee on consumer credit was received and the committee's life was extended to enable it to continue its work. The select committee on municipal legislation is continuing its extensive review of the municipal laws of this province. Select committees on youth, aging and mining have been set up and their reports on the matters involved in these important fields will be awaited with a great deal of interest.

A Royal commission on civil liberties and human rights was established to inquire into the ways that these rights can be strengthened and guaranteed. The Royal commission on redistribution is continuing its work.

These measures and the many others you have approved, as well as the funds you have voted for the operations of the government, will promote the continuing development of the province and increase the rights, opportunities and security of our people.

My thanks go to the hon. members, whose untiring labours were so generously given, and to our civil servants, for their invaluable work.

May Divine Providence guide you in the days to come.

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary): Mr. Speaker, and hon. members of the legislative assembly, it is the will and pleasure of the Honourable the Lieutenant-Governor that this legislative assembly be prorogued and this legislative assembly is accordingly prorogued.

The Honourable the Lieutenant-Governor was pleased to retire from the Chamber.

The House prorogued at 2.00 o'clock, p.m.
